The telephone rates are to be raised from 10 sen to 15 sen for messages within the first circuit, and from 20 sen to 25 sen for messages within the second circuit.

Concerning passenger fares on Government Railways, the rates are to be as follows, for third-class passengers:—

	per mile.
For distances less than 50 miles	1.5 sen
For distances from 50 to 99 miles	1.3 sen
For distances from 100 to 199 miles	1.1 sen
For distances from 200 to 299 miles	0.9 sen
For distances from 300 miles upwards	0.8 sen

Hitherto the average rate has been 1.2 sen, and it will now become 1.428 sen, for distances less than 100 miles. The first-class fares, being, in every case, three times the third-class fare, can be calculated at once from the above table. We may note, however, that the third-class fares from Tokyo to Yokohama and from Tokyo to Kyoto, hitherto 20 sen and 3.27 yen, respectively, will become 27 sen and 3.62 yen; and the corresponding first-class fares will be 81 sen and 10.86 yen. The miles run by trains on the State railways throughout the year aggregate 800,986,967, and the result of the increased rates will be an additional revenue of 1,200,000 yen.

All these changes will become operative from April 1st.

CRIME IN TOKYO.

The population of Tokyo has increased largely during recent years, but the record of crimes shown a tendency to diminish. Omitting the two years, 1895 and 1896, when special conditions, immediately following the victorious war with China, produced a state of affairs unlikely to foster crime, the Fiji Shimpō notes that the number of robberies with violence and larcenies in 1893 and subsequent years was:—

1894	180	—
1898	108	19,000

This diminution may be due in part to the vigilance of the police, but can scarcely be attributable to the success of the latter in apprehending offenders. Thus, out of 19,000 cases of larceny in 1891, arrests were made in 5,400 instances only, and of these 2,400 were released on account of deficiency of evidence. Thus only 3,000 convictions and punishments resulted from 19,000 offences, more than 5 law-breakers escaping for every one brought to justice. Our contemporary attributes this unsatisfactory record to the very meagre character of the emoluments given to the police. Up to the spring of last year, their monthly pay was 8 yen for the lowest class and 12 for the highest. These limits were then changed to 9 and 15. But they are still much too low. It is found impossible to keep the force up to its full strength, and, instead of proving a permanent attraction to capable men, as is most desirable in a service where experience counts for so much, the metropolitan police lose one-sixth of their number every year. Such frequent changes are fatal to efficiency. A battalion of six hundred men could scarcely hope to become a highly trained and thoroughly competent machine if it had to exchange a hundred of its veterans every year for raw recruits. It is not a question merely of insufficient pay: the rewards of merit are also paltry. Thus a constable who apprehends the perpetrator of a robbery with violence receives a maximum reward of 10 yen, and if the offender is a murderer the reward is increased fifty per cent. Ten yen is poor recompense for an act which involves danger to life and limb. The other day, two burglars armed with drawn swords entered a house in Hamacho, in the Nihonbashi district of Tokyo. If a policeman receives, in the discharge of his duty, injuries so serious as to incapacitate him totally and permanently, he is allowed 40 yen per annum for the rest of his life. If, though too much disabled to earn a livelihood, he still retains the use of his limbs, the allowance is 30 yen. If he is killed on service, his family is presented with 100 yen and an allowance of 30 yen yearly to his wife and children, if he has any. These miserable pittances read strangely in the context of proposals to raise the stipends of members of the Diet from eight hundred to fifteen hundred yen. It should be added that policemen in Japan are never allowed to accept rewards from private individuals. In the case of the Nippon-bashi burglary alluded to above, the householder sent a pecuniary acknowledgement as compensation to the brave constable, but the money was returned by the inspector. One hears a great deal of talk about corruption in Japan, but certainly police-constables and porters on State railways are remarkable exceptions.

MUNICIPAL AUTONOMY

Some time ago, the citizens of Tokyo indulged in quite an animated demonstration over the practical recognition of their municipal autonomy. They were to have a mayor of their own, their very own; elected by themselves and responsible to themselves. This civic dignity was no longer to be absorbed into the person of the Governor of the City, an official nominee. Tokyo is a very wretched city. It would be impossible to infer from its condition that Japan is among the highly civilized countries of the world. Scattered throughout the provinces, there are many places which do not aspire to the honour of being called "cities," but are content to be known as humble "towns." These present, in the great majority of cases, a marked contrast to the first city in the empire. The state of their streets and their municipal arrangements generally reflect as much credit on their provincial situation as Tokyo brings disgrace on its title of metropolis. The towns have had mayors of their own since the inauguration of the new system of local government ten years ago. But no one pretends that their praiseworthy condition is due to the exertions of their mayors. They owe it, as is universally recognised, to the efforts of the prefectural governors sent by the Minister of Home Affairs to look after their affairs. It would seem that the citizens of Tokyo are now beginning to appreciate the fact. Their delight over the idea of having a mayor of their own appears to have evaporated, though they only began to enjoy the boon a few months ago. Dr. Hatoyama, supported by seven members of the Lower House, all, like himself, representatives of Tokyo city, has introduced a bill, and the Lower House has passed it, for investing in the Minister of Home Affairs extensive supervisory power in municipal matters. In short, it may be said that eight out of the twelve parliamentary representatives of Tokyo desire the re-establishment of a special system of municipal government in the metropolis, although for years the public heard nothing but a perpetual clamour on the part of the citizens against a special system when they had one. We admire Dr. Hatoyama's practical courage, and strongly applaud his wisdom. A little active interference on the part of the Home Department, and some efficient scrutiny by the experts in its service, would soon mend Tokyo's sorry plight. The closer our acquaintance with the conceptions of the Municipality the less commendable do we find them. Their latest fancy is to send a committee abroad to study Occidental systems of municipal government. That will be a very agreeable trip for some worthy citizens, no doubt, and they will come back considerably impressed, unless, as is not improbable, men are selected who have already paid one or more visits to Europe and America. But what is the use of such a step? What is there to be learned abroad about street-making, about drainage, about sewerage, about lighting, about policing and so forth, that can not be as well, or better, learned by engaging one or two competent foreigners at home, whose salaries during three or four years would not amount to the expenses incurred by the peripatetic committee on a single trip? The committee can not possibly discover how to make Tokyo respectable. They can discover what metropolitan respectability is, if they want an object lesson to guide them. But to reach the standard revealed by their inspection there will be precisely the same need of expert assistance after their return home as there was before they set out. Their wisest plan would be to make the offices of the Home Department in Tokyo the bourne of their travels.

SŌUL-FUSAN RAILWAY.

There is a very marked tendency among the Japanese at present—and when we say the Japanese, we mean the official as well as the non-official classes—to revert to the system of State aids which prevailed so extensively for several years at the beginning of the Meiji era, until a strong reaction was provoked against it in the early eighties. We have a vivid recollection of the outcry raised about Seifu kansho, when the people began to think that they could walk profitably without official guidance, and when the record of the Colonization Department and of the proposed sale of its properties gave occupation to so many political pens. Count Kuroda and his Kaitakushi doings were in terribly bad odour in those days; so bad that they almost became a synonym for costly failure. But time has vindicated the wisdom of his methods. Not many Japanese publicists could now be found to deny that the million a year which the Colonization Bureau used to receive from the Treasury with carte blanche as to the manner of employing it, has failed to bear good fruit. Marquis (then Count) Ito led the movement of State effacement in such matters, and thenceforth until the post-bellum programme came to be elaborated, the Government carefully abstained from meddling in industrial or commercial affairs. The law for encouraging navigation and ship-building may be said to have marked a revival of the old tendency, and thereafter came the grant of money to tea-producers and the attempt to put a premium on the direct export of silk. The present session of the Diet is distinctly remarkable for a disposition on the part of the members to draw officialdom once more into the sphere of affairs which, as Englishmen are accustomed to think, can be managed better and more efficiently by private individuals. There have been Representations presented by the Houses advocating the formation of sericultural associations, the construction of boats for deep-sea fishing, the organization of credit guilds, the purchase of private railways by the State, the establishment of a central industrial experiment station, the culture of salmon and masu, the revival of stud farms and cattle breeding stations, and so on, all under official auspices; and the Government, on its side, has introduced a Bill for establishing no less than three State protected banks, the Formosa Bank, the Colonization Bank, and the Movable Bank. We observe now that the fever has extended even to the Fiji Shimpō, which urges that the Government should encourage the construction of the Sōul-Fusan Railway by guaranteeing interest on the capital invested. Apart from the principle involved—and perhaps a State guarantee for such a purpose is one of the least objectionable forms of official interference—we can not but wonder that with the story of the Formosa Railway fresh in public recollection, the idea of inducing Japanese capitalists to put up money for building a Sōul-Fusan line should be seriously advanced. In the case of Formosa, not only did the Government offer to guarantee 6 per cent., but it promised to hand over the line already constructed and open to traffic, and to grant other important privileges and facilities. Yet the money could not be obtained. Is the prospect brighter in the case of the Sōul-Fusan road, which could scarcely be a very paying concern for some years, at any rate, and which would probably have to be constantly guarded throughout a great part of its length by gendarmes?

An interesting feature of this matter is the Fiji's view about the Sōul-Fusan road. It thinks that when Russia's Trans-Asian railway is completed, the eastward-bound goods carried over the line will travel through Korea by rail to Fusan; thence to Baku by sea, thence to Yokohama by rail, and thence, finally, by ship to America; the westward-bound goods coming first to Yokohama, and thence taking the above route in the opposite direction. From that forecast we gather that the Fiji does not believe in Vladivostok as the terminus of the Trans-Asian Railway, but looks to see the line traverse Shingking, cross the Yalu, and debouch at Sōul. It is hard to share that view. Appearances at present are strongly in favour of Vladivostok as the Russian terminus for goods coming to Japan or going westward from it by the overland route, and Newchwang seems much more likely than Talien to be the port for Manchuria's foreign trade.

THE BANK OF JAPAN.

The Government has dealt in a summary manner with the ferment among the officials of the Bank of Japan. The resignations of three Directors, Messrs. Usui, Kawakami, and Tsurubara, have been promptly accepted, and Mr. Takahashi Korekyo, a Director of the Specie Bank, has been appointed Vice-President of the Bank of Japan, an office not previously existing. Count Matsukata's views of the matter was that the resignation of several high officers of the Bank simultaneously could not be regarded as anything but a turbulent proceeding, and that peremptory measures were alone suitable under the circumstances. Friction between factions, a mere affair of sentiment, constituted the basis of the trouble. The action taken by the Minister of Finance is heartily approved by the vernacular press. Some journals go so far as to apply the epithets "strike" and "mutiny" to the conduct of the retiring Directors. It must be noted, however, that, while tendering their resignations, the Directors remained at their posts, and announced their intention of continuing to discharge their duties until their successors were appointed.

NEW BANKS.

Projects for two new banks have been elaborated by the Government and submitted to the Diet. One is called the Hokkaido Takushoku Ginko, or Hokkaido Colonization Bank. It is to have a capital of 3 million yen, with power to issue debentures to the extent of five times the paid up capital. The charter will be for 50 years, and the Government takes a million yen worth of shares upon which the Bank need not pay any dividend for the space of ten years. The business of the Bank is to be:—(1) To make loans on the security of immovables, according to the system of repayment by installments spread over 30 years. (2) To make loans upon the security of immovables, repayment to be at some fixed time within 5 years. (3) To make loans on the security of shares or debentures of companies engaged in the colonization of Hokkaido, and to subscribe for the debentures of such companies. (4) To make loans on the security of Hokkaido products and to buy bills on the same account. (5) To receive deposits and safe-custody deposits. It is provided that the Bank must carry 8 per cent. of its net profits to a reserve against losses of capital, and at least 2 per cent. to a reserve for equalizing dividends; and that its affairs shall be under Government superintendence.

The above institution has objects which explain themselves. There has, of late, been much talk about the necessity of adopting some measure of the kind, in order to facilitate the progress of colonization, and works of reclamation in Hokkaido.

The second bank is called the Dosan Ginko, or Movables Bank. Its business is to make advances against national securities, local securities, debentures and shares of companies, so as to facilitate industrial enterprises of all kinds, including railway construction, harbour improvement, and so on. The capital is 10 million yen, and the Bank will have power to issue debentures to an amount not exceeding five times its paid up capital. During a period of five years the Government guarantees a 5-per-cent. return on the paid up capital, and the sums to be carried to the reserves are the same as in the case of the Hokkaido Colonization Bank. There is also to be official supervision.

It is difficult to see how such institutions as the above can be expected to accomplish much. The Hokkaido Bank has certainly a great advantage. It receives from the Treasury a million yen upon which it need not pay any interest for ten years, and it will therefore be entitled to issue debentures to the extent of five million yen, even though the shareholders do not pay up a sen upon their shares. Any enterprise getting such a "send off" as that must be counted fortunate. But will the debentures find subscribers? They will have to carry at least 7 per cent. interest in order to attract buyers at present, and it is exceedingly doubtful whether money obtained on such terms can be profitably employed. In one branch of its business—the purchase of bills against Hokkaido produce—the Bank will come into direct competition with the Bank of Japan, which has a branch in Hokkaido, and a very unprofitable branch, if popular report does not err. As for the Movables Bank, its business seems to be of such a character as to fall within the legitimate sphere of the Bank of Industry and Agriculture, already existing. But that is a secondary consideration compared with the difficulty of attracting capital to an institution whose shares are guaranteed to the extent of only 5 per cent. There is nothing in such a prospect to tempt capitalists when 7 per cent. can be obtained by simply lodging money in perfectly safe banks, and when ten-per-cent. railway debentures are going a-begging.

BRAZIL.

A private letter, received in Tokyo and published by a vernacular journal, says that the financial affairs of Brazil are in a hopeless condition; that the attempts of the Rothschilds to restore order have proved fruitless, and that national bankruptcy is imminent. The writer attributes the closing of the Brazilian Legation in Tokyo to the impecuniosity of the Treasury in Rio, and adds that the prospects for Japanese immigration are most gloomy. Brazil's case is certainly peculiar. A magnificent country, 2,600 miles from north to south, 2,500 from east to west, with a sea-board of 3,700 miles; splendidly watered; abounding in the most valuable minerals; possessing immense tracts of forests whence inexhaustible supplies of mahogany, logwood, rosewood and so on can be obtained; capable of growing European fruits and grain crops as well as coffee, cotton, sugar, tobacco, cocoa and india-rubber; with nearly ten thousand miles of railways and a foreign trade of 720 million yen, it has nevertheless been unable for many years to achieve the essential feat of making its revenue cover its expenditures, and it has now a foreign debt of 350 million yen, and a domestic debt of 1570 millions. Considering that the population—if we exclude blacks and Indians—does not exceed 14 millions, it will be seen that the burden of debt is 137 yen per head. That would not be a crippling amount by any means if the finances were otherwise in order, but when a State spends every year 15 or 20 million yen more than it receives, its solvent survival must be a mere question of time. We have no information as to the causes that have contributed directly to bring about a crisis, but the general condition of the republic's finances is sufficient to account for the trouble. Brazil has certainly not been a success under republican management. She did better when the Pedros held the sceptre.

DISTRIBUTION OF KEROSENE.

Note is taken by the Shogyo Shimpo of the great British enterprise which has been quietly maturing during the past two years for the economical distribution of petroleum. The oil in question comes from the Caspian and Borneo. It is to arrive to Japan by tank-steamers of 8,000 tons, and be transferred to reservoirs at Yokohama and Kobe, the former being the centre of supply for the Kwantō districts and the latter the centre for the Kwansei. Arrangements have been made with the Japan Railway Company, the Government Railway Bureau, and the Sanyo Company, and 140 special cars for carrying the oil will soon arrive from England and be placed on these roads. It is a big affair, with a capital of a million sterling, the Japan section being only a fraction of the enterprise.

FOREIGN CHAMBERS OF COMMERCE AFTER THE OPERATION OF THE REVISED TREATIES.

It has been suggested journalistically that after the Revised Treaties go into operation difficulty will arise with regard to Chambers of Commerce organized by foreigners at the open ports. The point made is that Japanese law does not permit the existence of more than one Chamber of Commerce in an urban or prefectural district, and the Japanese Chambers, already duly constituted according to legal provisions, will necessarily have the preference. It is, perhaps, a little misleading to affirm that the law does not permit the existence of two chambers in one and the same district, for no explicit veto appears. There is, however, a provision to the effect that the limits of a chamber's purview shall be coterminous with those of the district in which it is established, and a second Chamber in the same district is thus inferentially forbidden. But this law has no effect so far as foreign Chambers are concerned. It is a public law, and its operation is consequently limited to Japanese subjects. Japanese Chambers of Commerce are elective bodies. Detailed regulations exist as to the qualifications of electors and candidates for election, as to the duration of office, as to the functions of a chamber, and so forth. In fact, a Japanese Chamber of Commerce is a quasi-official body, established in strict accordance with legal provisions and regularly sanctioned and recognised by the Government. Foreigners will not be qualified either to elect or to be elected, and there will be nothing whatever to prevent their having their own independent chamber just as they have at present. We understand that some intention is entertained of altering the law so as to enable foreigners to become, or to elect, members of Japanese Chambers of Commerce, if they are so minded, but the amendment is not likely to find its way to the Diet before the session of 1900-1. Meanwhile, and doubtless subsequently also, the foreign Chambers will remain precisely as they are at present—private associations without any official status whatever.

THE NATIONALIZATION LAW.

The result of the difference of opinion between the two Houses of the Diet with regard to the Law of Nationalization has been a compromise. The points in dispute were two. The Law, as drafted by the Government, provides, first, that a foreigner marrying into a Japanese family in the quality of nanfu—that is to say, taking the name of his wife, who is the head of the house—acquires Japanese nationality de facto; and, secondly, that a foreigner who obtains Japanese nationality shall be eligible for the post of Minister Plenipotentiary. The House of Representatives, animated by the peculiar spirit of self-assertion for which Japan is paying such a high price at present, cut out both of these provisions, and the House of Peers, which has always shown itself far more large-minded and statesmanlike, restored them both. Then followed a Conference, and it resulted in the inevitable compromise—inevitable because, had each side adhered obstinately to its views, the Bill must have been wrecked. The Lower House agreed to the ninpu clause, and the Upper consented to the elision of that relating to Ministers Plenipotentiary. Japan can not be congratulated on this Nationalization Bill. As the Government Delegate justly remarked, it stands conspicuous for illiberality among all cognate measures. If a foreigner who has obtained Japanese nationality serves the country of his adoption so well as to be within reach of an appointment as Minister Plenipotentiary, it might be supposed that his record would answer for his fidelity, and that the Cabinet appointing him would be qualified to estimate his trustworthiness. But the House of Representatives thinks it necessary to legislate against the possibility of the country's profiting by the services of a man of foreign blood. It is a very poor kind of timidity. It is true that we suffered from it ourselves in England, and that a fuller sense of self-respect came to us only 40 years ago. But those 40 years have sufficed to establish the safety of our methods, and the Japanese might take a leaf out of our book if they were not so romantically resolved to exercise the right of making blunders on their own account. The quaint part of the matter is that, while closing the post of Minister Plenipotentiary to nationalized foreigners, they have left open the posts of Ambassador and Chargé d'Affaires.

PRIVATE SCHOOLS AND CONSCRIPTION.

At last the question of not penalizing religious education has entered the field of practical politics. There is no feature of Japan's systems that does such discredit to her intelligence as her attempt to eliminate religion from the education of her youth. For that, and nothing less, is what it amounts to. No school where religious teaching forms part of the curriculum is allowed to complete the education of its students. They are liable to be removed for service in the Army as conscripts at the age of twenty, whereas, if religious teaching is entirely banished from the curriculum, the youths are safe against conscription until the age of 27, and can then escape by serving for one year. It follows, of course, that if a father sets the intellectual training of his son above the moral, he sends him to a school whence religion is banished; whereas if he thinks that the lad's morals are of any importance, he must sacrifice his general education. It is a cruel hardship, and the fact that the Japanese people tamely submit to it, speaks badly for their sense of right and justice. Indeed, such arbitrary discrimination can scarcely be reconciled with the Constitutional grant of freedom of conscience, for certainly conscience is not free when the exercise of freedom is heavily penalized. The matter has now been brought before the Diet in the form of a Representation signed by 41 members of the Lower House, among them being Mr. Shimada Saburo and Mr. Taguchi Ukichi. They advance the simple but unanswerable argument that the object of granting exemption from conscription is to enable students to complete their education, and that it has nothing whatever to do with religion. Religious teaching is very properly excluded from a school supported, wholly or partly, by taxes which all persons have to pay whatever their creed. But to say that a lad, solely because his parents happen to be religious, must be debarred from completing his education, though he receives it at a school supported entirely by voluntary contributions, is a pure absurdity. The Representation urges that provided a private school satisfies the official requirements with regard to its secular curriculum, its students shall be granted the same exemption from conscription as that enjoyed by students in public schools. We sincerely hope, not merely for the sake of Japan's moral health, but also for the sake of her reputation, that the House of Representatives will vote against this unhappy discrimination.

THE TONNAGE DUES BILL.

After a gallant fight the minority in the House of Peers has failed in its attempt to remodel the Tonnage Dues Bill on liberal lines. The Bill, as drafted by the Government, provides that a ship must pay 10 sen per ton (registered) on entering a Japanese port, and that the single payment of 30 sen shall clear the vessel for the space of one year in respect of the port where the payment is made. This the Special Committee of the Peers amended in the sense that, where a ship had to enter several Japanese ports, a payment of 20 sen should clear her for all during the period of 12 months. It will be seen at once that there is a very great difference. For example, one of the trans-Pacific steamers, which calls, every voyage, at Yokohama, Kobe, and Nagasaki, en route to and from Hongkong, would have to pay 30 sen per ton at each port, or 90 sen in all, according to the Government's Bill, in order to obtain a quitance for one year. That would mean a total payment of 2,700 yen in the case of a ship of 3,000 tons. On the other hand, the same vessel would escape with a payment of 600 yen if the system proposed by the Peers' Committee were adopted. The Bill has been for a long time in the hands of the Upper House. It was entrusted twice to a Special Committee, the latter's number being increased for the purpose of the second investigation. But the Committee persisted in recommending the above amendment. The majority of the House decided, however, to restore the Government's Bill in its entirety, and it now remains to be seen what will be the result of the conference that must be held with the Lower House, which also reduced the rates proposed by the Government. There will be a compromise, we presume.

SHAREHOLDERS.

We published in recent issues statements of the principal shareholders in the Japan Railway Company and the Taiko Railway Company. We add here the principal shareholders in the Bank of Japan, the shares of which have a face value of 200 yen and are selling for 355 yen in the market:—

NEWS FROM PARIS.

With reference to the news from Paris which we publish this morning, it may be well to explain that M. Deroulède, who has been repudiated by both sections of the royalists in France, is a deputy representing the Department of Charente. He has made himself conspicuous of late as President of the League of Patriots, who have for some time been conducting a very violent campaign against the Government, their platform being a revision of the Constitution. M. Deroulède was arrested during the disturbances which took place on the 23rd ultimo, but no explanation of the reason has yet been telegraphed.

The affair of the Court of Cassation is one of the unhappy incidents of the Dreyfus complication. The Criminal Chamber of the Court was suspected, apparently with some reason, of partiality towards the Dreyfusites. Hence the Chamber of Deputies, a few days ago, adopted a resolution that the case should be tried, not by the Criminal Chamber alone, but by the whole Court, that is to say, by all the Chambers united. The resolution had to be ratified by the Senate, of course, and it is to the latter's action that the telegram alludes. Nothing could be more regrettable than that the integrity of the highest tribunal in the land should be open to any question, but when we consider the dimensions this affair has assumed and the passions that have been roused, it is not at all surprising that even the Judges should be suspected of bias. The expedient of employing the whole strength of the Court seems, for the rest, decidedly commendable, for a decision which has the endorsement of the united Chambers will deprive even the most sceptical of room for doubt. It will be a matter for universal rejoicing when this wretched business finally ceases to be a source of disturbance. From one point of view, of course, it does honour to the French nation. Only among a people whose love of justice had been educated to a high standard could such an agitation have been fomented. But when we remember that Dreyfus was originally tried by a tribunal whose members, had they been disposed to lean in either direction, would have inclined to acquittal, and that Minister of War after Minister of War, five Ministers in succession, have examined the proofs of the man's guilt and have publicly ranged themselves on the side of conviction, it is impossible not to sympathise with the indignation felt against the Jews to whose money and efforts the agitation is mainly due. The nineteenth century closes with a very dark prospect for the Jews. In Russia, in Germany, and in France they are the objects of a feeling which threatens to repeat some of the incidents of mediæval history.

SHOOTING FATALITY ON A SAILING SHIP.

The captain of the British sailing ship Haddon Hall, from Beaufort, South Carolina, reports a fatality which occurred on board on January 14th in latitude 65 south and longitude 125 30 west. A boy named Harry Hartoch was handling a revolver when the weapon exploded, and killed instantly another lad named William Hughes. An enquiry was held on Friday morning at H.B.M.'s Consulate.

ENCOURAGEMENT OF NAVIGATION.

THE Government has submitted to the Diet a Bill making an important new departure in the system of navigation encouragement. The method inaugurated by the laws promulgated in March, 1896, is general in character. To make the matter quite clear it will be necessary to recapitulate the provisions of the present laws. The Navigation Encouragement Law enacts that any iron or steel steam-ship of at least 1000 tons (displacement), capable of steaming at 10 knots speed, and owned and employed by a Japanese subject on service between Japan and foreign countries, or on inter-port service in foreign countries, shall receive 25 sen per ton for every thousand miles run annually, provided that she is constructed in such a manner as to satisfy certain prescribed requirements; and provided, further, that, if built abroad, she is not more than five years old at the time of registration (for the purpose of obtaining a subsidy in Japan), or more than fifteen years old whenever built. With regard to vessels bigger and faster than the above minima, there is a sliding scale of encouragement money. Thus, for every additional 500 tons the subsidy is increased by 10 per cent., and for every additional knot of speed, by 20 per cent., up to 6,000 tons and 17 knots, after which limits there is no increase. The grant is not permanent, of course: it is paid in full for the first five years, after which it is reduced by 5 per cent. annually. Vessels receiving encouragement money are always to be at the service of the State in case of emergency. They are also required to carry mail matter and officials without charge, and they have to give free passage and suitable maintenance to students of navigation: two in each ship up to 2,500 tons; three up to 4,000 tons, and 4 in larger vessels. There is also a law for encouraging the construction of ships in Japan. It provides that any steel or iron steam-ship, of not less than 700 tons burden, built in a Japanese yard with materials not of foreign manufacture (unless specially permitted by the Minister of communications), shall be eligible for a bounty, on condition that her quality satisfies legal requirements, the rate of bounty being 12 yen per ton from 700 to 1,000 tons, and 20 yen per ton for larger vessels. Further, if her machinery is made in the same yard, or in some other Japanese yard approved by the Minister of Communications, she is entitled to a further bounty of 5 yen per unit of registered horse-power.

Evidently the tendency of this system is to encourage speculative ship-building. When it is known that a vessel satisfying certain conditions as to size, construction, and speed, will obtain from the Treasury an annual allowance sufficient to go far towards paying her working expenses, there is a great temptation to build her on the mere chance of finding for her a modicum of employment somewhere or other. Take the case of a 4,000 ton vessel with a maximum speed of 15 knots. Her encouragement money, according to the above scale, is 65 sen for every 1,000 miles run during the year. Hence if she is at sea for six months in the year, running 250 miles a day, the total distance covered is forty-five thousand miles, and her encouragement money amounts to 117,000 yen per annum. With such an income assured her owners can afford to place her upon a line where the transport business is in itself much too small to warrant any services of the kind. Possibly if the spirit of speculation had not been unduly excited by the war of 1894-5, these new laws would not have produced any undesirable results. But they are plainly based on a defective principle, the better advised plan being to grant subsidies for services which not only meet national needs, but also offer some prospect of becoming self-supporting. The Government's navigation aids are not, indeed, confined to the sums disbursed under the above laws. Various lines have to be independently subsidized. In order to give our readers a clear idea of the disbursements now made by the Treasury in this section of State expenditures, we proceed to collect the details, from the various chapters of the Budget for next year:—

AIDS TO NAVIGATION IN 1899-1900.
Services between Nemun and Ienup, Otsu and Hakodate, and Otsu and Ahashiro	15,000
Service to Ogasawara (formerly 6 voyages annually; now increased to 12)	11,000
Service between Ogasawara and neighbouring Islands	900
Service between Oki and Hoki	600
Service to Okinawa	5,000
Service to Oshima and Islands of Kagoshima	6,000
Service between Okinawa and neighbouring Islands	3,000
Service to Hokkaido	15,000
Subsidy to the Nippon Yusen Kaisha. Service to Australia	880,000
(This subsidy is now actually 525,657 yen , but a proposal to increase it will be submitted to the Diet and doubtless passed.)
Service to Bombay	192,108
Service to Vladivostok	27,717
Service to Korsakoff	23,490
Service to the Yangtze-Kiang	228,753
(This subsidy is now 249,547 yen , but a proposal to increase it is about to be made.)
Service to Shanghai, Suichow and Kiao-chow	30,179
Grants under the Law of Navigation Encouragement	3,968,084
Grants under the Law of Ship-building Encouragement	277,250
Total	6,309,738

This is a somewhat formidable list, but it will be observed that out of the total of 6 millions, in round numbers, the new laws are responsible for 4½ millions. We do not understand, however, that the Government is alarmed at the amount. The point is that the laws are not working satisfactorily, and that they commit the State too deeply unless some limit is enacted. It has therefore been decided to invite the Diet's consent to the imposition of two restrictions. The first is that in the case of ships constructed abroad and registered in Japan subsequently to the 1st of October, 1899, only one half of the encouragement money provided by the Law will be granted. The second is that the total period for granting assistance shall be eighteen years, counted from October 1st, 1896, when the laws went into force. The 1st of next October has been fixed in consideration of the fact that all vessels, ordered in consequence of the promulgation of the Law, will be completed and registered by that date. To change the Law so as to exclude such vessels would be an obvious injustice, whereas, on the other hand, it is evidently desirable to prevent the placing of any new orders. Briefly speaking, the effect of these amendments is, on the one hand, to make the Navigation-Encouragement Law's operation terminate in the year 1914, and to limit the State's maximum liabilities under it to approximately the sum now set down in the estimates. The Law for the Encouragement of Shipbuilding, moreover, is to remain operative as originally drafted. Thus far the expenditure that its provisions have imposed upon the State is not large, nor is it likely to be large, for some time to come at all events. Shipbuilding in Japan shows signs of fairly rapid development, but the number of vessels constructed in such a manner as to satisfy the requirements of the Law is insignificant. The most notable work was that last year completed at the Mitsui Bishi Docks in Nagasaki, when a six-thousand ton steamer was turned out for service on the Nippon Yusen Kaisha's European line. Although the Treasury must have paid encouragement money amounting to a hundred and thirty thousand yen, approximately, on account of this vessel, she proved a very heavy loss to her builders. They have another ship on the stocks now—the ship of which Lord CHARLES BERESFORD spoke so enthusiastically to the meeting in the Imperial Hotel, and it is possible that the bitter experience gained in the previous case may bring this second venture to a profitable issue. But there are not many firms in Japan wealthy enough to try experiments so costly as those essayed by the Mitsui Bishi, and no immediate prospect presents itself of the Treasury's being obliged to pay any large sum under the Ship-building Encouragement Law.

Simultaneously with restricting the operation of the law for the encouragement of navigation in general, the Government asks the Diet to sanction yearly subsidies to three special lines, namely:—

The Nippon Yusen Kaisha's Japan-Europe Line	2,673,894
The Nippon Yusen Kaisha's Japan-Seattle Line	654,030
Total	4,341,804

These subsidies are to commence from January 1st, 1900 and to continue until December 31st, 1909, namely, a period of 10 years. It is provided that the Nippon Yusen Kaisha must place upon its Japan-Europe line 12 steamers of at least 6,000 tons displacement, capable of steaming 14 knots; and on its Japan-Seattle line, 5 steamers of 6,000 tons and 15 knots; and that the Toyo Kisen Kaisha must place on its Japan-San-Francisco line, 3 steamers of 6,000 tons and 17 knots. The number of voyages is to be 26 a year, 13 a year, and 14 a year on the European, Seattle, and San-Franciscan Services, respectively; the vessels must not be more than 4 years old at the time of the commencement of the subsidy; they must satisfy the requirements of law as to quality; they must carry the mails; they must give free passage and maintenance to students of navigation, as provided in the Navigation Encouragement Law; and they must be placed at the disposal of the State in the event of a national emergency. If the Diet approves of these proposals, as seems probable, the total sums paid by the State from next year for the encouragement of navigation and ship-building will be 10½ million yen. We have always anticipated this increased call upon the Treasury. Reviewing Japan's post-bellum finance in 1897, we pointed out that three additions would have to be eventually made to her expenditures, namely, 13 millions for the maintenance of the Navy, 8 millions for Formosa, and 6 millions for the promotion of navigation. The forecast has proved correct, though the Government's figures differ from our estimates. The additional sum allowed for the Navy is 7½ millions; that for Formosa, 12 millions, and that for navigation and ship-building 8 millions, approximately.

There is one more point to which attention may be drawn. The Navigation Encouragement Law of 1896 contains a clause to the effect that in ships receiving the bounty foreigners must not be employed without the permission of the Minister of State for Home Affairs. No difficulty appears to have been experienced hitherto in obtaining permission, but we are glad to see that the clause is not repeated in the new enactment relating to special subsidies. Its omission is not of any practical value, since the vessels on the three newly subsidized lines are already in receipt of bounties under the law of 1896, and must therefore comply with its provisions. Still the disappearance of the restriction constitutes an agreeable feature.

Officials of the U. S. Treasury Department customs division have decided that books are the only articles subject to duty which can be legally imported into the United States in the mails. Books may be delivered upon the payment of customs charges. All other dutiable mail matter must be seized.

AN EMERGENCY FUND.

A VERY interesting measure has been proposed by the Japanese Government and is now awaiting the consent of the Diet. It is the formation of an emergency reserve (hijo jumbi) amounting to 50 million yen. When the various drafts to be made upon the Indemnity according to the post-bellum programme have been paid, there will remain a sum of 70 million yen approximately, 20 millions of which have been already voted as an addition to the Imperial Estate, and it is proposed to set aside the residue of 50 millions to constitute an emergency reserve. "Extraordinary reserve" would be a more accurate translation of the Japanese term, but in view of the purpose for which the greater part of the money is intended, the expression "emergency" seems to convey a juster idea. It is divided into three parts, namely, 30 millions for naval purposes, 10 millions for education, and 10 millions for natural calamities. These sums are not to be actually spent, however, unless a special occasion presents itself. Broadly speaking, the special occasion contemplated is of a national character; a war, in short. Should the country become involved in war, it will have 50 millions to pay its way at the outset. When the fight with China commenced, there happened to be about 60 million yen lying in the Treasury. Its presence there may, in a certain sense, be called a fortunate chance, for it consisted of accumulations of surplus revenue made during the preceding 9 years, a great part of which would have been already spent could the Diet and the Government have agreed as to the manner of spending it. Some twenty millions of the total had, indeed, been pledged on account of the construction of two line-of-battle ships and three cruisers, so that only 40 millions were really available for war purposes. But those 40 millions proved of immense service; so much so that the Government has evidently recognised the necessity of making similar provision against such an emergency hereafter. At present the yearly budgets of revenue and expenditure do not suggest any accumulation of surpluses. The record is rather in the opposite direction. Hence it becomes necessary to draw upon some other source, and the Government, instead of making any fruitless appeals to the Diet in behalf of a more liberal and far-seeing policy in the matter of taxes, simply asks it to decide that the residue of the Indemnity shall be set apart as above indicated. That is the general scheme of the arrangement. As to the division of the fund into the three headings of "naval," "educational," and "calamity relief," the explanation is a little more complicated. Our readers may remember that in reviewing the post-bellum finance last year, we commented on the fact that no provision for the maintenance of the Navy had been made in the official estimates for the decennial period 1897-1906. Japan contemplated the acquisition of 141,000 tons of battle-ships and first class armoured cruisers, 21,000 tons of second-class and third-class cruisers, and about 20,000 tons of torpedo craft, the value of the whole being 120 million yen approximately. Her fleet was to comprise, in addition to these, 48 fighting ships of various kinds, with an aggregate displacement of 117,000 tons. Thus the whole fleet may be classified thus:—

			yen.
New first-class fighting ships.....	12	141,000	98
New and old cruisers, gunboats, etc.....	—	117,000	45
Torpedo craft—3 gunboats, 1 depot-ship, 11 catchers and 115 boats —	—	20,000	8

It is usual to allow 4 per cent. for depreciation in the case of battleships and cruisers, and 9 per cent. in that of torpedo craft, together with an average of 2 per cent. on account of repairs. Calculating on that basis, the yearly appropriation for a fleet of the above dimensions would be 9½ million yen, approximately, for which, as we have said, no provision was made in the decennial programme elaborated by the Ito Cabinet after the war. One of the objects of the new emergency reserve is to correct that omission. The interest (1½ millions) on the naval portion (30 millions) is to be available, and will be supplemented by a sum of 6,660,000 yen taken yearly from the ordinary revenue. Thus the total annual maintenance fund will be 7,160,000 yen, which is nearly 2½ millions less than the amount of our calculation. We can not offer any exact explanation of the discrepancy, but it appears to be chiefly due to the fact that lower rates of depreciation are taken by the Japanese, namely, 3.9 per cent. for armoured vessels; 5.4 per cent. for unarmoured, and 6.5 per cent. for torpedo craft. A remarkable point is that the system of appropriating 6,660,000 yen every year from the ordinary revenue is not to commence until the fiscal year 1904-5. Whether it is imagined that, as the whole of the new vessels will not be finished until that time, or whether the hypothesis is that the interest on the emergency fund will suffice for present purposes, we do not know, but such is the arrangement. Most people will be disposed to think that as a ship begins to depreciate from the day she enters the water, the allowance should commence from that day, but the Japanese evidently take a different view; another fact of which we can offer no explanation, especially as they fix the lives of the vessels definitely at 25 years for an armoured ship, 18 for an unarmoured, and 15 for a torpedo craft. However, the main point is that provision is now at length made for the maintenance of the fleet.

It will probably occur to our readers to inquire on what grounds the Government can ask the Diet to vote an appropriation of 6,660,000 yen from the ordinary revenue six years hence, when, according to present estimates, the incomings of the State barely balance its outgoings. The answer is that, commencing from 1900-1, the revenue is expected to exceed the expenditures by a considerable amount.

The figures are these:—

Revenue, in mil- lions of yen ...	1900-1	1901-2	1902-3	1903-4	1904-5
Expenditures, in millions of yen	224½	223	214½	205½	203½
Difference...	201½	192	176½	165	162
	23	31	38½	40½	41½

From these surpluses, however, have to be deducted every year 12½ million yen on account of Formosa, 5 millions on account of the transfer of prison expenditures to the Treasury, and half a million as a relief fund. Making these subtractions, the net surpluses become, 5½ millions in 1900-1, 13½ in 1901-2, 30½ in 1902-3, and so on. Thus, if the estimate be correct, there need not be any difficulty in inaugurating, from 1904-5, a regular system of yearly appropriations, as indicated above, for the maintenance of the Navy.

The interest (500,000 yen) on the educational portion of the fund is to be chiefly devoted to improving the long-service pay of primary school teachers, and the interest on the natural calamity part will be employed to meet outlays connected with inundations, storms, earthquakes, and so forth. But behind these special purposes there is the main fact that the total capital of the fund is always to be kept intact so as to be available in the event of any national emergency. It will constitute, in short, a species of war chest. To that end clauses are inserted in the Bill, explicitly providing that if inroads have to be made upon the capital during any year, the deficit thus caused is to be restored as quickly as possible from the ordinary revenue, and, further, that whenever the interest is not required, it shall be added to the principal. The existence of this fund will greatly strengthen the country's financial position. It is evident, however, that in order to make the money produce interest, it must be invested and thus its availability in an emergency will be more or less impaired. The Bill provides that it shall be held in the Reserve Bureau of the Finance Department in the form of either bonds or gold, but we presume that it will certainly take the form of bonds, since as gold it would be unproductive.

The month of January was one of the busiest in the history of the Corporations Bureau of the New York Secretary of State's office. During the month 171 companies were incorporated and fourteen consolidations of companies already incorporated were effected. The capitalization of the companies incorporated was $28,436,000 and the amount of tax paid by these companies for the privilege of incorporating under the laws of the state was $3,554,575. The capital stock of the corporations consolidating was $37,000,000.

MONTHLY SUMMARY OF JAPANESE CURRENT LITERATURE.

As already stated in these columns, at the beginning of the year the Yomiuri Shimbun published a series of articles "Entitled Japan as seen by Foreign Eyes." The Yomiuri's statement and its criticism of Dr. Revon's views on religion in Japan were noticed in the Summary of the Religious Press which appeared a few weeks ago. On other subjects the Yomiuri quotes Dr. Revon as follows:—There is no doubt that Japan has always had a civilisation of her own, the peculiar characteristic of which was patriotism founded on respect for the throne. All the family life of the nation has culminated in the Emperor, who is regarded as the father of the people. In no other country in the world is solidarity of precisely the same kind to be found. The courage and warlike spirit which for many centuries characterised the nation were found in equal degree in other countries, but Japanese art certainly has distinctive characteristics. One that may be mentioned is the preference of Japanese artists for natural scenery as subjects for pictures rather than human passions and emotions. Japanese literature is interesting as showing what was the old type of civilisation in this country. Among the defects referred to by Dr. Revon are, the dishonesty of the lower class of traders, the limited influence of religion and the lack of the scientific spirit of inquiry. In her knowledge and adaptation of foreign civilisation, Japan is regarded by this critic as a beginner. She has the form of constitutional government, but not its spirit, says Dr. Revon. Western methods of warfare have attracted too much attention, and ways of obtaining wealth too little. In America women have too much power, but in Japan they have too little. These two countries represent the two extremes in respect of the position woman occupies. Japan should not abandon her own civilisation while utilising all that is valuable in the foreign system. There are many signs that she may become a great nation, but there is one great drawback to her progress, namely, the lack of money and consequent lack of the credit that is essential to real greatness. To enrich the country should be the one object of Japan's leading men.

The next foreigner quoted is a Russian writer, whose name we cannot identify in its Japonicised form. According to the Yomiuri he speaks in the highest terms of Japan's civilisation and says that the Russians are far behind the Japanese. "It is the habit," says this writer, "of the Japanese to regard Russia as their enemy. But this a great mistake. There are of course Russians who regret that on their exit in the Pacific they should be confronted by a Power like Japan, and who dislike the Japanese on this account. But general public opinion in Russia regards the island empire with friendly eyes, and now that the completion of the Siberian Railway is about to bring the two nations into closer relationship, it is important that they should study each other's language and show the world how little truth there is in the observation of an English newspaper which represented them as being no less friendly to each other than an ape is to a dog."

Dr. Christlieb's opinions are next quoted and briefly commented on. Dr. Christlieb is of opinion, says the Yomiuri

Shimbun, that in the learned world Japan occupies a back seat. Current Japanese literature is ephemeral literature. Magazine writing is an acknowledged enemy of book-writing. Those Japanese who have ventured to publish books on special subjects have not been criticised in a thorough manner, for two reasons: one being that the author usually writes on a subject which hardly anybody but himself among Japanese has studied minutely, the other that most foreigners are unable to understand the Japanese written language. Why do not men like Dr. Inouye Tetsujirō publish works in German or English, asks Dr. Christlieb. Is it because they fear foreign criticism? A book that a short time ago caused a good deal of stir when published, continues Dr. Christlieb, was not the work of the writer whose name was attached to it. This the author himself told me, though he did not wish it known to his fellow-countrymen. . . . Japanese patriotism is often nothing but narrow-mindedness, and is calculated to excite ridicule. . . . The Japanese boast that they can do in ten years what it takes foreigners 100 years to accomplish, but when we come to ask what they have done in the way of translating foreign works, we find it is very insignificant. Many of the translations that have been made show that the translators had not mastered the meaning of the original. As learners the Japanese are quick and eager, but when we come to regard them as teachers, we can no longer praise them. Many Japanese living in foreign countries, in order to represent their country as better than it actually is, say a great deal that is absolutely false. Dr. Christlieb furnishes instances of this. . . . Coming to politics, there is great insincerity on all hands. One party is loud in its profession of loyalty to the throne and boastfully refers everything to the Sovereign. The opposite party clamours for party cabinets, and would usurp the authority given to the Emperor by the Constitution. Politics everywhere are characterised by hypocrisy, but, in my belief, says Dr. Christlieb, there is no country that equals Japan for downright insincerity. Is it permitted for a professor of the Imperial University to criticise the alleged divine revelations published in the Kojiki? No. How then can it be said that the Japanese are free to investigate questions for themselves? While this lack of liberty even in the learned world exists, it cannot but appear to foreigners that all the existing political agitation savours of unreality. The persecution of Mr. Ozaki for supposed disrespect to the Emperor was entirely unworthy of a people claiming to be civilised and held the nation up to ridicule. We have chosen, says the Yomiuri, the unfavourable parts of Dr. Christlieb's criticism for reproduction, but do not mean to imply that he has nothing to say on the other side. He praises us for some things, but the value of his writing consists in the faithfulness with which he has delineated our many defects.

The writings of other foreigners are noticed by the Yomiuri, but space forbids our dwelling on the subject further.

No. 4 of the Tōajiron has an article on China entitled "Reform or Revolution?" by Mr. Ikebe Kichitarō, which gives the views of the late Count Katsu on the situation in the Far East. There is no need to fuss over the course that events are taking in China, says Count Katsui. It is good for China to have foreigners leasing territory, making railways, and expending capital on the development of her resources. What is taking place will prove to be the prelude to a revolution. Reform without a revolution is quite impossible. All the progress that China has made of late years has been owing to the help she has received from foreigners. Under the management of an Englishman her Customs' Service has been rendered a sure source of ever-increasing revenue. To expect the Chinese to inaugurate reforms unaided by foreigners is to expect the impossible. Abuses are only to be got rid of by giving aliens a free hand to tear down what is useless or decayed and raise on the ruins a new structure. China cannot do better than trust England and Japan and allow them to put her house in order before the completion of the Siberian railway brings Russia to her very doors.

The Telephone Exchange between Tōkyō and Osaka has been opened, but the difference in the meaning attached to many very common words in the two cities is said to be causing a good deal of amusement, as well as some embarrassment. The Fuji Shimpō publishes a list of some 24 familiar terms and phrases whose meaning is the same, but which differ from each other. We subjoin a few by way of illustration:—

Tōkyō.	Osaka.
Katte kuru	Kōta kuru
Karite kuru	Katte kuru
Bakarashii	Ahorashii
Yokoshite kudasai	Okoshite okunakare
Sōshite ne	Soi desu na
Butcham	Ponchi
Tōsan	Tōsan
O-hachi	O-hitau
Ashida	Taka-gata

A work bearing the title Rinrigaku Hihan, "The standard of Ethics," has been published by the Nihon Zusho Kaisha, Ginza, Tōkyō, which covers 1,050 pages and sells at 2 yen 50 sen per copy. It professes to be a translation of one of Professor Henry Sidgwick's books, but from the Japanese title it is impossible to tell of which. Professor Sidgwick has written a great deal on Ethics. His "Methods of Ethics" was published in 1874, his "Outlines of the History of Ethics" in 1886, and his "Practical Ethics" in 1898. It is stated that the author's permission has been given for the translation. Messrs Yamabe Tomoharu and Ota Hideo are the translators, Dr. Nakajima having revised the whole work.

A Biographical Dictionary called the Teikoku Jūmei Jisho will appear at the end of March, according to the announcement of the Tōkyō Zusho Shuppan Kaisha. It is to contain some 14,000 names, 600 illustrations, to cover 1,700 pages, and will be brought down to the end of last year. The names will be arranged alphabetically (iroha) and the subscription price of the book is 3 yen 75 sen.

The Nihon Heimin Shimbun is a new provincial newspaper published in Wakayama, Kii, which is praised by the Ritugō Zasshi as a high-class journal. It is connected with the Osaka Nihon-heimin Kyōkai. It gives great prominence to religion, philosophy, and sociology, and, like so many other publications, aims at regenerating society.

No. 11 of the Tenchijin has an interesting note entitled "Chōmin-Kōji no Bungakudan," "A talk on Literature by Mr. Nakaye Tokusuke," whose nom de plume is Chōmin-Kōji. Mr. Nakaye is noted for his unconventionalism and enterprise. He is never content to follow in the wake of others. His natural talents are such that he has touched few things that he has not adorned. We make one or two extracts from his narrative. "When Iwakura went to Europe, I accompanied him, settled in France, and commenced to study French. I have paid special attention to the French literature of the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Centuries. Among modern writers Hugo was one of my favourites. At first I found great difficulty in composing in French, but after a while it grew easy to me. But when I became a merchant I got rid of all my learned books with the exception of a few dictionaries and hence I grew inaccurate. Prior to becoming a trader I tried politics, but got disgusted with it. I seemed to do nothing but sow wheat and reap thorns. Political parties in Japan have no stability, because each member is seeking his own interests. One reason of the non-success of political parties is the poverty of members. It is in a large number of cases quite impossible to make a living out of the enunciation of certain principles, important though they may be. . . . What will be the future of Japanese literature and Japanese orthography? The question of adopting Rōmaji is again to the front, but I for one cannot see how it can be carried into practice. The inconveniences attending the total abolition of the characters would be enormous. Mr. Fukuzawa, Mr. Kuki, and others have advocated the diminution of the number of characters in use, but as a matter of fact they are increasing every day. We should find it far harder to get rid of our ideographs than Europe has found it to get rid of her Latin and Greek. Not only are the learned languages of Europe full of Latin and Greek words, but the colloquial of every civilised nation abounds with words of Greek or Latin origin. Newspapers like the Nippon and the Nichi Nichi Shimbun make the most elaborate use of Chinese characters still and the large majority of magazines and newspapers show no tendency whatever to rely less on the ideographs. I should say the tendency is all the other way."

Mr. Nakae is sometimes spoken of as the Japanese Rousseau on account of his originality of character and his ardent admiration for this great French iconoclast.

The Keikwa Nippō comments somewhat unfavourably on the methods of obtaining female life models adopted by the Tōkyō Bijutsu Gakkō. It seems that the school began by paying the girls who serve as models at the rate of 1 yen per hour. This price naturally seemed very high to the Japanese, and as a consequence a crowd of applications reached the school, which induced it to reduce the fee to 50 sen per hour, resulting in its getting quite a different class of women. At present, says the Keikwa Nippō, the girls who offer themselves have a history, but formerly there were applicants who were quite superior, but whom some family trouble had induced to choose this method of earning a little money. There is a humorous side to the affair, observes our contemporary. It often happens that when a painter is in the middle of a portrait he is informed that his model has been married and is not allowed to attend any more.

The Fūsoku Gwahō advocates the discontinuance of the use of the terms shisoku and heimin. In the 4th year of Meiji, when it was decided to forbid the wearing of swords by samurai, in order to console them for the loss of this and other privileges, the title shisoku was given to them, and they occupied a higher rank in society than the farmers, artisans and traders that constituted the heimin, or plebeian class; but since the operation of the Criminal Code the law has recognised no difference between the shisoku and the heimin, and in society generally no importance whatever is attached to the designation, nor do shisoku themselves think themselves the better for holding this rank. It seems quite evident then, concludes the Fūsoku Gwahō, that this remnant of feudalism should be abolished.

We find some valuable statistics in the Kyōiku Jiron bearing on the money spent on education in the chief European countries compared with the outlay in Japan, which shows most conclusively how far behind the Western world she is to-day in the matter of education. Comparing expenditure with population in England and Wales, Saxony, Switzerland, and one or two other states, the rate is about 2 yen 40 sen per annum for each inhabitant of these countries. In Holland it is 2 yen. Ireland, Belgium, France, and Baden stand next, with 1 yen 65 sen per annum, then comes Sweden, with 1 yen 20 sen, followed by Hungary, Italy, and other countries, where the rate is about 1 yen per inhabitant. But nowhere do we find anything so low as Japan's rate, which is about 30 sen. Coming to the proportion of State help given to local education, we find that France heads the list, the central government bearing nearly half the total cost of the maintenance of elementary schools. The following table, which we give as published in the Kyōiku Jiron, shows how the different countries stand as regards State expenditure on behalf of elementary education.

The following statistics bearing on education are culled from the Mombushō Annual report. The total number of foreigners in the employ of the Department in 1898 was 41: their salaries amounting to 136,800 yen; an increase of 3,200 yen on the previous year. Among libraries open to outsiders were 1 Government Library, 9 Public Libraries (that is, subscribed for by the public), and 21 that had been established by private individuals. The number of students who passed an Elementary School teachers was 1,520 of the First Class and 173 of the Second Class. The successful Candidates for posts in Middle, Normal, and Female High Class Schools numbered 977. The students attending Normal Schools throughout the country numbered 8,830; the students attending middle Schools, 52,671. There were 47 Normal Schools, 119 Middle Schools, 26 Higher Female Schools, with 6,799 pupils. The total number of students in Higher Schools was 4,436 and in the Imperial Universities 2,255. There were to private schools teaching Law, Economy and kindred subjects, and 5,111 students attending these schools. Coming to the proportion of children attending school compared with the total number which have reached the proper age for attendance, Nara Prefecture stands at the head of the list, with an average of over 80 per cent. Niigata ranges between 50 and 56. Hokkaidō is below 50. Okinawa Prefecture alone stands at about 40.

In our last Summary we noticed at some length the first part of an Essay of Dr. Inoue Tetsujirō, published in the Taiyō, on the tendency of philosophic thought in Japan. The concluding part of the essay is now before us. The gist of it can be stated in a few words. While admitting that the prevailing tendency of thought in Japan is in the direction of philosophy of a practical type, such as is taught and applied in England, Dr. Inoue thinks it is to be noted that the study of Buddhist metaphysics has in certain minds created a taste for a highly transcendental and spiritual type of philosophy such as has been developed in Germany. The similarity of German and Buddhist philosophy has not escaped the notice of Western scholars. Schopenhauer, for instance, specially emphasised this fact. While there is a close affinity between the two systems as regards their transcendental and spiritual character, Buddhist philosophy lacks the clearness and thoroughness of exposition that marks the treatises of men like Kant and Hegel. The fact that in Japan there still remains a certain amount of taste for metaphysics and an appreciation of the abstruse teaching of the Daijō (Mahayana), prevents the Japanese philosopher from regarding German speculation with the repugnance which is felt for it in England by a large class of thinkers, says Dr. Inoue. The vigour with which Dr. Inoue Enryō has assailed materialism indicates that there is a school among our thinkers which shrinks from going the lengths to which a purely practical and experimental philosophy is apt to carry those who rely exclusively on its teaching. They see that a counterpoise to prevailing materialistic thought is needed, and they look to Buddhist or German philosophy to supply this need. Speaking of the future, Dr. Inoue Tetsujirō thinks that Japan is likely to steer a middle course between German transcendentalism and English experimentalism. Dr. Inoue is invariably optimistic when writing of the future of Japan. He has of late years become an ardent nationalist and he devotes all his learning to the furtherance of the cause known as Nippon Shugi.

A somewhat lengthy article appears in the Teikoku Bungaku from the pen of Mr. Takei Teishinō, which dwells upon the enormous difficulties connected with the adoption of Western civilisation in Japan and the enlightenment of the masses. Mr. Takei, in rather despondent tones, emphasises the fact to which so many writers draw attention, namely, that Western teaching and methods are only familiar to a very small fraction of the nation and that all the attempts made to reach the remainder are miserably inadequate. There is no lack of ideas as to what is required, but the money to carry them out is wanting. Diet after Diet is appealed to in vain. Long years of bitter experience of the inefficiency and lethargy of the Department of Education have convinced many that it is useless to look for help from that quarter. Mr. Takei is in favour of appealing to the Imperial Household Department and of endeavouring through it to induce the Emperor to interfere. Why, asks Mr. Takei, should not a body like the Gakushūkaiin, which accomplishes next to nothing, be set to work at translation under the patronage of the Emperor? . . . It has become the custom to choose scholars to fill offices where there is much routine to be gone through and for which no scholarship is required. Highly trained men should be kept for work which they are better qualified to do than any one else and official vacancies should be filled from other ranks. There is any amount of intellectual work to be done, and there are not wanting a fair number of men qualified to do it, but there exists no organisation that makes it an object to collect and utilise for the good of the nation the numerous forces available.

The Teikoku Bungaku, which, as a literary organ, since the decease of the Waseda Bungaku, has had no rival, follows its usual custom in publishing, in its January number, a review of the literature, art, religion, &c. of the past year, which covers no less than 37 pages. We give in an epitomised form the substance of this review, taking the headings as we find them in the Teikoku Bungaku.

I. PHILOSOPHY.—The movement known as the Nippon Shugi, which dates from the year 1897, though not causing such a stir as it did that year, has still a good deal of life in it. One section of the Nippon Shugi party has started a paper known as the Keikwa Shinbun, which advocates absolute monarchy and suggests that the Constitution might with advantage be abolished. . . . Among Literary post-graduates of the University a very large number have devoted special attention to philosophical questions of a practical kind. At the Imperial University, Dr. Motora has been lecturing on the "Psychology of Society;" Dr. Nakajima on "Our Existence in the World" (人世論 Jinseiron). A society has been established called the Shakai-gak-kenkyūkai (Sociological Investigation Society), whose membership is large and whose meetings are well attended. . . . No new or striking opinions on philosophy have been expressed during the year. The two philosophical organs, the Tetsugaku Zasshi and the Tōyōtetsugaku Zasshi, have both fallen off, but the latter is quite inferior to the Tetsugaku Zasshi.

II. EDUCATION.—In the latter part of the year there was a marked revival of interest in education. The defects of our system, the laxity of morals among students, and a variety of other subjects connected with schools and their maintenance were earnestly discussed in newspapers and magazines.

III. RELIGION.—The three great topics of interest under this heading were the Dōshisha affair, the departure of the Otani brothers on an evangelistic tour in foreign lands, and the question of the rights of religious sects in prisons. But all of these may be designated surface topics. None of them impressed the public with the notion that deep faith exists among those who figured conspicuously in the discussion of the questions at issue. The general feeling is that what is needed in the religious world is more real conviction and less agitation about non-essentials.

IV. FICTION.—In 1896 the rage for writing and reading fiction may be said to have been at its highest point. Since then it has steadily declined. The number of magazines that opened their pages to novel writers which have ceased to be published during the year is quite abnormal. Among well-known novelists Messrs. Shōyō (Tsubouchi), Ogai (Mori) Ryōku-u (Saitō) have written nothing, and Messrs. Kōyō (Ozaki), and Rohan (Kōda) have only contributed a few scraps to newspapers or magazines.

V. LANGUAGE.—No progress can be reported beyond the formation of a society called the Kokuji Kairyōkai and the appearance of a few articles discussing methods of reform. The sum of money which the Mombushō proposed to devote to the institution of a thorough investigation of this subject was ruthlessly struck out of the Budget by the House of Representatives.

VI. NEW STYLE VERSES.—In 1897 the popularity of this class of poetry was at its zenith. But last year it became apparent that among all the writers who had tried their hands at this style of composition there were two, Tōson and Bunsui, who had no compeers. They have won a reputation that is likely to last.

VII. TRANSLATION.—Under this heading we have to record with much regret the retirement from the field of literature of Mr. Tsubouchi, who as a translator of poetry has few if any equals. His rendering of "Hamlet," which gave so much pleasure to the readers of the Waseda Bungaku, has been left unfinished. In our opinion, for real charm of style and powerful rendering of the spirit of the original, Futabatei's Oyagokoro has no equal. Among translations worthy of mention are Mr. Doi Bunsui's translation of Carlyle's "Heroes and Hero Worship," Mr. Azevagi Totarō's translation of an Italian work on "Genius," Mr. Anezaki Masaharu's Shūkyō Tetsugaku (Hartman's) and Mr. Fujii Uhei's translation of Spencer's "First Principles of the Synthetic Philosophy." Though these works are not without their imperfections, they are of the class that the country needs and on the whole have been very carefully done.

VIII. THE STAGE.—It would be hard to find anything more unprogressive than the Japanese stage at the present time. The most accomplished actors all have an aversion to new dramas. Men of the Kawakami type lack the histrionic ability to put new plays on the stage in a taking manner. Though writers like Messrs. Fukuchi and Tsubouchi have taken great pains in penning dramas that suit the age in which we live, there is no theatre in Japan where competent actors are ready to give them a trial. The one ray of sunshine in the midst of universal gloom proceeds from the Awoba-kai, a Society that is bent on bringing about a reform if such be possible.

IX. CHINESE STUDY AND SCHOLARSHIP.—By the death of Dr. Shimada Jūrei, Japan has lost one of her greatest Chinese scholars. There is little life anywhere among learned men of this type. The Tōa-gakkai has been dissolved. The Shibun-gakkai is asleep. Of Chinese verses none have appeared worthy of praise.

X. HAIKAI.—(Comic verses consisting of 17 syllables). Great diligence has been shown in collecting specimens of this class of literature by the Hakubun-kan and other firms, but the activity in this line is far greater in the provinces than in the metropolis. In some provincial towns the interest in this style of poetry is quite remarkable.

XI. HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY.—Two festivals were held during the year which revived the memory of two great men; one was in honour of the Taikō and the other in honour of the founder of the Ikkō Shū, Etō-daishi. This would have been a favourable time for publishing new lives of the two heroes. But nothing was done. Though in quantity the historical and biographical works issued fall short of previous years, in quality they are pronounced by good judges to be superior.

XII. FINE ART.—Leading artists seem to have followed in the wake of modern politicians and become factious in the extreme. The most violent dissension has been witnessed during the past months among schools of painting. Industrial art and sculpture alone seem to be making solid progress. The conflict between the old and new schools of art is a severe one. Until last year the advocates of radical reform were assisted by the Government, but as a result of a good deal of plotting and underhand work this support was withdrawn. . . . One fact worth recording is the revival of interest in those sketches known as Ukiyo-ye. Such artists as Messrs. Gekkō, Toshikata, and Eisen are making a speciality of this class of art.

XIV. MUSIC.—Though numerous concerts were given in Tōkyō during the year, it cannot be said that anything like a general interest in music has been awakened. The press notices of the efforts of amateurs and professors show little real discernment and usually consist of a string of laudatory epithets. Though the Meiji Ongaku Kai has the support of a large number of influential people, their concerts cannot be pronounced a success. As a step towards making music a general study, the creation of branches of the Tōkyō Ongaku Gakkō is to be mentioned. Then as a means of bringing music to the notice of the public at large the article of Mr. Sakabe Kōzaburō in the Taiyō (November Number) on the "Inefficiency of the School of Music," (at Ueno), and the trenchant reply and subsequent defence which it called forth in the columns of the Yomiuri Shimbun, are worthy of notice. Japanese music seems to have lost all its charm for the people and to be about to become extinct (Nihon no ongaku wa masani taoren to su.) which we have given the gist makes gloomy reading, being rather a record of what should be done than of what has been done. The year, 1898, however, cannot but be regarded as a period of literary stagnation in Japan compared with previous years, the reasons for which have been several times minutely discussed by writers whose opinions have been stated in these columns, and hence there is a real cause for the pessimistic tone of the Teikoku Bungaku's review.

THE BOOKSHELF.

The New Far East, by ARTHUR DIÓSY; London, Messrs. Cassell and Company, Limited.

MR. ARTHUR DIÓSY's name is very familiar to Englishmen resident in Japan. We know him chiefly on account of his connexion with the Japan Society of London. He was one of that flourishing institution's founders and he has been one of its most active mainstays and most valuable contributors. Yet we have never been quite sure about his nationality. Excellent and numerous reasons as there are for believing him to be English, the accented ō in his name has always been a source of doubt. It is interesting, therefore, to learn from the preface of his new work that Britain is his "native country." We learn, also, from the pages of the same work that he has travelled much, acquired several languages, and studied many peoples at first hand. He has a remarkable acquaintance with things Japanese, but it is probably not a very profound acquaintance, for in interpreting a legend written by Professor Takahashi in hiragana on the cover of "The New Far East," he tells us that it reads, Shin Kioku To. It does not read anything of the kind, however. Professor Takahashi was not at all likely to be guilty of the solecism of using hiragana to indite a purely Sinitic-Japanese title. What he has written is Arata naru kigashi no hate. There are other indications that the language of Japan has not received very earnest attention from Mr. Diósy, but there are also numerous indications that he has keenly studied the habits of her people, the changes the nation has undergone during the past forty years, its present condition, and the prospects that lie before it. The impressions we derive from a careful reading of Mr. Diósy's capital book are that he set before himself two objects in compiling it; first, to convey to the average Englishman an intelligent and favourable idea of the Japanese people; secondly, to convince the British politician that the potentialities of Russia's advance in the Far East demand a much larger share of attention than they receive, and deserve a far greater effort of resistance than they provoke. In the former object he seems to have succeeded very well. The case that he makes out for the Japanese is at once strong and impartial, though we venture to predict that some of his remarks will expose him to no little criticism at the hands of the local English press in Japan. In our opinion his analysis of the causes underlying the adverse comments to which the Japanese used to be so freely and persistently subjected by foreign writers resident in this country, is incomplete. He appears to think that the hostility of the critics was inspired originally, and has been fomented mainly, by the too lavish encomiums of Japan's panegyrista. That is an explanation which the detractors themselves are very fond of advancing on their own behalf. But it has not the slightest value in the face of historical facts. For from the very beginning of Western relations with this country the columns of the local foreign press were disfigured by bitter prejudice and contemptuous condemnation. There were no flatterers in those days against whom a fine regard for truth impelled onlookers to raise their voices. The critics had the field entirely to themselves, and they displayed just as much bias and rancour when they preached from texts of their own imagining as they ever showed subsequently in traversing the themes of too enthusiastic eulogists. However, those days of abuse seem to be over. Only, in writing their epitaph, we should be inclined to ascribe to the cynics worthier and less ludicrous motives than they claim for themselves when they plead that, though friendly at heart to the Japanese people, they can not endure to hear them praised.

Concerning Mr. Diósy's views about Russia, while fully admitting that destiny is driving her forward towards Japan and China with constantly increasing force, we can not for an instant endorse the extremely unfavourable comparisons that he draws between British and Russian diplomacy in the East. He appears to suffer from the common tendency to invest with magnificent attributes everything unknown. It may be mere extravagance of language to allege that Japan's first successes in the war with China gave a sort of sunstroke to all the statesmen in Europe "except to the ice-cool heads in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs on the bank of the Neva," but it is a very grave misrepresentation to write as follows:—

The men who work for Russia in the Far East enjoy advantages over their colleagues of other nations—and especially over their British antagonists—that spring from racial causes. The educated Russian is an excellent linguist. I lay stress on the word "educated," because it is a common fallacy that all Russians speak several languages. In comparison with the vast population of the Empire, the linguists are few, but they excel in the languages they acquire. Not only do they learn the tongues of the Far East with greater facility, and speak them more fluently, and with a far better pronunciation and intonation, than Britons, who seldom lose their insular inflections—I know Englishmen who, after a residence of years in Osaka, persist in calling it "Osahka," or even "Osahker"—but they have the inestimable advantage of being able to learn the languages before proceeding to the Far East, in the excellent practical School the Russian Government maintains for the purpose. France, Germany, Italy, the Netherlands, even Austria-Hungary, all possess special Schools for the same purpose. Britain does not. Comment is superfluous.

Could anything be more misleading? It is possible that the average Russian diplomatist knows more of European languages than his British colleague, for, as a matter of absolute necessity, he has to acquire some language besides his own in order to get on at all. But the question here is not of European languages: it is of Far-Eastern languages; the languages of Japan and China; and in the field of Far-Eastern languages, the members of the British service are miles ahead of the Russian. No one will be readier to admit the fact than the Russians themselves. Consider, for example, the Russian Legation in Tokyo. During the past thirty years it has had one, and only one, competent Japanese scholar, and his services were lost to it a short time ago. How many distinguished Sinologues have belonged to the staff of the British Legation during that long era? Surely it is unnecessary to enumerate them. If we pass to the Chefs de Mission themselves, the only one that has ever been a master, or even an earnest student, of the Japanese language is the present British Minister, and he stands first among all the Sino-logues of the century. The record for China is similar. Since the opening of her intercourse with the West there have been two and only two European Representatives who could converse with a Chinese official in the Chinese language, and they were British Ministers, Sir Thomas Wade and Sir Harry Parkes. Moreover, for every one Russian scholar of Chinese, we venture to say that there have been at least ten British. By whom have Japan and China been made known to the world? But truly the matter is not worthy of further discussion. Mr. Diósy, keen as is his observation and accurate as are his analyses of things Far-Eastern in general, has been completely misled at this point. His admiration for Russian diplomacy is almost emotional. He would have us believe that her exit from the Korean stage in 1898 was a fine stroke of statesmanship; a wise concession calculated to secure a return much larger than the effort of self-restraint it entailed. Well, we can only say that if the intention was so astute and far-seeing, the method of carrying it out belongs to a very much lower grade of conception. And we may add that though Mr. Diósy admires the incident Russia herself has never displayed any symptoms of admiration. On the contrary, the chief actor in the drama has disappeared from the diplomatic horizon. If his country owes him gratitude, she has taken a very singular method of evincing the sentiment. We folks in the Far-East, who have the opportunity of seeing Far-Eastern things more closely, formed a different estimate of the Russian evacuation of Söul in 1898, and as to endorsing another view stated elsewhere by Mr. Diósy—a view not altogether consistent with his previous estimate of the same incident—namely, that it was “a great victory obtained by Japan over Russia without firing a shot,” or, at least, that it “must appear so in the eyes of the East,” we are again compelled to disagree in toto. Certainly Japanese statesmen do not hold that theory, nor has the Japanese nation ever been betrayed into any display of exultation. Russian diplomacy, as every one must frankly admit, has a great advantage over British diplomacy, but the difference is due to causes which we should be very sorry to see inoperative in England, even though their removal did more than redress the balance. The wider aspect of the problem, from Mr. Diósy's point of view, is that Russia's ambition—her deliberately conceived and strongly held ambition—is to “rule, in the first place, over China; absolutely” (the italics are his own) “over Manchuria, Mongolia, and Northern China proper; then over Chinese Turkestan as far as the Pamir tableland; indirectly over the whole of China.” That is a large programme. Yet, who shall say that it is exaggerated? “To be the mistress of three-fourths of Asia, together with her partner France” is an ambition which might well fire Russian imagination. And England in India has set the example. It is futile to attempt the discussion of such questions within the limits of a newspaper article. We refer our readers to Mr. Diósy's volume, which is certainly one of the most interesting and suggestive works yet published about the Far East, though in his preface he modestly tells us that it “is not intended for the expert,” having been “written for the many who, knowing a little about the Far East, are anxious to know more.”

Before parting company with our author, we may refer to one among the many minor points which seem to invite comment. He has a great deal to say about Port Arthur, and, inter alia, he refers to “The China-Japan War,” by “Vladimir.” That volume, accurately as it describes the course of the various campaigns, makes not the slightest allusion to the excesses committed at Port Arthur, and Mr. Diósy, assuming that the work, “if not officially inspired by the Japanese Government, was at all events written by some one in close touch with it,” describes its silence about the Port Arthur affair as “a final and grave blunder committed by the Japanese Government.” Now who is “Vladimir” and how can it be asserted that he compiled his book under official direction or at official inspiration? In reviewing the work, we ourselves attributed it to a Japanese, but our inference drew from the publishers a written denial that such was the author's nationality. At no time, however, had we imagined that the work was compiled under official auspices. Whatever may have been “Vladimir's” idea in omitting all mention of the Port Arthur reproach, it seems exceedingly unjust and precipitate to conclude that his silence was dictated by the Japanese Government. Mr. Diósy's evident impression is that the Japanese Government carefully and most unwisely abstained from all admission of the incident and from conveying any reproach to the responsible General. Is he, then, ignorant of the despatch addressed by Count Mutsu to Washington, and can he explain why General Yamaji did not take part in the Wei-hai wei campaign, as was certainly his right from a purely military point of view, and as it had been originally intended that he should? But we have already exceeded our limit of space. We take leave of Mr. Diósy's interesting and brightly written work with a very full expression of appreciation.

Domitia, by S. Baring-Gould. London, Methuen; Yokohama, Messrs. Kelly & Walsh, Ltd.

METHUEN have just brought out, in their red backed Colonial Library, “Domitia,” the Rev. S. Baring-Gould's stirring story of Roman life. In a short preface the author takes the reader into his confidence regarding the making of the book. It seems that during the winter of 1890, Mr. Baring-Gould visited Rome and Florence to gather materials for his “Tragedy of the Cæsars,” and while engaged in this work came across the marble bust of Domitia Longina, which adorns the Chiaramonte Gallery. The beautiful face exerted a wonderful influence upon him, and later when he saw another bust of Domitia in the Capitoline Gallery, representing the Roman Empress in the years when she shared the purple with the tigerish Domitian, he was irresistibly drawn into studying her life-tragedy, and this in time brought him to a third bust—taken in the evening of her days—which is to be found in the Florence Gallery. Reproductions of the three busts are given in the volume and enhance it considerably.

Baring-Gould has ever interesting matter to descant upon, but the critic of his writings often wishes that he would take a little more pains with his composition. Here and there traces of the sloven appear and frequently mar an otherwise readable page. In “Domitia,” too, the schoolmaster, is very apparent, particularly in the opening chapters. Perhaps it is inseparable from the style of the narrative: to bring the details of courtly Roman life more vividly before the reader it may be necessary to go into explanations of customs, articles of apparel, or household use, fashionable crazes, etc., after the manner of a third standard text-book: but it is tiresome reading at times and productive of irritation rather than entertainment.

But to the story. Domitia Longina was the only child of Cæsus Domitus Corbulo, a distinguished Roman General, who, incurring the suspicion of Nero, owing to his successes in Syria, was commanded to commit suicide while on his way home to Italy. This terrible event turns a young girl of 16 into a thoughtful woman almost at one stroke; it has a different effect upon her mother, a woman of baser metal and lower ideals. As the years go by, Domitia is engaged to Lucius Ælius Lamia, a young patrician who had won her father's esteem during his last Pro-Consulship. The day of their marriage arrives; all goes happily, and the beautiful bride reaches her husband's home, when she is forcibly carried off by Domitian Cæsar, who had fallen in love with her during visits to her mother's house. This was some years before Domitian ascended the throne, but the power of his family—the Flavian Cæsars—protected him, and Lamia had to give up his bride. But Domitia refused to love her Imperial husband, and the story of her stormy life with the Cæsar occupies the rest of the book. Life in old Rome between the downfall of Nero and the death of Domitian must have been very exciting; more especially for those of high station. Murder stalked abroad in the full light of day, wrongs unutterable were perpetrated with impunity; it was a cruel world and a dangerous, for patrician and plebeian alike. But it was infinitely more cruel in the treatment of its womankind. A sad, grey outlook they had upon life, intellectually and morally. The old mythologies had long lost all hold upon the minds of men and women, and the light that had arisen in Galilee was as yet too feeble to reach far beyond the immediate circle of the Apostles. But it had begun to shine, and here and there little colonies of Christians were to be found in Asia Minor, Greece, and Italy. Domitia in the course of her sad earthly pilgrimage comes in contact with St. Luke, the good physician, and eventually with Flavia Domitilla, the first of the great dames of Rome who boldly professed allegiance to the Christ: and through her the much-tortured soul reaches “the Light, the glorious Light.”

As we said above, “Domitia” is a stirring tale, and, we think, will well repay the time spent in its perusal. The novelist, of course, claims the privilege of his cloth, to hasten or retard events to suit the convenience of his narrative, but on the whole Baring-Gould has kept to the main road of history fairly well. As a picture of Imperial Rome at the beginning of its decline the book is, perhaps, hardly of much value, but as a novel it is very interesting.

IMPERIAL DIET.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 24TH.

HOUSE OF PEERS.

The House met at 10 30 a.m.

SPEECH BY THE MINISTER PRESIDENT.

His Excellency Marquis Yamagata briefly addressed the House. It had been, he said, a paramount object with the Government to obtain the consent of the Diet to measures such as would place the finances of the empire on a sound footing, and he desired, on behalf of the Cabinet, to express hearty satisfaction that measures of increased taxation necessary to that end had been passed by both Houses. Various Bills embodying projects of law for dealing with the altered state of affairs that would be inaugurated when the Revised Treaties went into force, had also been presented. “The country had to congratulate itself most sincerely on the fortunate fact that it was about to witness the operation of the new Intention, which the whole nation had earnestly desired for the long space of 30 years (sanjūnen no nagai arida kokka wo agete mitsubito seshi shin joyaku mo kōnichi jissai wo min to suru wa kokka no tame keta no itari). Henceforth it would only be necessary, while seeking to advance the interests legitimately accruing to the country, to pay due respect to the rights of foreigners, and endeavour to promote the mutual advantage of both sides." His Excellency then alluded to the reform of the system of Local Government. The present system had been promulgated during his former tenure of office as Premier. It had necessarily been of a somewhat tentative character, and experience had indicated many points calling for amendment. These had been embodied in a project of law which had received the consent of the Lower House, and he trusted that it would be equally fortunate in its treatment by the Peers.

BANK OF JAPAN TAX.

Viscount Soga having reported the result of the Conference between the Houses with reference to the Bill for taxing the Bank of Japan; and the Bills (sent up from the Representatives) for amending the Local Government system having been handed to a Special Committee, the Committee's report was received on the Bill for rendering assistance in the arrest and detention of seamen refugees from foreign men-of-war. The report was favourable and the Bill was passed without debate.

COMMITTEE WORK.

The following measures were then handed to Special Committees:—

Bill (sent up from the Lower House) for eliminating fractions of a sen from the State accounts of land assessment and land tax.

Bill (sent up from the Lower House) for abolishing the tax on marine products in Hokkaido.

With regard to this measure the Government Delegate explained that the administration of Hokkaido was on a system different from that applied to other parts of the empire. All the expenditures involved in managing its affairs were disbursed by the Treasury, and the imposition of a special tax was therefore a reasonable and proper measure. The sum affected by the Bill was 360,000 yen, and in the present state of the finances no surplus revenue was available to cover such a reduction.

Bill (sent up from the Lower House) for the Regulation of Fertilizers.

Bill (private) for the establishment of a Colonial Bank in Hokkaido.

REPRESENTATIONS.

Two Representations, one advocating that the fifth national exhibition be held in Osaka, the other that it be held in Tokyo, were put back, on the motion of Mr. Morita, who then introduced a Representation urging that the fisheries section of the exhibition be made international. This measure was handed to a special Committee.

Two Representations were adopted; one suggesting that steps be taken for the artificial propagation of salmon and masu, as these important fish threatened to become scarce; the other urging that a measure of State aid be given to the Take Shrine in Hiroshima, which marked the site of the Emperor Jimmu's headquarters in his expedition against Yamato.

The House rose at 12.10 p.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House met at 1.10 p.m.

FORMOSA.

The Government's Answer to Questions submitted with reference to Formosa was read. Its chief points were:—(1) That, having due regard to friendly relations, it was the Government's intention to maintain the rights accruing to Japan, whether under treaty provisions or by international law, on the mainland opposite to Formosa. (2) That no such policy as that of driving law-abiding folks to take up their residence in disturbed districts, was pursued or contemplated. (3) That the temporary use of certain shrines for barrack purposes had been unavoidable, but that steps were being taken with all possible expedition to dispense with such expedients. (4) That the question of inspecting weights and measures was now under consideration. (5) That in localities where the people were unable to defray the cost of education, it would be borne by the Treasury. (6) That a policy of mingled clemency and severity would be pursued towards the bandits.

Information having been asked with regard to the settled accounts of the War of 1894-5, the Chairman of the Settled Accounts Committee explained that the Committee had not received even the settled accounts for 1896-7 until the 16th instant, and had not seen any possibility of examining those for the War within the period of the session. They thought of moving that a Continuing Committee be appointed for the purpose.

NEW BILLS.

The Government Bill for establishing a credit mobilier was then read and handed to a Special Committee.

The Government Bill for granting the right of appeal from Formosan tribunals to the Court of Cassation in Tokyo, as well as the Bill for amending the Registration Law, were passed without debate, and a Bill (Government) was then read providing that the public rights accruing from the payment of income tax shall not be lost in the case of individuals whose income, being derived from enterprises carried on by judicial persons, and therefore taxed while still in the latter's possession, are not taxable a second time in the category of private incomes, and consequently, under the present system, do not confer on their owners the rights usually derived from the payment of income tax.

Two Government Bills for the better regulation of ships and ship's crews were handed to a Special Committee, and the second reading of a Bill sent down from the Peers for the reclassification of urban building lands was then taken. This Bill led to some discussion, especially on the ground that the Government, while endorsing it and showing a strong desire to have it passed, had left it to be introduced by members of the Upper House. The gist of the Bill is that whereas urban building land has to pay a tax of 5 per cent. under the new system, some of the lands now classed as "urban building lands" have long ceased to deserve that designation, and it would therefore be a great hardship to impose the high rate of tax on them. The Bill was finally passed.

PRIVATE BILLS.

With regard to the Bill (private) for restoring the pensions of persons convicted of political offences and subsequently amnestied, the Government Delegate declared that the Government could not give its consent, but the House nevertheless passed the Bill by a vote of 77 to 36, a signed ballot having been taken.

The Second Reading was voted of the private Bill for establishing credit associations. The name of this measure is misleading, for its real purpose is to provide that men with small capital shall combine in order to be able to make wholesale purchases of grain, fertilizers, raw materials, and so on.

The House, having dealt with various petitions, rose at 3.30 p.m.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 25TH.

HOUSE OF PEERS.

The House met at 10.20 a.m.

INDemnITY APPROPRIATIONS.

Three Government Bills were read and handed to a Special Committee. They provided for the appropriation of a sum of 50 million yen, the residue of the War Indemnity, to form three capital funds; namely, 10 millions for education; 30 millions for the maintenance of the Navy; and 10 millions for the relief of natural calamities. Under normal circumstances, the interest alone of these monies is to be available for the purposes indicated, but in case of emergency the principal may be employed, provided that any such encroachment on the principal shall be subsequently made good by drafts from the Ordinary Revenue, so that the capital fund will be kept always intact.

In answer to questions, the Government Delegate explained that the money designed for educational purposes would be employed chiefly to augment the salaries and allowances of primary school teachers who had served long and well, the object being to improve the status of the teacher and attract good men. There was no intention of augmenting the fund from the proceeds of sales of State forests or moors, but voluntary contributions might be added to it with the Diet's consent. The time for putting the proposed system into operation would be fixed by Notification.

THE LAW OF ELECTION.

The first reading of the Bill (sent up from the Lower House) for amending the Law of Election, elicited from the Government Delegate a declaration that the Government could not give its consent to the changes effected by the Lower House in adopting signed ballots and scrutin de liste, and in giving 3 additional members to Hokkaido.

The Bill was handed to a Special Committee, were four Supplementary Budgets for 1899-00. With regard to one of these, which relates to the Iron Foundry, the Government Delegate explained that the present idea was to obtain supplies of iron from the Iwate mines, but other sources were also under investigation.

NATIONALIZATION.

The Special Committee which had been appointed to report upon the amendments made by the Lower House in the Law of Nationalization, announced a unanimous decision against closing the office of Minister Plenipotentiary to naturalized subjects. It was therefore resolved that a Conference be opened with the Lower House.

NEW LAWS.

The following Bills were then passed:—

Bill embodying a project of Law of Operation of the Commercial Code.

Bill for amending the Law of Procedure in non-litigious Cases.

Bills for changing local boundaries in Oita and Kagawa Prefectures.

Bill for granting State aid to agricultural experiment stations in Cities and Prefectures. This Bill was amended, however, so as not to become operative until the fiscal year 1900-1.

Bill for amending the Deep Sea Fishery Encouragement Law.

Bill for amending the Law for the Inspection of Stud Horses.

The House rose at 3.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House met at 1.20 p.m.

QUESTIONS.

Questions were presented with reference to the improvement of means of communication in Shimane Prefecture, and the establishment of a special bureau for superintending the affairs of Shrines.

COMMERCIAL CODE.

The Second Reading of the Revised Commercial Code was then taken. The Special Committee recommended two slight amendments, but the House rejected them on the ground that to imperil the enactment of such a voluminous and important code of law for the sake of one or two petty alterations would be impractical. The Code was therefore endorsed in the form given to it by the Revising Committee.

COMMITTEE WORK.

Several Bills were then handed to Special Committees, namely:—(1) The Bill for amending the Procedure in non-litigious Cases. (2) The Bill embodying a Law of Operation of the Commercial Code. (3) A Government Bill relating to the rights of persons who have lost their nationality. (4) A Government Bill relating to Pledges by Foreigners. (5) Two Government Bills relating to the Management of State Forests and Moors. (6) A Government Bill relating to the Sale of State Forests and Moors.

MEASURES PASSED.

The following measures were passed without discussion:—

The Customs Bill (Government).

The Bill (Private) relating to the Government of Tokyo City.

The Bill (Government) relating to Strategic Zones.

Two Bills (Government) for the Regulation of Ships and Ship's Crews.

A Representation recommending the establishment of a Central Industrial Experiment Station.

The House rose at 3 p.m.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 27TH.

HOUSE OF PEERS.

The House met at 10.10 a.m., and, having received the report of the Petitions Committee, dealt with the following Bills:—

A LAND BILL.

A Government Bill relating to the Right of Appropriation by the State. The object of this Bill is to extend the power already possessed by the Government to enforce the surrender of land required for public purposes, in the event of the owner's declining to sell at a reasonable price. The power is at present confined to ownership of land, and the Bill extends it to water as well as to other rights over land, as superficies or leasing. The Bill was entrusted to a Special Committee.

MISCELLANEOUS MEASURES.

Government Bill (from Lower House) for opening the Supreme Court to appeals from legal tribunals in Formosa. Handed to Committee.

Government Bill (from Lower House) for amending the Registration Law. Handed to Committee.

These three Government Bills (sent up from the Lower House) were all handed to Special Committees, namely, the Customs Law Bill, the Shipping Law Bill, and the Ship's Crews Law Bill.

The Special Committee reported favourably on the Government Bill for forming a Special Capital Fund for Education, and the House voted the Second and Third Reading, the only question raised being whether the Government had any intention of calling upon the Communities to contribute to the Fund. The Government Delegate replied, of course, that no power to make any such demand existed.

The Bill for allowing foreigners to hold shares in the Bourse was then passed unanimously, but the House threw out the Government Bill for making changes of local boundaries in Nagano Prefecture.

A Government Bill for establishing a Hokkaido Colonisation Bank was read and handed to a Special Committee.

PILOTS LAW.

The Government Bill embodying a project of Pilots Law was discussed clause by clause, and passed with slight amendments recommended by the Special Committee. The Government Bill (sent up from the Lower House) for the Regulation of Land in Okinawa Prefecture, as well as the Government project of Fishery Law were passed, and the private Bill (sent up from the Lower House) for granting State Aid to Elementary Education was read the first time, but before any action could be taken with regard to it, the House was counted out at 3.40 p.m.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 28TH.

HOUSE OF PEERS.

The House met at 10.30 a.m., and having handed to a Special Committee three Government Bills for amending the laws relating to pensions and gratuities to school teachers, in the sense of greater liberality, passed the following three Bills without debate or dissent:—

Government Bill for extending the competence of the State to appropriate land for public purpose.

Government Bill for setting aside a Naval Capital Fund of 30 million yen.

Government Bill for setting aside a Natural Calamity Capital Fund of 10 million yen.

AIDS TO ELEMENTARY EDUCATION.

The Private Bill (sent up from the Lower House) for granting State Aid to Elementary Schools was favourably reported by the Special Committee. The Chairman said that there were 7 million children of school-going age in Japan, of whom 2½ millions received no education owing to their parents' inability to pay school fees. At present, the number of teachers was deficient by some thirty thousand. The Communities were devoting 50 or 60 per cent. of their total taxes to educational purposes, and could not do more without great difficulty. Parents themselves were paying over 3 millions on account of school fees. It seemed inevitable that the State should render assistance. The Government Delegate had intimated to the Special Committee that the Cabinet approved this Bill, and that the Treasury was prepared to give ten per cent. of the school teachers' salaries, which would mean a contribution of from 800,000 yen to 900,000 yen. The money could be taken from next year's surplus revenue.

Baron Tajiri, Vice-Minister of Finance, called the attention of the House to the condition of the country's finances. The Government had at length succeeded in placing the finances on something like a sound footing, but 25 million yen had still to be returned to the indemnity, and there was a debt of 9 millions incurred on account of last year's inundations. Further, from 1904, a large amount must be set apart every year for the maintenance of the Navy. It was true that the extraordinary outlays on account of the post-bellum expansions of armaments would soon cease; but on the other hand, when the expansions were completed, the ordinary expenditures for the Army and Navy would be greater. It was not possible, therefore, that the Treasury should find means of paying out eight or nine hundred thousand yen here, and one or two millions there, and he trusted that due attention would be paid to these facts.

Mr. Izawa spoke in support of the Bill, quoting statistics to prove that the Treasury's grants to education were quite inadequate compared with the sums given in other countries.

The House passed the Bill by a large majority.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The Government Bills embodying projects of shipping law and ships' crews law, and for amending the Registration Law, were passed, and the Second Reading of the Bill for amending the Peers' Law was postponed.

The private Bill (sent up from the Lower House), for dealing with the hereditary and good-service pensions of amnestied political offenders, was read and handed to a Special Committee.

TOKYO'S MUNICIPALITY.

The private Bill (sent up from the Lower House) for amending the Municipal System in Tokyo, having been read.

Mr. Misaki Kamenosuke observed that the special system of city Government had been abolished in Tokyo last year, and the duty of inspection devolved now, in the first instance, on the Governor and, in the second, on the Minister of Home Affairs. He desired to know whether this altered system was considered to be working satisfactorily, and whether, as a matter of fact, the condition of Tokyo was not much worse than that of Osaka or Kyoto.

The Vice-Minister of Home Affairs replied briefly that the Government opposed the Bill now before the House, and consequently was not called upon to answer questions of the nature just propounded.

Mr. Misaki pressed his point. Did the Government consider that the Mayor, who was now an elected officer, succeeded in discharging the duties devolving on him? Was the Government satisfied with the educational arrangements in the city; with the sanitation; with the engineering works; with the condition of the streets?

The Vice-Minister answered that the function of inspection was performed by the Government and the Home Department within the limits prescribed by law. As for this Bill, it would lead to a mischievous division of authority, and for that reason the Government could not endorse it.

Baron Ozaki thought that the citizens had just reason to complain of the municipality. The state of the streets was terrible. Had there not been numerous cases of children falling in the Asabu district on their way to and from the primary-school?

The Vice-Minister had not procured any statistics about the number of falls that children had experienced.

The Bill was handed to a Special Committee.

PRIVATE BILLS.

The House then passed the private Bills (sent up from the Representatives) for extending the system of Agricultural Associations and for eliminating fractions of a yen from the public accounts of Land Assessments and Land Tax.

The private Bill (sent up from the Lower House) for extending the system of State Aid to Technical Education so as to include marine products, was rejected, as was the private Bill (sent up from the Representatives) for abolishing the Tax on Marine Products in Hokkaido. Mr. Murata Tamotou, who associates himself with all fishery questions, supported the Bill, but the Government Delegate explained that until the administration of Hokkaido could be placed on the same footing as the administration of the rest of the empire, a consummation which the Government would spare no effort to bring about, the abolition of the Tax was financially impossible.

SETTLED ACCOUNTS.

A Resolution with reference to the Settled Accounts for 1899 was then adopted, on the recommendation of the Special Committee. It declared that the provisions of the Law of Finance had been violated by the Foreign Office in arbitrarily placing a contract which ought to have been determined by public tender.

AN ART SCHOOL FOR KYOTO.

Mr. Kaneko Kentaro introduced, and the House unanimously adopted, a Representation urging the establishment of an Art School in Kyoto. He urged that places for imparting instruction in the principles and applications of art were few and defective. In pre-Restoration days, the Shogun, the territorial nobles, and the priests had all acted as munificent patrons of art, so that its progress had been steady. But of late, first-class art artisans had gradually become scarcer. There were none to follow in the footsteps of their great predecessors. He instanced the dyeing industry. It had fallen into such an evil condition that the use of foreign dyeing materials, though not properly understood, was steadily increasing, solely for the sake of cheapness. The result was bad in quality as well as durability of colour and, as a consequence, Japanese habutars, of which five or six hundred thousand pieces were exported every year, had to be taken to France, dyed there and re-shipped to America. If the dyeing were done in Japan, the value of the export would be doubled. In the matter of designing patterns also, the ability of former times was gradually disappearing, and with it all hope of Japan's textile fabrics being able to compete in foreign markets. In the fields of porcelain, lacquer, metal work, and enamel, improvement was equally necessary. Tokyo and Osaka had schools where fairly good education was given, but Kyoto, though from time immemorial it had been the metropolis of Japanese art, was without any such advantage.

The House was counted out at 3 p.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House met at 1.15 p.m.; and passed the following Bills:—

The amendments of the Stamp Tax Law, as agreed upon by a Conference of the Houses.

Two Government Bills relating to Amendments of the Banking Law.

Two Government Bills for the Regulation of State Forests and Moors, and for the Sale of the same to their original owners. The second of these measures led to much discussion. The House adopted the amendments advocated by the minority of the Special Committee, the Government Delegate having announced approval of them, but rejected a motion by Mr. Nakamura Yaroku to elide the words "State-owned," in order that the measure might include forests and moors which had been transferred by the State to the Imperial Estates.

The Government Bill relating to Aid in Cases of Inundations.

The Government Bill providing for an issue of 10 million yen worth of Bonds in order to compensate persons who had suffered unjust losses of hereditary or good-service pensions.

PROLONGING THE SESSION.

At this point an Imperial Rescript was read, prolonging the session until the 9th instant.

The following four Government Bills were handed to Special Committees.

Bill (sent down from the Peers) relating to security in cases of appeal from judgments in cases of major offences by foreigners pleading in forma pauperis.

Bill amending and supplementing the Regulations for dealing with persons taken sick or dying when on journeys.

Bill providing for a rebate of tax to the extent of 20 per cent. on manufactured tobacco for export.

Bill (sent down from the Peers) for assisting to arrest and detain fugitive seamen from foreign war-ships.

NEW BANKS.

The Special Committee then made its report on the Private Bill for establishing an Industries Bank, and the Government Bill for establishing a Movables Bank. The Committee had taken the Government Bill as a basis, and had incorporated the provision in the Private Bill to the effect that the Government should guarantee the principal and interest on debentures offered by the Bank in foreign markets.

The Government Delegate (Baron Tajiri) said that the Government was emphatically opposed to anything of the kind.

Mr. Arai Shogo understood that the Ito Cabinet had drafted a scheme for an Industrial Bank embodying the very provision now denounced by Baron Tajiri, who must then have approved of it. Rumour said that Count Inouye had abandoned the idea in deference to objections raised by Barons Mitsui and Iwasaki.

Baron Tajiri had never heard a whisper of any such thing.

Messrs. Seki and Taguchi strongly opposed the Bill, but the House passed it by a vote of 124 to 91.

The Government Bill for the Regulation of Fisheries was then read and handed to a Special Committee, and the House rose at 6 p.m.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 1ST.

HOUSE OF PEERS.

AMENDING LEGISLATION.

The House met at 10.15 a.m., and, having endorsed the result of the conference with the Lower House on the subject of the Stamp Tax Law, read and entrusted to a Special Committee a Government Bill embodying a law of 21 Articles for defining the duties of Consuls, a measure necessitated by the recent promulgation of various Codes.

APPEALS FROM FORMOSA.

Consent was then given to eight extra-budget expenditures for 1896, and the House proceeded to the Second Reading of the Government Bill (sent up from the Representatives) for opening the Supreme Court to appeals from tribunals of law in Formosa. This measure led to considerable discussion. Its supporters contended that, though the inhabitants of Formosa had not, perhaps, attained a degree of civilization warranting the proposed change, the Japanese and foreigners residing in the island ought not, for that reason, to be debarred the privilege of appealing against errors of law. Its opponents argued that special legislative and judicial powers were vested in the Formosa authorities; that to carry an appeal to Tokyo would be a hardship rather than an advantage to the inhabitants, that even England did not grant appeals from her colonial courts (for which erroneous statement Mr. Seki Yoshio was responsible); that the number of cases worthy of being appealed was quite insignificant, and that a much better plan would be to reestablish the Appellate Court of Formosa. The Bill was finally rejected, and the House, having read and handed to Special Committee the Government Bills (sent up from the Representatives) relating to forestry affairs, went into secret session to consider the Bill for amending the Peers Law, and rose at 3.55 p.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House met at 3.55 p.m.

QUESTIONS.

A Question was presented with reference to the case of ex-judge Takano of Formosa, and the Law of Operation of the Commercial Code, and the Bill for amending the Procedure in non-litigious cases, were passed without debate.

A Government Bill for the Prevention of Offences against the Tobacco-Monopoly Law was read and handed to a Special Committee, as was also a private Bill for establishing a Colonization Bank in Hokkaido.

LEGAL MATTERS.

Dr. Hatoyama's Bill providing that judicial officials who had passed their examination should be allowed to practise as barristers without awaiting the completion of their probationary period in a Law Court, and that all statements made by barristers in Court should be without prejudice, then came up for its second reading. The House voted in favour of the first part of the measure, but rejected the second, and, Dr. Hatoyama withdrawing his support from the Bill in that emasculated form, it was thrown out on its third reading.

A private Bill providing that power to punish the President and Councillors of the Board of Audit be vested in the Supreme Court, and two correlated Bills, were thrown out; a Representation was adopted urging that steps be taken to introduce breeding cattle from abroad, as the number annually killed in Japan exceeds the number born, and the stock is decreasing at the rate of 30,000 yearly; and a private Bill for the Regulation of Arable Land was read and handed to a Special Committee.

FIFTH NATIONAL EXHIBITION.

The two Representations with regard to the site of the fifth national exhibition were then taken, and an inscribed ballot resulted in 122 votes being cast for Osaka and 108 for Tokyo.

STATE FORESTS AND MOORS.

A Representation for organizing an Investigation Committee in the matter of State Forests and Moors evoked a long and powerful speech from Mr. Nakamura Yaroku, who declared that the appointment of such Committees had become a mania and that not one of the large number already organized had justified its existence. Dr. Hatoyama strongly endorsed Mr. Nakamura's views, and Mr. Sugita spoke in support of the proposal, contending that everything depended on the kind of men appointed, and that the importance of the subject called for its careful scrutiny. The House rejected the Representation.

CONCERNING PENSIONS.

The result of a Conference with the Peers in the matter of the latter's amendments of the Bill for establishing Agricultural Experiment Stations in Cities and Prefectures, was reported and endorsed, and a Bill was then read granting pensions to the former Tanami Clanmen. These folks were a remnant of the Aizu Clan, which had opposed the Imperialists so resolutely in 1867. After the complete collapse of their cause and the death of most of their comrades, they moved to Tanami in 1868, and there subsisted on a mere fraction of the fief's original income, all distinctions of rank being obliterated, and each man having a slender income of 7.2 koku of rice, or a four-men's ration, annually. On the abolition of feudalism in 1871, they lost even that pittance, and were not included in the scheme of commutation adopted with regard to the other fiefs. The Bill proposed to remedy this hardship by giving them pension bonds. The Government Delegate opposed the project, on the ground that these men's property did not fall within the category of commutable incomes, and the Bill was handed to a Special Committee.

A private Bill for correcting omissions made in commencing the incomes of Shinto officials and Buddhist Priests at the times of the Restoration, was read and handed to a Special Committee. The sum involved was two hundred thousand yen, which the framers of the Bill proposed to pay in Chitsuroku Kōrai (a form of pension bond).

RAILWAY DIVIDENDS.

Mr. Taguchi Ukichi introduced a Bill for imposing a limit on the dividends paid by Private Railway Companies. He stated that, as a general rule, these companies think only of realizing large profits, and refrain from spending any money on the repair or improvement of their roads. The Bill provides that whenever a Company has paid a dividend of 10 per cent. for more for three years consecutively, the Minister of State for Communications shall be competent to order a reduction of the fares charged on its lines. The Bill was handed to a Special Committee.

REPRESENTATIONS.

A Representation urging that a number of experts and men of affairs be sent to the Paris International Exhibition to study the arts and manufactures of the West was unanimously adopted; the Peers' amendments of the Bill for granting state aid to elementary education were accepted, and a Representation for opening an international fisheries section in the fifth national exhibition was handed to a Committee.

The House was counted out at 4.50 p.m.

THURSDAY, MARCH 2ND.

HOUSE OF PEERS.

THE NATIONALIZATION LAW.

The House met at 10.15 a.m. and, having read and entrusted to Special Committees two Government Bills—one relating to the Relief of Disasters by Inundation, the other (sent up from the Lower House) embodying a project for dealing with Hereditary and Good-Service Pensions by an issue of Bonds to the extent of 10 million yen—received the reports of its Managers with regard to the Conference held with the Representatives in the matter of the amendment of the Nationalization Law. It appeared that the Conference had resulted in a compromise, the managers of the Representatives agreeing to restore the right of obtaining nationalization by marriage (i.e. the case of niusu, where the husband takes the wife's name), and the Managers of the Peers consenting to waive the proposal that the post of Minister Plenipotentiary should be open to naturalized subjects. The House endorsed this arrangement.

TONNAGE DUES.

The Second Reading of the Tonnage Dues Bill was then taken, and a long discussion ensued with reference to the special Committee's amendment that, in the case of a ship which had to enter several ports, a single payment of 20 sen per ton at the first port should clear it for all the rest. The House finally rejected the amendment, and passed the Bill in the form given to it by the Government, with slight verbal alterations.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The Government Bills containing a project of Customs Law and Amendments of the Registration Law, were passed without discussion; the private Bill (sent up from the Lower House) for abolishing the import duty on salted fish coming from Saghalien, was put back, by desire of the chairman of the Special Committee appointed to report on it, and the following measures were passed with brief discussion:—

Bill (private; sent up from the Representatives) for abolishing the import duty on substances used as fertilizers.

Resolution relating to motions for applying the Closure.

Representation relating to the settled accounts for 1896 7.

A Representation was introduced for granting State Aid to the National Learning Association, but the House was counted out at 3 p.m. before any step could be taken with regard to the measure.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES. SUNDRY BILLS.

The House met at 1.20 p.m. and, having endorsed the result of the Conference with the Peers in the matter of the Nationalization Law, passed the following:—

Bill (sent down from the Peers) for amending the Bourae Law in the sense of permitting foreigners to hold shares.

Bill for amending the portion of the Civil Code relating to mortgages on immovables where foreigners are the mortgagees.

Bill for the better prevention of offences against the Tobacco Monopoly Law.

Bills providing capital funds of 10 million yen, 30 million yen, and 10 million yen, respectively, for education, for the maintenance of the Navy, and for the relief of calamities. With regard to the second of these Bills the Government Delegate, in answer to questions, said that the interest on these capital funds would be from 3 to 5 per cent.; that interest amounting to 2½ millions had already been realized, and that, the calculations on which the values of the vessels of war and torpedo craft were based being very intricate, he could not immediately furnish figures.

The following measures were entrusted to Special Committees:—

Government Bill for continuing the system of Famine Relief Funds, the operation of the present Law being limited to the year 1900.

Representation for establishing a School of Industrial Art.

Resolution relating to the House's procedure in the matter of Settled Accounts.

Bill for abolishing the Law which empowers the Government to hand over to private companies, if such a course seem desirable, any of the railways included in the programme of first-period construction.

Representation relating to moral text books in Primary Schools.

Bill (private) for changing the jurisdiction limits of law courts in Ishikawa and Iwate Prefectures.

Representation for amending the Prison Regulations.

Representation for extending to students in private schools the privilege of exemption from conscription.

The House then passed a Representation introduced by Mr. Inouye Kakugoro for granting State Aid to the National Learning Association, and, having adopted various petitions, rose at 3.30 p.m.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE LAST YEAR OF THE CENTURY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

SIR,—Every little while I see or hear some statement to the effect that the year 1899 is the last year of this, the nineteenth century. Just now I have received a circular plea for a general mission meeting in Tokyo, and am told, that, "this year being the last of this century, * * * unusual interest * * * is being called forth." Now, inasmuch as the first century of the Christian era, or, for that matter, of any era, must have contained one hundred full years before it could be a century, it is very evident that the nineteenth century is not completed until nineteen hundred years are finished. And, inasmuch as the year 1 of the Christian era was the first century, and, therefore, the year 101 was the first year of the second century, the year 1901 must be the first year of the twentieth century. This simple arithmetical calculation is so evident that it is practically an axiom; and yet how frequent is this mistake. Don't hurry Time; he flies fast enough!

UNCAS.

Tokyo, February 24th, 1899.

REFORM OF THE JUDICIAL SYSTEM.

We have been asked to publish the following letter:—

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "KOKUMIN SHIMBUN."

SIR,—Allow me to thank you and through you your correspondents for the generous consideration accorded my suggestion regarding an amendment to the Code of Criminal Procedure. The information which you and they have given has made, I am sure, a most happy impression upon the community at large. At the risk of appearing presumptuous, I venture to ask space in your valuable journal for certain additional thoughts bearing upon the same subject. In doing so, that I may not appear an unappreciative observer of the great service which the new judiciary has done and is still doing, with your permission I will quote from an address delivered in Tokyo in December, 1894, and reported in the Japan Weekly Mail of January 5, 1895. The paragraph runs as follows:—

"Whatever criticisms may be legitimately passed upon the courts by foreign observers, and I concede that some of these criticisms have much weight, the fact remains that they have won the confidence of the Japanese people to an extent which can hardly be over-stated. Even in the case of political contents, where the courts have intervened, there has been a remarkable acquiescence in the equity of the judicial decisions. I have repeatedly listened to testimony to this effect from men most bitterly opposed to the Government. There could hardly be a more impressive illustration of the influence this new conception of the rights of the individual is exerting upon the public sentiment of the nation than is exhibited in the practical working of the judicial system."

If called upon to rewrite that paragraph today, I do not know that I should care to modify in the least the statements which it embodies. Nevertheless, fuller information and more careful weighing of facts have led me to emphasize more than I was then disposed to do certain evils which are incident to the system. The most serious of these evils is the tendency toward routine in the administration of justice, or, I might better say, towards a mechanical interpretation of the law. This tendency is by no means peculiar to Japan. It is seen everywhere, and it has been exhibited by some of the wisest and best men who have sat upon the bench. In many countries the jury system serves as an efficient check upon this tendency and insures a certain elasticity to the administration of the law. The large liberty given the defendant's counsel both in the preparation and presentation of his case, at least in all English-speaking countries, is another important check. Whatever may be said of the abuse of this liberty, there can be no doubt that it has acted as a healthful stimulus to the judges and has increased the popular respect for their decisions. The public knows that these decisions have been made in the face of a practically unrestrained argument on the part of the defendant's counsel, and that the sentences of the court are only pronounced after listening to testimony of almost unlimited range, and after a defence as strong as the defendant and his counsel can make it. There can be no question, I think, that judges so placed exert a far more profound influence upon society than those who are known to be supported by restrictions upon the defendant.

This is no fanciful argument. Not long ago in a Japanese court a man was awarded what, I venture to say, every foreigner in Japan who has heard of the case regards as an extremely harsh sentence. Indeed the sentence was so harsh that it seems impossible that the judge could have pronounced it, had it not been for the limitation put upon the right of the defendant to call witnesses. Now such a sentence must create distrust, and it is precisely this distrust which the Barriers' Association by its various suggestions seeks to forestall. Every one of its proposals, though on its face appearing to curtail the authority of the judges, really looks forward to an increase of their moral power, and hence of respect for law among the people.

The very success of the judicial system as a whole, brilliant though it has been, has by the benefits it has conferred rendered the people uncritical; but from this time forward the standards of comparison are bound to change, and a more critical spirit will surely prevail. While the features of the Japanese system to which criticism is directed may be found in the codes of Continental Europe, I think it will be found also that indirectly they are offset in a large degree by special provisions of the respective codes or by peculiar social or political conditions which do not prevail in Japan. That this is true of Germany I have been assured by a distinguished German publicist, not now in Japan, but who resided here long enough to give him abundant opportunities for observation. As regards France, while I cannot at this writing make specific references, I am in my own mind thoroughly satisfied that an examination of the practice of her criminal courts would justify my reasoning.

Nor is this merely a matter of prophecy. This criticism of the courts has already begun, though it is yet confined to a relatively narrow circle, and I have reason to know that, within that circle of well-informed and intelligent men, the belief is prevalent that mistaken convictions are more numerous than they ought to be, and they are so because of the limitations put upon the defendant and his counsel. In my judgment, the existence of this opinion is a real danger to the judicial system, which cannot be recognized too early. There cannot be a better way to allay the dissatisfaction which it embodies than to strengthen the defence by adopting the very thoughtful recommendations of the Barriers' Association, among which there is none more important than that of abandoning the element of secrecy in the preliminary examination to the extent of admitting the defendant's counsel, at least as a spectator, to every session of the yoshin. The current system accords to the yoshin a large influence upon the public trial. It is not enough that the counsel should see the record; he needs to know the atmosphere of the court-room and the thousand and one details which necessarily escape the most punctilious reporter. Without this knowledge his defence is liable to be weak at essential points, for he can not properly weigh the so-called admissions of his client without knowing the circumstances which called them forth. It is difficult to see why granting this admission should necessitate other changes as prerequisites, or how it could impair in any degree the proper authority of the examining magistrate. This change has already, I am told, been introduced into the French code.

An opportunity has been afforded me recently of listening to an earnest argument against this proposition by a gentleman who, at one time, as I understand, served for a considerable period as judge. He did not, while I was able to listen to him, go into details, but claimed that judicial experience was so strongly against the change that he could not understand how any one who had ever held the position of judge or procurator could possibly favour it, and he seemed to claim that this essentially unanimous testimony of men of experience should be decisive on this question. It is, nevertheless, gratifying to know that certain men of long experience on the bench, after a careful consideration of the questions in debate, have not merely signified their sympathy with the proposed amendments, but have given them their vigorous support.

But, even if these exceptional men had not appeared, the argument of my friend would have run counter to the settled conviction of some of the wisest statesmen the world has seen. It is, of course, fitting that men of experience should be given a respectful hearing, and that their opinions should be weighed with care; but it ought not, at the same time, to be forgotten that, with all their advantages, they have the grave disadvantage of being a part of the mechanism which is under discussion and are liable to be unduly biased by a conservatism, in itself healthy and honourable, but which unfits them for accepting at their full weight considerations which to fresher minds assume an overwhelming importance. Is it not possible that the House of Peers in its recent decision gave too large a place to this argument from experience?

This letter is written with feelings of great respect for the integrity and general wisdom of the judiciary of Japan, but it is my firm conviction that the measures now under discussion involve elements of such grave importance, that the members of the Diet may without arrogance claim for themselves fresher minds, a wider outlook, and a truer perspective. Is it too late to hope that even now the way may be opened for this much-desired reform?

CHINESE NEWS.

Mr. A. G. Palmer, a young and exceedingly popular member of the Shanghai staff of Messrs. Butterfield & Swire, died on February 20th from hydrophobia. He was bitten by a pet dog and came to Tokyo for treatment under the Pasteur treatment, returning to Shanghai only on the day he died.

On Feb. 23rd, the Shell liner Cowrie collided with the Indo-China steamers Exang and the Suiwo while steaming up the Shanghai river. The Exang and Suiwo were badly damaged, but the Cowrie escaped without injury.

The Imperial Maritime Customs kindly send us a copy of the statistical report for the last quarter of 1898. From it we gather that the trade of the Chinese empire showed an improvement in that quarter over the corresponding period of 1897:—

Custom Duties collected at Chinese Treaty Ports ...	6,231,339*	5,526,386*
At Kowloon and Lappa ...	237,493	228,661
At Lungchow, Mêng-tze, and Sze-mao	39,270	39,749
Total	6,508,102	4,794,795

The collection at Shanghai amounted to Haikuan Tls. 2,117,594 against Haikuan Tls. 1,831,678 in 1897.

The steamer Kwonghoi (Captain Mackenzie), which arrived in Manila on the 12th instant from Calbayog, in the Island of Samar, reports the disappearance of the chief officer under peculiar circumstances. He was invited ashore to a native festa from which he returned later in the evening. Having occasion to inspect the deck, he discovered six of the native crew breaking into the treasure room which contained a large sum of money for the purchase of hemp. Upon being discovered, the men attacked him, beat him over the head with clubs, and whilst he was in an insensible condition, either threw him into the sea or into a boat alongside. They then abstracted two cases of $5,000 each from the treasure room, and made for shore in the ship's boat. Since then nothing has been heard of the men or the mate. The captain supposes that the sailors had made arrangements, on previous voyages, with their co-conspirators on shore, as this steamer frequently takes large sums of money each trip to the agencies of the firm along the coast.—China Mail.

The present revenue of the territory lately annexed to Hongkong is estimated at £16,000 a year.

The Directors of the Shanghai Sumatra Tobacco Co. have decided to recommend to the shareholders at the approaching annual meeting a final dividend of 15 per cent. on account of the 1897 tobacco crop, making 40 per cent. in all for the year, and to carry about Tls. 36,000 to the Reserve fund.

The Universal Gazette says that much difference of opinion has existed between the Taotai and the British and Japanese Consular Representatives in the negotiation of suitable sites for their respective settlements in Ying-kow, and it was only after prolonged discussion that more satisfactory arrangements were concluded. The regulations have, however, not yet been formulated.

The Universal Gazette learns by wire from Ngankin that charitable relief is urgently needed in the north of that province and that the authorities have collected $180,000, which was sent to the distressed districts in charge of a deputy.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

The firm of Rob. M. Sloman and Co., of Hamburg, has opened a new line of steamers between New York and Japan, and has bought several steamers of the Hamburg-America Line for that purpose. The steamer Catania, formerly running between New York and Rio Janeiro, will run in future to Japan; the Moravia (now named Parma) and the Bohemia (now Pompeji) will follow on the same new route.

Foreign fleets in the Far East will this spring witness a series of Russian naval and military evolutions. According to the Standard's Odessa correspondent, it is reported that these evolutions will be on a grand scale. The garrisons at Port Arthur and Talien-wan are to be equally divided, each force being supported by a naval squadron. The objective feature of the evolutionary campaign will be the assault and capture of Port Arthur.

From the Globe: "New York will be concerned to learn that the effigy of Liberty in New York Harbour is not the largest statue in the world. A larger one, of Buddha, exists in Kamakura, the ancient capital of Japan. And what adds insult to injury is the fact that there is no shoddy about the statue of Buddha. It is all what it pretends to be, solid stone throughout. There were no contractors when it was built." "Kamakura," we presume, must be Kamakura. Probably the paragraph was written by one of those well informed persons at home who pronounce Hakone "Hack-won," and make Kobe rhyme with Job. And the Dai Buten of "solid stone," too!

The news from Manila is ominous. A private wire received by a well known local firm announces that supporters of the Filipinos in the city of Manila set fire to the place, and before the conflagration was put down 1,500 houses had been destroyed. During the fire a rising of the natives was attempted, but the American troops speedily crushed this, and the rebels have now retreated from Manila.

The general meeting of the members of the Kuragi district of the Red Cross Society was held on Sunday at the Miohoji Buddhist Temple, Sugita, over 800 members assembling. The Temple garden was very prettily decorated with flags and lanterns, and over the platform from which speeches were delivered was a large and handsome cross of red plum blossom, flanked with the title of the Society in white bloom, which is now to be seen in perfection. Addresses were delivered by a number of Japanese gentlemen, and at night there was a grand display of fireworks and illuminations.

In H.B.M.'s Court for Japan on Tuesday morning, a formal application was made to His Honour Judge Wilkinson to adjourn the public examination of Charles Emil Leopold to March 10th. His Honour acceded to the proposal.

A watch stolen from a passenger from Yokohama on a Tokaido train has been recovered, but the police have not received any claim, and they ask the person who has experienced the loss to report to them. The stolen property is now at the 2nd Section of the Police Department, Kanagawa Ken.

Mr. M. Suzuki, manager of the Yokohama Branch of the Mitsui Bank, has been appointed to the Kobe branch, his previous position being taken by Mr. S. Yada, late manager of the Kyoto branch of the Mitsui Ginko. Mr. Suzuki left for Kobe by train on the 19th, and was given a warm send off. The new manager was heartily welcomed by a large circle of friends when he arrived the same day.

A remarkable man was the late "Brother" Henry James Prince, who, 40 years ago, founded the Agapemone, or Abode of Love. He was 90 years of age at the time of his death and was formerly a clergyman in the Church of England. He died at Spaxton, near Bridgewater, the location of the conventual establishment, a luxuriously fitted-up retreat. In his "Spiritual Wives," the late Hepworth Dixon severely commented on the Princeite community, in which were many wealthy ladies and gentlemen. About four years ago the deceased assisted in the opening of a branch at Clapton, North London, where the Ark of the Covenant, the first church of the Agapemonians, was built at a cost of some £20,000.

The long expected autobiography of Admiral of the Fleet Sir Henry Keppel is now on the point of being published. It will be capably and splendidly illustrated by drawings from the pencil of the late Sir Oswald Brierley, marine painter to Her Majesty. Messrs. Macmillan, in apologising for the delay in the appearance of the book, which was promised early last year, state that unavoidable causes are responsible.

According to Major Waddell, who has written an interesting book of travel about the Himalayas, it is the Chinese, and not the Tibetans, who exclude British trade and travellers from the Grand Lama's country. He declares that it is the object of China to prevent any trade with Britain and India in the gold and wool of Tibet, and he suggests the wisdom of throwing over the Chinese, with their deceptions and false promises, and dealing direct with the Tibetans themselves.

An interesting event is expected in the Russian Imperial family in May. For this reason, says the Berlin correspondent of the Daily News, the Russian Imperial couple will remain the whole winter at Tsarskoe Selo. The Empress's delicate health, and the family mourning for the Queen of Denmark, will practically prevent any Court festivities taking place at St. Petersburg this winter.

The tea inspecting house which it was decided to establish in Yokohama will be situated in front of the Railway Station, in a building belonging to the Nippon Yusen Kaisha which the latter have agreed to lend gratis. The inspection of tea for export will be commenced before the end of the month.

The American Minister and Mrs. Buck were passengers by the Coptic, which left Yokohama on Friday. They go on a visit to Shanghai, Hongkong, Tientsin, and Peking, returning to Tokyo in April.

Weather permitting, the Nippon Bicycle Club takes a spin on Sunday to Ikegami. The members start at 9.30 from the boat house.

Three elephants now play a game of skittles every night on the stage of a London music-hall. The animals appear to be masters of pantomime, and the audience is convulsed with laughter by the ludicrous manner in which the huge beasts imitate the way men play the game.

The likelihood of Her Majesty's becoming a great-great-grandmother is causing no little interest in London. She has already thirty-two great-grandchildren, but if all goes well she will in May put another record to her wonderful career, for then the confinement of Princess Heinrich Reuss is expected. For a sovereign to have great-great-grandchildren is unparalleled in history.

The Daily News continues its "mayor's nesting" for good stories with excellent results. An author who was preparing a book on Corporation Regalia wrote to a mayor in Shropshire asking for a photograph of his insignia. The Mayor replied that he was only too pleased to grant the request, but, "instead of sending a mere photograph begged to enclose the genuine article." It was his autograph.

The growing taste of the Russian peasants for beer, and the recent action of the Russian Government in reference to the production and sale of vodka in the rural districts, have led to a considerable increase in the brewing industry. Nearly all these breweries, though nominally Russian, are really worked and financed by wealthy German firms, and, having almost undisputed possession of the market, are realising immense profits. The demand for English "pale ale" and "stout" in the capital and the larger towns is rapidly increasing; though the price is extravagantly high. The brewing of "English" pale ale and stout is now one of the most important and profitable branches of these Russo-German Companies, but as yet no serious attempt has been made by any English firms to establish Anglo-Russian breweries in Russia.

The total gold output for December of all the mines of the Transvaal making returns amounted to 419,504 ounces for the Witwatersrand district and 21,170 ounces for the outside districts, in all 440,674 ounces. The production of the Witwatersrand district was 393,310 ounces in November, 1898, and 310,712 ounces in December, 1897, and for the outside districts 20,307 ounces in November, 1898. The return shows an increase over November of 27,157 ounces.

The cause of the last duel in Germany appears to have been the idle boast of a civilian that he had thrashed an officer in the Army. This stupid story, which seems to have been told chiefly in taverns, reached the ears of the Court of Honour of the regiment concerned, and it was decided that satisfaction should be demanded. The father of the civilian, who is a man of wealth and prominent in civic life, appealed to the police to stop the duel, but in vain. The combat took, and the civilian was shot through the heart.

At the close of the Meerut rifle meeting some very interesting experiments were conducted, under the superintendence of Colonel Hill, to ascertain the effect of the Lee-Metford and Martini-Henry bullets fired at 100 yards at full boxes of Lee-Metford cordite and Martini-Henry ammunition. The results clearly proved that a full box of Lee-Metford cordite ammunition is absolutely bullet-proof against Lee-Metford or Martini-Henry bullets fired at 100 yards; that the Lee-Metford bullet only penetrates three packets of ammunition and lodges in the fourth; that the boxes of Lee-Metford cordite ammunition do not explode, the cordite having only burned when penetrated. Consequently, a breastwork of single boxes of Lee-Metford cordite ammunition, placed one on the top of another, affords ample protection against the fire. Secondly, the results proved that boxes of Martini-Henry ammunition with black powder are bullet-proof, but are liable to explode, the contents being scattered in all directions within a radius of 15 or 20 paces.

The situation in Abyssinia, says a home review, is viewed with great anxiety in Rome, and, so long as Menelik keeps from 90,000 to 100,000 men under arms, the Sirdar on his part is bound to maintain a much larger force in the Soudan than would otherwise be necessary. Menelik has declared the deposition of Ras Mangascia, King of Tigre; and Ras Makonnen, his successor designate, is at Haussen with 40,000 men prepared to fight. Whichever side wins, there is likely to be trouble, as the Italian force in Erythraea is quite inadequate for the defence of the colony, and a victorious Ras in Tigre is pretty certain to try and regain the territory ceded to Italy. Menelik's claims in the west are quite inconsistent with the new boundaries of the Egyptian Soudan. In spite of treaties, he was not long ago meditating a descent into the Valley of the Nile. The crushing victory at Omdurman and the withdrawal of Major Marchand from Fashoda have appreciably cooled his ardour, but Egypt can never be altogether at peace while Abyssinia is at war.

AMERICAN NOTES.

The bearing of American competition upon the German sugar industry has been the subject of some discussion in Germany, where the Secretary of the Imperial Treasury was lately quoted as contending that the native sugar industry was not threatened by competition on the part of the United States. This opinion was traversed in the course of a debate in the Prussian Diet by the Prussian Minister of Agriculture and others, who said that such a view did not take into account the enormous financial resources and energy of the American Sugar Trust. The danger threatening from the United States was declared to be most serious, and it was suggested that the competition feared would be accentuated through the exploitation of Cuba by intelligent American capitalists, who would greatly increase the competitive power of that island in the direction of producing and marketing sugar. It seems to be felt abroad, remarks Bradstreet's, that the economic development of Cuba from this time on will be different from what it was heretofore, while the production of beet sugar in the United States bids fair to exhibit a marked growth in the near future.

A report has been filed by the majority of the House Committee on Territories, which has for some time had the Hawaiian bill under consideration. As might be expected, it takes ground in favour of the establishment of a territorial form of government for Hawaii as nearly like that of the other territories of the United States as the location of the islands, their physical condition, and the character of people will permit. One amendment of importance suggested in the report makes all laws passed by the Hawaiian legislature subject to the approval of the Congress of the United States. A feature of the legislation proposed in the report is the retention of property qualifications for electors and for members of the senate. It is recognized that such a provision as this is likely to excite antagonism in the United States, but it is pointed out that such a qualification has long prevailed in Hawaii, and, as far as can be ascertained, meets the approval of the people.

The Pittsburg Reduction Company has booked an order for a quantity of aluminium for a new telegraph and telephone line to be erected in Manila. Twenty-five miles of telephone wire and other material for electrical purposes have been ordered by interests in Manila from New York city concerns.

Fifty-seven whisky and distillery concerns have entered into an agreement in New York city to pool their interests. The new company will be known as the Kentucky Distillers' Warehouse Company of Kentucky.

A certificate of consolidation of the Union Tobacco Company of America and the North American Commercial Company, forming the Union Tobacco Company of America, with a capital stock of $19,350,000 has been filed with the Secretary of New York State. The company manufactures and distributes tobacco in all its forms, and will operate throughout the United States, Cuba, Porto Rico, and other countries.

A Chicago paper announces that Captain Adolph Frietsch intends to take a trip across the Pacific in an open sailing-boat. Captain Frietsch, who is a navigator from Milwaukee, was in Chicago on Feb. 10th making arrangements for the proposed expedition. He has a record for open-boat sailing. In 1894 he crossed the Atlantic in fourteen days and three hours, making the 5,000 miles from Sandy Hook to Teer-eight alone in the schooner Nine, only forty feet on the water line. In the Pacific trip Frietsch expects to reach Honolulu after twenty-one days' sailing from San Francisco, and will endeavour to cover the distance from Honolulu to Manila in forty-two days. The boat that Frietsch will use will be twenty-four feet on the water line, flat-bottomed, with a heavy centre-board. The captain sailed the Pacific Ocean when a boy, and is well acquainted with trade winds that will be encountered on the journey.

Having read to her pupils a description of the sinking of the Merrimac, the teacher some days later asked her pupils what the word "catamaran" there used meant. These are some of the answers:

A catamaran is a mountain lion.

The catamaran is a savage officer in the Philippine islands.

A catamaran carries clubs in a golf game.

The catamaran is the place in Chicago where the cat show was held.

The catamaran was a convention hall prize.

The catamaran is the proper name for a catboat and war ram together like the Catadin.

Hubson obtained a catamaran from the Spanish officers, which was all he had to eat.—Kansas City Star.

A law has been enacted in Delaware to punish persons who commence a crime in Delaware and complete it elsewhere. This is to cover cases like that of Mrs. Botkin, where poison is alleged to have been sent by mail.

At a meeting recently held at the Waldorf-Astoria, New York, for the purpose of raising $10,000 to maintain the Squirrel Inn in the Bowery as a wholesome competitor of unwholesome drinking places, Bishop Potter, the well-known Episcopalian divine, made the assertion that the saloon is a "social necessity," the "poor man's club," which satisfies his "re-creative instinct." The Bishop's statements have been made the subject of wide comment, and he has since explained that coffee-rooms and such-like places were in his mind when he spoke.

In London nervous prostration now goes by the name of Americanitis.

Mr. Rudyard Kipling writes as follows in the New York World:—"When America sells her hand to administer with show of force races helpless in themselves for good government, when she creates roads, drains, schools, hospitals, and an elementary form of justice in countries where they do not now exist, using her best men freely for work, she will, I fancy, find herself even better understood and appreciated by Great Britain than she is to-day. After a nation has pursued certain paths alone in the face of some slight misrepresentation, it is consoling to find another nation (which one can address without a dictionary) preparing to walk along the same lines to, I doubt not, the same end."

Mr. Joseph Hodges Choate, the new American Ambassador, once received a fee of $80,000. He was engaged in the controversy concerning the income-tax, when the Supreme Court held such a tax to be unconstitutional except in time of war. Mr. Choate's brief was marked $40,000, and the sum was doubled on the successful termination of the litigation.

Champion Go Bang, acknowledged to be the finest wire-haired fox terrier in England, has been sold to an American breeder for the record sum of £500.

Considerable dissatisfaction is expressed at Berlin at the reports from the United States of the practice, under the instruction recently issued from the Treasury Department, of closely interrogating passengers arriving from abroad at New York and other seaboard ports. Several members of the Reichstag have resolved to interpellate the Government regarding the matter.

President McKinley, on February 10th, sent the following Message to Congress. It deals with the Pacific cable:—

As a consequence of the ratification of the treaty of Paris by the Senate of the United States and its expected ratification by the Spanish Government, the United States will come into possession of the Philippine islands, on the farther shores of the Pacific. The Hawaiian islands and Guam being United States territory and forming convenient stopping places on the way across the sea, the necessity for speedy cable communication between the United States and the Philippine islands has become imperative.

Such communication should be established in such a way as to be wholly under the control of the United States, whether in time of peace or war. At present the Philippines can be reached only by cables which pass through many foreign countries, and the Hawaiian islands and Guam can be only communicated with by steamer, involving delays in each instance of at least a week. The present conditions should not be allowed to continue for a moment longer than is absolutely necessary.

The time has now arrived when a cable in the Pacific must extend as far as Manila, touching at the Hawaiian islands and Guam on the way. Two methods of establishing this cable communication at once suggest themselves. First, construction and maintenance of such a cable at the expense of the United States Government, and second, construction and maintenance of such a cable by a private United States corporation, under such a safeguard as Congress shall impose.

I do not make any recommendation to Congress as to which of these methods would be the more desirable. A cable of the length of that proposed requires so much time for construction and laying that it is estimated that at least two years must elapse after giving the order for the cable before the entire system could be successfully laid and put in operation. Further deep-sea soundings must be taken west of the Hawaiian islands before the best route can be selected for the cable. Under these circumstances, it becomes a paramount necessity that measures should be taken before the close of the present Congress to provide such means as may seem suitable for the establishment of a cable system.

I recommend the whole subject to the careful consideration of the Congress and to such prompt action as may seem advisable.

THE WHITE MAN'S BURDEN.

BY RUDYARD KIPLING.

[RUDYARD KIPLING'S FIRST EXPRESSION OF OPINION ON THE GREAT PROBLEMS AMERICA IS CALLED UPON TO DEAL WITH BY VIRTUE OF HER ISLAND CONQUESTS IN THE RECENT WAR.]

Take up the White Man's burden—

Send forth the best ye breed—

Go, bind your sons to exile

To serve your captives' need;

To wait, in heavy harness,

On fluttered folk and wild—

Your new-caught sullen peoples,

Half devil and half child.

Take up the White Man's burden—

In patience to abide,

To veil the threat of terror

And check the show of pride;

By open speech and simple,

An hundred times made plain;

To seek another's profit

And work another's gain.

Take up the White Man's burden—

The savage ways of peace—

Fill full the mouth of Famine,

And bid the sickness cease;

And when your goal is nearest

(The end for others sought)

Watch sloth and heathen folly

Bring all your hope to nought.

Take up the White Man's burden—

No iron rule of kings,

But toil of self and sweeper—

The tale of common things.

The ports ye shall not enter

The road ye shall not tread,

Go, make them with your living

And mark them with your dead.

Take up the White Man's burden—

And reap his old reward—

The blame of those ye better,

The hate of those ye guard—

The cry of hosts ye humour

(Ah, slowly!) toward the light—

"Why brought ye us from bondage,

We loved Egyptian night?"

Take up the White Man's burden—

Ye dare not stoop to less—

Nor call too loud on Freedom

To cloak your weariness,

By all ye will or whisper,

By all ye leave or do,

The silent, sullen peoples

Shall weigh you, God and you.

Take up the White Man's burden!

Have done with childish days—

The lightly proffered laurel,

The easy, ungrudging praise;

Come now, to search your manhood

Through all the thankless years

Cold-edged with dear-bought wisdom,

The judgment of your peers.

H.B.M.'S. COURT FOR JAPAN.

Before His Honour Judge WILKINSON.

FRIDAY, February 24th.

THE KOER INSURANCE CLAIM.

EHREMBHOT PARANEY V. CHINA FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY and CHINA TRADERS' INSURANCE COMPANY.

The hearing of this case was resumed from Thursday.

Mr. Lowder said he had omitted at the last hearing to ask the witness Teverson a question, and he asked permission to recall him.

His Honour assented.

The witness was accordingly recalled, and asked, through the Judge, whether it would be possible in the ordinary course of business for marine policies to attach to goods in the godown at Ono.

The witness replied—Possible, my lord, but I do not think probable; to the best of my belief it would not.

Mr. Walford—Have you seen the China Traders' policy?

Witness—No, I have not.

Mr. Walford—You know, perhaps, that the policy attaches to the goods until their arrival at the final warehouse.

Witness—Yes, but not in the warehouse.

Mr. Walford—But if it attaches up to the door of the warehouse might it not attach when the goods are in the warehouse?

Witness—No, the fire policy would come in there.

Mr. Walford—But could not there be two policies attaching?

Witness—It is not customary.

In answer to His Honour, the witness said he had not seen the whole of the policy, but had read the fire clause.

By Mr. Walford—The China Fire policies, he believed, sometimes contained a similar clause. The clause was a slip attached to the policy excluding the company from liability as far as the goods were covered by marine insurance.

By Mr. Lowder—This slip had been adopted since the fire.

Mr. Litchfield applied to amend the eighth paragraph of the petition. He wished the present figures of yen 54,916.67 amended to yen 47,709; yen 24,755 to yen 23,088; and yen 11,244.55 to yen 12,066.00.

Mr. Walford explained that the matter affected his position. The quantities of cotton destroyed and the question of values had been agreed upon by all parties, and this amendment followed. It was a question whether his clients had paid too much or too little to the plaintiff.

His Honour said he could allow the amendment for the present, it being understood that the China Fire Company was not bound by the figures.

Mr. Walford and Mr. Litchfield agreed to an adjustment in case it was found that the China Traders had paid too much or too little, and his Honour made a note accordingly.

Other points in the petition it was agreed to reserve for further amendment if necessary.

The argument as to the admissibility of certain evidence that had been taken was then entered upon, but before commencing Mr. Lowder, as a personal matter, expressed a desire to retract a statement he was reported to have made in a previous day's hearing to the effect that the China Traders' Company were endeavouring to repudiate their liability. He wished to withdraw that, and he hoped his retraction would be satisfactory to his learned friends and his clients.

Mr. Lowder then proceeded to argue in favour of the admissibility of the letter from Mr. Crosse to Mr. Garfit, telling the ground that the client was bound by his agent's or legal adviser's admissions.

His Honour pointed out that it had been ruled that an admission of a solicitor was not binding until a suit had been actually instituted.

Mr. Lowder said that only strengthened his case as regards the action of Mr. Crosse as agent.

His Honour, however, said he could not regard Mr. Crosse as acting otherwise than as a solicitor and he must rule that the letter was not admissible.

Mr. Lowder—I bow to your Honour's ruling, but I must ask you to take a note of my objection.

Mr. Walford said he should like his Honour to take note of other grounds of objection to this letter, as the case might go to appeal. He recited them at length, and his Honour made a formal entry of them.

Mr. Walford then went on to argue against the admission of other correspondence as irrelevant and having merely for its object the proving of a motive on the part of his client, the imputation of which motive had now, he understood, been withdrawn.

His Honour said he did not consider the statements made in the letters of much importance, and Mr. Lowder finally, to shorten matters, agreed to withdraw his application for their production.

Mr. Lowder said as a personal matter he might say that his learned friend was quite in error in attributing to him the motive he had done. It was not his motive at all.

His Honour said that had been made clear by Mr. Lowder's previous remarks, but from what he had said at a previous day's hearing Mr. Walford might not unjustifiably gather that it was being sought to attribute a motive.

Mr. Lowder said it was not his motive at all.

His Honour—We are sure of that.

The Court then adjourned.

On resuming, His Honour said with reference to the question of the admissibility of the letter he would state rather more fully his reasons. He mentioned it in order to prevent any misapprehension as to what his view was. He took it that when a merchant told his managing clerk to write a letter to anybody that letter was supposed to be the statement of the principal. But when a man employed a solicitor, on the other hand, to guard his interest then he (the learned judge) took it that, unless he knew what was in a letter or authorised a particular statement, he was not bound by the solicitor's statements further than the law bound him generally by what his solicitor said. The view his Honour had taken was that although the evidence was that Mr. Crosse was authorized to answer the letter of Mr. Garfield, he was authorized as solicitor and not as an ordinary agent. It would be a dangerous thing if suitors were to be bound by everything the solicitor did if he were simply authorized generally to look after the interests of his client. He (the learned judge) mentioned it as a matter of public interest.

Mr. Lowder then commenced his argument on behalf of the China Fire Company, contending that his clients' policy covered only such goods as were not already covered by a marine policy. If the marine policy did not attach then there was no question of the partial liability of the China Fire Company, but he (Mr. Lowder) argued that the marine policy did attach. Mr. Lowder spoke at considerable length, and quoted a lengthy case which had been decided on a similar point.

Mr. Walford argued that if the marine policy was held to attach the question of contribution must arise, as the two companies held the position of co-insureds.

Mr. Lowder, while holding that the China Fire policy did not attach, admitted that if it did, and if it were held that the China Traders' policy attached also, there must be contribution.

Mr. Walford proceeded to argue that the China Fire Company were responsible in the first place for indemnifying the plaintiff; and that the China Traders' were responsible for nothing that was covered by the China Fire policy.

His Honour, after a patient hearing of counsel, reserved judgment.

THE FIGHTING AT MANILA.

WHAT AN AMERICAN HEARD AND SAW.

Hongkong, Feb. 13.

On Friday there arrived in Hongkong by the Taipei an American gentleman named Mr. Crocker, who saw a good deal of the stirring events at Manila. During the preceding week by representing himself as an Englishman he had been able to get through the insurgent lines with a French officer. He, however, experienced considerable difficulty in doing so. No such obstacles were placed in the way of these members of the Filipino troops who wished to enter the city, provided they left their arms behind them, though they do not seem to have been invariably searched. He found that there were about as many Filipinos under arms as Americans, and in many cases the opposing sentries were within whispering distance of the other. He corroborates the statement as to the American soldiers having to put up with all kinds of insulting language from the insurgent sentries, saying that the Filipinos would frequently walk up to them, point their bayonets at their faces, and taunt them. The American soldiers had, however, strict orders to take no notice of them unless they fired, when the firing was to be returned with interest. Mr. Crocker informed a representative of the Daily Press that before the outbreak took place soldiers, to whom he had been speaking, frequently exclaimed to him, "We cannot stand it much longer!" Mr. Crocker added that in firing upon the Americans the Filipinos wished to see how much the Americans would stand. Continuing, he said:—

"Though the relations between the Americans and the Filipinos were strained I do not think the Americans anticipated any immediate trouble, because the same evening I saw General Anderson and his wife driving along the Luneta."

"I was in the hotel when the trouble commenced. Someone said there had been a collision, and then I noticed carriages driving very rapidly through the streets and officers making their way to the front. It was about ten o'clock when the firing began, and a very few minutes afterwards a portion of the Kansas Regiment which was quartered near the hotel left for the front in double quick time. They went away so silently that notwithstanding their close proximity to the hotel I should not have known they were going had I not been in full view of their quarters. There was not the least confusion or shouting. The firing commenced on the road leading to the waterworks, where the Nebraska men were stationed, but it spread all along the line with great rapidity. There was a continuous roar from 10 to 12 when the firing slackened, to be resumed with increased fury at three o'clock on Sunday morning. After another lull it was again resumed, some of the warships joining. The Monadnock was stationed to the south and the Charleston to the north, they being subsequently reinforced by the Concord and the Callao. Admiral Dewey also came down in the Olympia and fired a few shots, but as he was right among the shipping and could not do much where he was he soon ceased. The Monadnock with her 12-inch guns and the Charleston with her 8 inch guns made a fearful noise, the reverberation shaking the earth.

"At the commencement the Filipinos gained a hundred yards or so, but on Sunday the Nebraska men pushed forward with the object of getting possession of the waterworks and carried all before them, backed up by the Utah Battery and the Tennessee, men and the boys from Colorado and California. Ultimately they secured the reservoir—three miles away—and here they encamped for the night. The next day they again pushed on. Everybody was afraid lest the Filipinos would cut off the water supply, in which case considerable suffering would have been entailed upon the residents of the city. It would have been the easiest thing in the world for the insurgents to have cut the pipes, which are exposed in many places and are of no great strength. The insurgents had still possession of the pumping station, which is four miles beyond the reservoir. It was two o'clock in the afternoon when the Nebraska men resumed their advance, and by five o'clock the pumping station was in their possession. I cannot tell why the Filipinos did not make a better fight for the waterworks or why, when they saw they could not retain them, they did not cut the pipes. I can only think it was because there are a great many Filipinos in the city who would have suffered just as much as anyone else had this been done. On Monday night the Americans took up an impregnable position which commanded a plain some three miles in extent, across which the defeated Filipinos were fleeing to the mountains. A few shots sent by the battery into a village in the plain soon sent the inhabitants running helter-skelter for the cover of the hill-country. Here at any rate the resistance was absolutely broken down.

"In other directions, however, the Americans were not having such an easy time. In the direction of Malate, for instance, on the south and Binondo on the north, though the insurgent lines were commanded by the men-of-war, the insurgents made a stiff resistance. This they were the better able to do in consequence of their having availed themselves of the trenches recently occupied by the Spaniards and the Americans. The shells from the warships did fearful havoc. Now and then one would drop right in a trench, and then you would see men and trees rise in the air and scatter about.

"To the north of the city it was dangerous to walk about, as shots were continually being fired from houses, but in another direction I went as far as ten miles. The district to the north of the city, however, is occupied by a low class of native who are ready for anything. It would have been a most serious thing had the natives risen en masse, because I do not see how our troops could have controlled them. There were immense stores of arms and ammunition concealed in houses and churches, and in many cases these could not be discovered without burning the houses down.

"Fighting was going on when we left on Tuesday, but it was a good distance away. Inside the city there was no great excitement. Except in a few cases the shops were open and business was going on. The Filipino car drivers and conductors were attending to their business as if nothing had happened. Some of the native servants had gone away, but there were still enough left to meet requirements. The Filipinos in the city looked somewhat crestfallen at the course events had taken, but not so much as one might have expected.

"There is no doubt about it that the Filipinos in the city have been plotting for some time. I believe their intention was to rise at night, but when it came to the point they had not the system or the nerve to do it.

"The soldiers had orders to shoot any suspicious characters whom they discovered lurking about the streets after eight o'clock at night. The result was that there was absolutely nobody in the streets after that hour except soldiers.

"During the fighting Aguinaldo, who is believed to have been at Malolos, communicated with Dewey. He sent him a message in which he said, "For God's sake stop the firing," and disclaiming all responsibility in connection with the starting of the trouble. Dewey, however, refused to comply with the request and now I think Aguinaldo is accepting the situation. There was some talk of his resigning and washing his hands of the whole affair, but I do not think he will do that.

"The opinion is that it was not Aguinaldo who precipitated this thing but that his followers whom he could not control are responsible. Aguinaldo himself knows too much to do such a thing. He is much too smart a man for that. And then we know that if he had intended doing this he would have done it more systematically.

"As to the losses, those of the Filipinos may be anything from 5,000 killed and wounded to 10,000, and then there are several thousand prisoners. I saw 400 or 500 being taken in on Sunday, and on Monday I saw 1,000 who had been taken. I should be inclined to place the American losses at 200 killed and wounded. With regard to the Filipinos I saw myself 50 lying dead in one field. There were the same number in the next, and a little further on there were 50 more. I heard a mining engineer say that there was a pile of 125 to bury in one lot. The Monadnock killed as many as 20 and 30, and sometimes 50, with one shell. The Callao, which kept steaming close to the shore, also did much damage with her guns.

"There is nothing of the nature of a panic among the Europeans. The ladies and children in the hotel were sent on to the St. Paul on Saturday night. They returned in a launch the next day and tried to land, but they were not allowed to do so. On Monday, however, they came again and were allowed to come ashore. Arrangements were made to come bring some of them to Hongkong in the Esmeralda."—Daily Press.

THE FIGHTING AT MANILA.

(FROM THE "CHINA GAZETTE.")

Manila, February 16.

There is practically no change in the situation since the capture of Caloocan on Friday last by the American forces.

There is skirmishing daily at the various points around Manila, the Americans easily holding the insurgents in check.

A Spanish prisoner from Malolos reports that there are many dissension amongst the leaders. General Montenegro is likely to supersede Aguinaldo. It is believed that General Baldemero, Aguinaldo's cousin, and Minister of War, was killed at Caloocan.

It is stated that Iloilo would have surrendered but for the action of the Filipino military leaders, who ordered the burning of the city before evacuation. The Americans had one officer and three men wounded at the capture of Iloilo.

Since the recent fighting at Manila and elsewhere, the insurgents have formed a great respect for American prowess, and now avoid close quarters. The superior range of the rifles of the insurgents is in their favour, but the American artillery covers the advance of the infantry, who then carry the positions at the charge.

Notes (abridged) by Emil Kenemy.

- (a) P to K4 would have led to a similar continuation. Black answers B to Kt 5, and White is obliged to move B to Kt 5, to which Black's reply is P to KR3.
 (b) Preferable was B to Kt q. White then had the chance to eventually continue P to K5 and Kt to K4. Even the latter play should be delayed, for it weakens the Q P.
 (c) Kt to K2, followed eventually by Q to B2 and K R to Q q was much safer.
 (d) White should have played B takes B. If Black answers R takes B, then Kt to K4 may follow. If, however, Black plays B takes K, then White moves B to K4.
 (e) Leaves the Q P weak. He should have played P takes B.
 (f) An inferior move, which badly displaces the Kt. He should have played B takes B. If Black answers P takes B, then P to K6 may be played. If, however, Q takes B, then White replies Kt to Q2.
 (g) P takes P x P, followed eventually by R to K Kt 3 and Q to B2 or Kt 3, was the proper continuation.
 (h) P to K Kt 4 at once gave better chance of escape. If Black captures the Pawn, then Q to Q B2 may be played, threatening Q to R7 ch. The text move causes loss of time.
 (i) White's game is hopeless, since the Q P as well as the K B P can not be guarded.
 (k) R takes P would have enabled Black to win the exchange with Kt to B6 ch or Kt to K7 ch, yet it would have given White better fighting chances than the text move.
 (l) Kt to B2 was perhaps better. Black, however, with K R to Q sq, maintains his advantage. Black wins the K B P with an overwhelming attack.
 The complete summary of the match is as follows:—
 1—Nov. 18...Queen's Gambit Dec. 32 Janowski
 2—Nov. 21...Double Ruy Lopez ...62 Janowski

3—Nov. 24...Queen's Gambit Dec. 46 Drawn
 4—Nov. 26...Ruy Lopez38 Janowski
 5—Nov. 30...Queen's Gambit Dec. 46 Drawn
 6—Dec. 2...Vienna47 Showalter
 7—Dec. 4...Queen's Gambit Dec. 39 Showalter
 8—Dec. 6&7...Ruy Lopez71 Drawn
 9—Dec. 10...Queen's Gambit Dec. 23 Janowski
 10—Jan. 6...Ruy Lopez40 Drawn
 11—Jan. 8...Queen's Gambit Dec. 26 Janowski
 12—Jan. 10...Queen's Gambit Dec. 36 Janowski
 13—Jan. 12...Queen's Gambit Dec. 79 Janowski
 Total: Janowski won 7, lost 2, drew 4. Showalter played the White pieces in the odd-numbered games, adopting the Queen's Gambit in each instance.
 Janowski played three Ruy Lopez, one double Ruy Lopez, one Vienna and one Queen's Gambit. Total number of moves made, 585.

Game No. 485

The following somewhat remarkable game was played in the tourney between Messrs. Burn and Schott:—

QUEEN'S GAMBIT DECLINED.

White—M. Burn.		Black—Mr. Schott.
WHITE.	BLACK.	WHITE.	BLACK.
1 P Q4	P Q4	17 B K3	R R7(k)
2 P QB4	Kt KB3(a)	18 P x Kt	Q R R q!
3 P x P	Q x P	19 P B4	P K6

5 P K3	P B3	21 K B q	R R8ch(i)
6 Kt B3	B K5	22 K K2	R x Rch
7 B K2	Q K Q2(b)	23 R x R	Kt B
8 Castles	P K3	24 K x Kt	Q K3ch
9 B Q2	Q K3	25 K B3	B Kt q
10 Q B2	B Q3	26 R Q q	Q B2
11 Q R Q q(c)	Q B2 l	27 Q Q2	R Q q7
12 P KR3	P KR4	28 Q x Rch	Q x Q
13 P K4(d)	P K4(e)	29 R x Qch	R x R
14 P x B	R P x P	30 K R4	K K2
15 K x P	K x Kt	31 Kt K2
16 KR K-q(f) Gls.	QR		And White won.

NOTES.

- (a) Inferior in P to K3, or P to Q B3.
 (b) 7..... B takes Kt, 8—B takes B, P to K4! had points.
 (c) We should have preferred 11—P to K4. P to K4; 12—B to K3. The text move gives Black an opportunity for an ingenious and extremely dangerous counter attack.
 (d) If 14—P takes B, P takes P; 15—Kt to K5, B takes Kt; 16—P takes B, Q takes P; 17—P to K Kt 3, Q to K R4; and wins.
 (e) He had better have captured the Kt first.
 (f) 16—P takes Kt would hardly do, as a brief examination of the position will easily demonstrate.
 (g) An extremely pretty move. If 18—K takes R, the reply would be Kt to B6 ch, and mate next move.
 (h) Nothing better. If 20—K to B sq, then R to R 3 ch; 21—B to Kt sq, R takes B ch, and wins.
 (i) His only chance now was 21..... Kt takes B ch; 22—R takes Kt, B takes P; but it is doubtful whether even that line of play would have amounted to much for Black in the end.—Hereford Times.

YOKOHAMA: SATURDAY, FEB. 25TH, 1899.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

INFLUENZA seems to be rife in Tokyo. Count Matsukata is still suffering from it.

THE new President of the French Republic is M. Loubet, late President of the Senate.

THE new election law has been passed by the Lower House, after being almost entirely recast.

PRESIDENT FAURE died in Paris last Thursday, from apoplexy, after an illness lasting three hours.

VERY bad weather has prevailed along the coasts of Japan since Wednesday, detaining steamers very seriously.

THE Canadian Panama, which was three weeks overdue from New York, has been safely towed into the Azores.

THE inauguration of the new President of France was attended by some hostile demonstrations in the capital, but details supplied later confirm the impression that they were the work of paid rowdies.

A VERY enjoyable concert was given at the Public Hall on Wednesday evening by the Junker Quartet Party.

A POLICEMAN named Hongo Saburo (29), stationed at Kojimachi, Tokyo, has been arrested on a charge of theft.

A LADY named Mura (22), niece of Mr. Ka Reishi, member of the House of Peers, has committed suicide by taking poison.

THE lead taken by the Mitsu Bank in reducing its rate of interest will be followed by the Third Bank and the Yasuda Bank within a few days.

RT. HON. SIR M. HICKS BEACH has submitted in the House of Commons a motion to vote £30,000 to purchase an annuity for Gen. Lord Kitchener.

THE Nippon Tea Trading Association has declared a dividend of 7 per cent. per annum. The association is said to have incurred heavy losses during last year.

A MAN named Hiraide Toyonji, of Kanagawa Satsuma Prefecture, was robbed of ¥4,960, the proceeds of a sale of barley, while travelling on a train recently.

THE Sultan of Muscat granted a small port in his territory to the French as a coaling station, but has had to withdraw the concession on the threat of the British Admiral.

THE Yokohama Customs authorities have made a claim of ¥800 against the Messageries Maritimes for damage done on the 15th inst. to the pier by the steamer Sydney.

MR. WAKAO, the wealthy Yokohama merchant, is promoting a bank with a capital of ¥400,000. He applied on the 20th for the sanction of the Financial Department.

THE new law of Criminal Procedure has passed the House of Peers as amended by the Government. The French system still prevails in regard to preliminary examinations.

AN amah in the employ of the ladies of the Ferris Seminary, Yokohama, committed suicide on Monday by jumping down a deep well. She had been greatly depressed of late.

THE funeral service at the Roman Catholic Cathedral, Tokyo, in honour of the late President Faure, proved very impressive and was attended by representatives of all nations.

WEDNESDAY, February 23, George Washington's birthday, was quietly spent in Yokohama. In Kobe the American community gave a public ball to which a large number of guests were invited.

THE new special Customs Regulations increasing the duty on foreign spirits and tobacco, and exempting from duty foreign matches and match materials, are to be enforced from the 15th August.

THE Yokohama Telephone Exchange, after finishing the laying of pipes for underground telephone wires as far as the 3rd street of Honcho, will extend its work to Oamachi, Onoyecho, Nuge, &c.

THE Japanese man-of-war Hiyei is to make a voyage to Vancouver, Seattle, and Honolulu with 59 graduates from the Naval college. She is expected to return in August this year, and will afterwards, it is stated, make a second cruise of the same nature.

THE Electric Railway between Seoul and the cemetery where the late Empress of Korea was interred, about 5 miles in length, has been completed, and will probably be opened for traffic on the 1st May.

THE Kanagafuchi Spinning Company, the Shanghai Spinning Company, the Miike Spinning Company, and two other companies are considering a project of amalgamation, the proposed capital being 10,000,000 yen.

THE dispute over the fire insurance on the Nippon Yarn Manufacturing Company's works in Osaka, has been arranged. The Meiji, Nitto, and Tokyo Fire Insurance Companies will pay ¥27,500 each and the Yokohama Fire Insurance Company ¥17,500.

ACCORDING to investigation instituted at the end of last year, the total number of Japanese in Singapore, Penang, and Malacca is 161 males and 477 females. If the number of Japanese in adjacent islands be taken into account, the total is over 1,000.

MR. YAMAKAWA, Vice-Manager of the Yokohama Specie Bank, has left for Hongkong and the Northern parts of China to investigate industrial and commercial conditions there. When he returns, he will be appointed manager of the Kobe branch of the Bank.

INTELLIGENCE from Washington states that a resolution has been adopted declaring the ratification of the Treaty of Peace. This does not imply the permanent annexation of the Philippines, but is intended to prepare the islands for self-government.

THE Kanagawa Kencho has offered for sale by tender the land formerly occupied by the jail. The highest tender was ¥6.10 per two yards square. This was declined, and the land will be tendered again. The authorities expect about ¥12 per two yards square.

MIYASHITA Kozuki (aged 27), a native of Kagoshima Prefecture, now living at Shibahama Kwan, Tokyo, has been arrested under a warrant issued by the Shiba Police on the 15th, on a charge of fraud. He is a relation of Count Matsukata, has been in America, and is a man of some education.

THE funeral of the late Mr. Hara Zensaburo, of Yokohama, took place at the Enshakuji, Ku boyama, Ota, on the 16th inst. In spite of the heavy snow storm, over 5,000 persons were present. Shaku Syugen, of the famous Buddhist temple Enshakuji, Kamakura, officiated.

THE first meeting of creditors of E. C. Leopold, a convict now serving a term of two years' imprisonment in the British gaol, was held on Monday, and the debtor was adjudged a bankrupt, an official trustee being appointed to take charge of the estate. The debts amount to 400,000 yen, the assets to about 75 yen.

NOMIDZU Satoru, aged 18, of Nakase-mura, Mishima gon, came up to Tokyo some six years ago, and became a pupil at the Myohoji, a Buddhist Temple, near Tokyo, but his dissolute conduct led to his having to leave. After wandering about the capital penniless and homeless, he broke into the temple where he served as a pupil, and stole ¥40, which he spent in the usual amusements of youth. He was arrested on the 14th.

CODE OF CRIMINAL PROCEDURE.

February 20.

It will be noticed from our report of the Proceedings of the House of Peers, that the very interesting question of amending the Code of Criminal Procedure came before the House on the 18th inst. The Government, some time ago, presented a Bill embodying certain changes, the chief of which was the abolition of the mise au secret (nishitsu), and the substitution of "separate confinement" (betsui Hambo). It was not a material change, for although the objectionably suggestive term "secret cell" disappeared from the Code, its place was taken by another kind of cell, where all the disagreeable and painful features and incidents of the mise au secret might be easily perpetuated. Moreover, the Government proposed that recourse to separate, or solitary, confinement should continue to be recognised as a means of eliciting facts: in other words, an accused person, before even a prima facie case had been made out against him, might be subjected to a rigorous system of treatment in order to induce—may we not say "compel?"—him to bear witness against himself. It really could not matter much whether he were put into a "secret cell" or a "separate cell?" The result in each case would be similar isolation from all human intercourse, and similar moral disturbance. The majority of the Special Committee of the Upper Chamber appointed to examine the Bill recommended the excision of the words "for the purpose of eliciting the facts," thereby eliminating, from the letter of the law at any rate, the principle that separate confinement may be resorted to as a device for extorting confession. That is something gained. But again we are confronted by the same inefficacy that disfigured the Government's amendment. For though the Judge is no longer informed textually that the nishitsu, or the betsui hambo, is regarded by his country's legislators as a useful and normal instrument for collecting evidence, he still remains invested with power to prescribe separate confinement "when he deems it necessary." When can it be "necessary" to resort to such a course in the case of a person against whom no offence has been proved? We fail to see that it can ever be "necessary" except for the purpose of employing moral pressure to elicit a confession. Thus the amendment proposed by the majority of the Committee seems to be quite impotent of useful results. They have recommended some other changes of a useful character, especially one which secures an accused person against being placed under arrest previously to examination, and another which requires judgments to be couched in fully explanatory terms. But they have left untouched the kernel of the problem, namely, the proces verbal, the denial of counsel to an accused person during the preliminary examination, and the competence of the Judge to resort to measures which can only be reconciled with the assumption of guilt before guilt has been proved.

The minority of the Committee assumed a very different attitude. They boldly advocated the Anglo-Saxon system, that is to say, total abolition of the proces verbal, together with the separate cell as an adjunct of preliminary examinations, and the permitting of an accused person to employ counsel from the very first. We may note that this minority numbered ten members, and that it included two ex-Chief-Justices, Messrs. Miyoshi and Kodama.

The Peers have voted for the second reading of the Bill, and the Minister of Justice has asked them to "defer"—a significant way of putting it—endorsement of the proposals of the minority. His Excellency represents the Government as uncertain whether the employment of counsel for the accused at preliminary examinations might not prove a source of delay, thus inflicting needless suffering; and whether it might not lead also to the escape of guilty persons. The former apprehension seems to us, as Englishmen, quite chimerical; and the latter is the outcome of precisely the principle most inconsistent with the real interests of justice; the principle that innocent people should be placed in jeopardy rather than that the risk of a guilty person's escape should be incurred.

February 23.

From our report of the Proceedings in the House of Peers on the 21st instant, it will have been seen that the Government Bill for amending the Code of Criminal Procedure was discussed with closed doors. We can not offer any explanation of this policy of secrecy, unless it be that some of the members wished to refer explicitly and at length to the opinions expressed by foreigners on the subject, and also to obtain an exact statement from the Minister of Foreign Affairs as to any communication that may have passed unofficially between himself and the Foreign Representatives. We doubt whether there have been any communications of the kind. Objectionable as Englishmen and Americans may deem the Japanese system, it is, after all, the system to which they would be obliged to submit if they visited, or resided in, several of the most highly civilized States of Europe, and they are therefore precluded from protesting, except as a matter of principle.

The House having conducted its proceedings in secret, we know nothing about the character of the debate, but the result is that the Bill was passed as amended by the majority of the Special Committee, and that the suggestions of the minority were rejected. We have already explained these points in detail, and need not do more here than state that the attempt to replace the French system by the Anglo-Saxon has failed; that the proces verbal is continued; that counsel is still denied to an accused person at the preliminary examination, and that the Judge is still competent to order the accused into separate and solitary confinement, before a prima facie case has been established against him, though the Code no longer textually recognises that the purpose of such confinement is to elicit the facts. The Government has spoiled its progressive record by its action in this matter. It has lost a golden opportunity of effecting a reform which would have brought it much credit, and would have raised Japan's judicial system to a much higher plane than that now occupied by it.

Kusane Tokuichi, aged 28, a coolie, was hanged in the Yokohama Chibo Saibansho on Wednesday morning, with stealing some wire, valued at 20 yen, from a godown rented by Mr. A. Weston at the Western Hotel. The accused was sentenced to 30 days' imprisonment.

DIFFICULTIES OF THE PROGRESSIVISTS.

The Progressivists do not appear to be able to compose their quarrel. Our readers remember, doubtless, that the bone of contention is whether or not the Party should adopt, as a platform for active operations, the principle of drastic financial economies by cutting down the expenditures on account of the Army. The section advocating that course laid down, at first, the rule that 140 million yen must be the limit of the State's outlays. We are not clear as to the precise meaning of that proposal. At first sight it seems to refer to the Ordinary and Extraordinary Expenditures combined, since the Ordinary Expenditures for next year already satisfy the prescribed condition, being only 140½ million yen, whereas the sum of the Ordinary and the Extraordinary is 226½ millions. On the other hand, the most extreme reformer can scarcely think of cutting down the expansion scheme for the Navy—it is too late, indeed, to attempt anything of the kind—and no retrenchments effected in the military budgets alone could produce the result desired by the malcontents, if they include the Extraordinary outlays. Looking at the Government's estimates for the next six years, however, we see that the Ordinary Expenditures alone will reach 147½ million yen when the post bellum programme is fully carried out (i.e. in 1905-6), and it would not be unreasonable to demand that the establishment of the Army be reduced so as to keep the Ordinary Expenditures within 140 millions; in other words, that 7½ millions be cut off. But just as we imagine that we have thus reached an intelligible explanation, we are thrown into new confusion by an announcement that the recalculators, after a great struggle with their convictions—"swallowing their tears," as the Japanese expression has it—declared their willingness to extend the limit of outlays to 170 millions, which concession, however, did not suffice to bridge the chasm as the rest of the Party stood out for 180 millions. Now, according to the official programme, the Ordinary and Extraordinary Expenditures will aggregate only 165 millions in 1903-4, and will sink to 160½ millions in 1905-6. So it would seem that the economical section of the Progressivists are actually willing to disburse 10 millions more than the Government itself contemplates ultimately spending, and the liberal section talk of adding 20 millions. We don't understand it at all. At any rate, one thing seems certain, namely, that the number of the probable seceders from the Party in consequence of this dispute is gradually dwindling. At first 40 were confidently spoken of. Then they fell to 20, and now there is talk of only 10. There will, therefore, be no very formidable convulsion. It is curious, however, to find that the brilliant men of the Party, like Mr. Ozaki Yukio, Dr. Hatoyama Kazuo and Mr. Inukai Ki—all original Progressivists, he it observed—decline to serve on the General Committee, and Baron Kusumoto now represents the whole Committee in his own solitary person. Can it be that the bonds binding the old Shimpo-to to their heterogeneous allies are beginning to loosen?

THE LAND-LEASE QUESTION.

We feel reluctance in again approaching the question of the Kobe land leases, first because the subject has ceased to be interesting, and secondly because our opponent's position no longer invites attack but only inspires compassion. However, a controversy sometimes becomes controversially curious, apart from the issue in dispute, and it is conceivable that our readers will share the amusement we have ourselves derived from the latest developments of this dispute. Our opponent, whom we shall designate the Kobe Quibbler for the sake of brief identification and because of the appropriateness of the term, is the victim of a habit which places him at a great disadvantage. The too freely indulged custom of equivocation has so impaired his discernment that he seems to have lost the capacity of distinguishing between artifice and candour, and thus complacently associates himself with the most singular distortions of truth and logic, just as sufferers from chronic physical infirmities often become unconscious of their unsightliness to other eyes. That phase of the discussion constitutes one of its claims upon sober attention, and we shall therefore briefly illustrate it.

Every one knows that it is unlawful for foreigners to rent land beyond the limits of the Settlements or other places specially designated for that purpose in Japan. Yet, according to the Kobe Quibbler, to say that such renting is forbidden is a suggestio falsi. Why, forsooth? Because "the leasing of land by aliens was never forbidden in Japan in the sense of an enactment to that effect any more than trade between Japanese and foreigners was forbidden." Is not that comical? We must not say that to lease land anywhere and everywhere throughout Japan is forbidden to foreigners, because there is no explicit enactment on the subject. "No explicit enactment!" Nothing but numerous laws, promulgated again and again in former years, promising condign punishment to any Japanese subject who entered into transactions of any kind with foreigners. Nothing but an absolute practical veto which has always effectually prevented the leasing of lands outside the Settlements, and which will continue to prevent it until the Revised Treaties go into force. Nothing but international covenants which by limiting such transactions to a few narrow areas, constructively forbid them everywhere else. Yet it is a suggestio falsi to say that the leasing of land by foreigners outside the Settlements is forbidden! To such sad subterfuges is the Kobe Quibbler driven.

That is illustration No. 1. We pass to No. 2. In May, 1867, the Japanese Government undertook to form at Hyogo a foreign Settlement, by raising portions of a certain area, constructing embankments, and carrying out other works. They further covenanted that "as soon as all the ground thus prepared was occupied and more space was required, the Settlement might be extended towards the hills at the back." Ten months later, they agreed that "foreigners and Japanese might in future make arrangements between themselves and at their own convenience for leasing lands or houses" in an additional area outside the Settlement. Ten months later, observe. Now the Kobe Quibbler asserts that this latter concession was merely the "carrying out of the former arrangement." The preparation of the Settlement had been finished 3 months previously, and only a tiny fraction of it had been occupied, yet we are asked to believe that the time had come for implementing a promise which was explicitly conditional on the complete occupation of the Settlement and the consequent necessity for further space! To such sad subterfuges is the Kobe Quibbler driven. Moreover, the document conveying to foreigners this privilege of renting extra-settlement lands or houses, explicitly says:—"From this arrangement, however, must be excepted the Concession ground prepared under the Convention of May, 1867." Yet the Kobe Quibbler pretends that the arrangement was merely an extension of the Concession!

It is worth while to notice here a query which may occur to our readers, namely, if the Settlement area at Kobe had not been fully occupied, why were facilities granted for renting land outside its limits? The answer is supplied by reference to Tokyo's case. In 1867, the Japanese Government covenanted to provide a space for a foreign Settlement in Tokyo, and further agreed to make an extension, "whenever the original ground had been occupied by foreigners and more space was required for their use." In 1870, though no question whatever had arisen as to complete occupation or the need of further space, the Japanese Government agreed that within certain extra-Settlement limits foreigners might hire houses from Japanese. As in Kobe, so in Tokyo, an additional facility was granted. That is all.

Concerning the duration of leases in the extra-Settlement area in Tokyo, no doubt has ever arisen, because the Japanese Government, in granting the facility, expressly limited the term of such leases to 5 years. If anything were needed to differentiate the extra-Settlement areas from the Settlements themselves, this reservation would supply the want, for whereas leases within the Tokyo Settlement were to be in perpetuity, those without the Settlement were to be for five years only. That, it will be remembered, is the whole point of the controversy. Our contention is simply this, namely, that the Japanese Government, when it agreed that foreigners and Japanese might in future make agreements between themselves and at their own convenience for leasing lands or houses within a district outside the Settlement at Kobe, did not for one instant deprive itself of competence to legislate, either then or subsequently, for the regulation of such transactions. In 1870, it had taken the precaution of setting a five years' limit in the case of Tokyo. In 1884, it set a twenty-five years' limit in the case of Kobe. The Quibbler of the latter port performs some very diverting antics in climbing round these propositions. He tries to prove that we rested our case at one moment on the laws of the empire; at another on a local custom. We did nothing of the kind. We laid down, first, the general proposition that the transactions permitted to foreigners and Japanese at Kobe in 1868 were not, and could not be, exempted from the laws of the empire; and, secondly, we asserted the special fact that the local custom of the prefecture was embodied in a prefectural law in 1884, which law became thenceforth binding upon all Japanese in their transactions with foreigners within the prefecture.

The final phase of this controversy has been the most curious of all. It was asserted by the Kobe Quibbler that, in deference to the strong protests urged by Her Majesty's Minister, the Japanese Government, recognising that the restriction imposed in 1884 was a violation of the rights secured to foreigners by treaty, had withdrawn the restriction. We thereupon published an official statement obtained from the Foreign Office, denying that anything of the kind had occurred, and explaining that the restriction was withdrawn because the operation of the new Civil Code rendered it unnecessary. In short, so far from admitting that to impose a legal restriction on the exercise of the privilege had been ultra vires, the Japanese Government had simply replaced one form of legal restriction by another. What was now left for the Kobe Quibbler? Nothing except the incredible course of denouncing the Foreign Office document to be a fraud!

We are wrong in saying that nothing was left except the miserable subterfuge of pretending not to believe a statement which stood beyond all range of query. We are wrong in saying that the shamelessness of an accusation tending merely to show the controversial depravity of which he is himself capable, could not deter the Kobe Quibbler. There was still another resource for him. Failing totally in argument, in reason, in logic, and in sincerity, he could yet appeal to the passion and the prejudice of his audience. That is what he does. He concludes by "commenting on the energy and persistency with which the Japan Mail seeks to make out that" the Kobe Quibbler "and the Kobe community generally are animated by an overmastering hostility to Japan and the Japanese Government," and he "supposes that the Japan Mail has made up its mind that it will serve its own personal interests best to misrepresent the Kobe community." That is the kind of device finally resorted to. The question of the land leases, whatever be its rights and wrongs, is confined strictly to an interpretation of treaty rights. It has nothing whatever to do with "overmastering hostility to Japan and the Japanese Government." It is a problem of the most limited practical interest; its discussion has no sentimental phase of any kind, and our part in the controversy has been simply to deny that a breach of the treaty can be justly charged against Japan. The Kobe Quibbler himself has some glimmering consciousness that, in carrying his appeal to the bar of prejudice, he must find some pretence unconnected with the real subject of discussion. He finds it in the Japan Mail's failure to comment editorially on the enthusiastic reception given by Kobe to the Emperor when His Majesty passed through the Settlement. Yet, even in advancing that ridiculous plea, he is incapable of the commonest consistency, for he declares that the reception was regarded by the foreigners, on their side, in the light of a "simple act of courtesy due to the Sovereign of the country in which they resided." Thus because the Japan Mail "refrained altogether from editorial comment" on a "simple act of courtesy," it is charged with "making out that the Kobe community is animated by an overmastering hostility to Japan and the Japanese Government!" All very comical, surely, but, at the same time, very pitiable. It is not easy to understand the uses of every creature with which an all-wise providence has peopled our globe, but that particular species which turns and rends the hands upon which it fawned so long as they bestowed benefits, is one we have no desire to study closely.

THE BANK OF JAPAN.

It will be observed from our report of the Proceedings in the Diet that the two Houses are now holding a conference with reference to the taxation of the Bank of Japan. The Government's Bill proposed to levy a tax on the Bank's net profits, and the estimated yield of such an impost was 1,200,000 yen. The House of Representatives changed the system, and decided that the tax should be levied on the Bank's note issues, after deducting its loan of 22 millions to the Treasury. The rate proposed by House was 1½ per cent., and the tax would have amounted to 1,400,000 yen. When the Bill came to the Peers, they endorsed the system recommended by the Representatives, but they changed the rate to 1 per cent., under which arrangement the maximum yield of the tax would be 980,000 yen. Unless the Houses can come to some agreement the Bill will fail altogether. We presume that a compromise may be anticipated—probably 1½ per cent.

The annual general meeting of the Bank of Japan was held on the 18th instant at the Bank buildings. Mr. Yamamoto, President of the Bank, addressed the assembled shareholders at some length. After referring to the facts that he had occupied the post since last October only and that this was the thirty-third general meeting, he went on to speak of the economic history of the year just expired. The year had opened amid very gloomy conditions, serious depression of trade existing and the money market being in a state of great stringency. Under the circumstances the Bank had considered it necessary to raise its rate of interest, and had done so twice, to the extent of 1 rin daily, in March and April. Things had continued in a bad state. Many industries had been suspended, and the market quotations for bonds and shares had steadily declined, so that considerable embarrassment was felt in banking circles, especially in Osaka. It was evident that unless some remedial measure were adopted, a crisis must ensue. Accordingly the Government had, on the one hand, devoted a portion of the money lying in the Treasury to the purchase of bonds, and, on the other, subscribed liberally for the shares of the Industrial Bank, thus placing it in a position to give accommodation to manufacturers. These steps having been commenced in May, had gradually exercised the desired effect, and the second half of the year had seen a gradual restoration of confidence and a partial revival of business, accompanied by a fall in the prices of commodities. With the approach of autumn these improved conditions were supplemented by the prospect of an exceptionally fine rice harvest, and the War between America and Spain having been brought to a close, a keen demand for Japanese silk sprang up in the United States, leading to a large increase of exports, with partial redress of the balance of trade. The Bank had therefore felt that it might adopt a less conservative policy, and in October and November it reduced the daily rate of interest by 2 rin on each occasion. A clear idea of the improved economical conditions at the close of 1898, as compared with the corresponding period of 1897, might be gathered from the following figures:—

Accommodation given by the Bank	Yen.
at close of 1887	104,970,000
Accommodation given by the Bank
at close of 1898	84,370,000
Difference	20,600,000
Volume of convertible notes in circulation at end of 1897	226,200,000
Difference	28,900,000

The year 1898 was further remarkable for the disappearance of the fever of industrial enterprise which became epidemic after the War with China. Statistics showed that whereas the amount of capital involved in new enterprises or added to the capital of old ones during the year had been only 9,349,000 yen, a figure remarkably small as compared with the record of the three or four preceding years, the capital of companies dissolved during the same interval had been 6,608,060 yen, so that the sum really taken had been only 2,741,000 yen. On the other hand, the Clearing House returns for Tokyo and Osaka showed that the credit system was steadily gaining vogue:—

Clearing House returns, Osaka and Tokyo, 1897	Yen.
Clearing House returns, Osaka and Tokyo, 1898	713,850,000

It might fairly be concluded that the country had now emerged from the temporarily unsound conditions which followed the war, and that the remedial measures adopted by the Government in the spring and summer of the year had been crowned with good results. Turning to the foreign trade of the country, it was found to have aggregated 442,600,000 yen, in round numbers; far the largest figure ever reached. Doubtless that was a cause for congratulation. But the satisfaction was not unalloyed: the increase had been chiefly on the side of imports, exports showing no appreciable change. That was partly due, no doubt, to the still remaining spirit of expenditure resulting from the war, but it was also due, in no small degree, to the failure of the rice crop in 1897 and the consequent importation of large quantities of grain, as well as to the fact that there had been a rush to import goods in anticipation of the new tariff which went into force from the beginning of this year. All these causes had combined to produce an excess of imports to the extent of 112,300,000 yen, and a consequent outflow of specie aggregating 44,400,000 yen. Under the exceptional circumstances of the time, the country might justly congratulate itself that a heavier drain of specie had not occurred. All arrangements with respect to the new currency system had been completed in July of last year. There had been some superfluous apprehensions about the possible shrinkage of the specie reserve, but they had not been realized in any sense, and the system now stood on a perfectly stable basis. The President then went on to explain changes that had been made in the organization and rules of the Bank, the building of new offices for the Moji branch, and the transfer of the Tokyo Clearing House to the Bank's premises on December 1st. He referred very briefly to the measures now under debate in the Diet for imposing a tax on the Bank and increasing the nominal limit of note issue. These steps, he said, might have a great influence not only on the banking business of the Bank, but also on its functions as part of the mechanism of national finance, and he trusted that they would receive most careful consideration at the hands of the country's legislators. He then paid a glowing tribute to the former President, Baron Iwasaki, who, he said, had taken charge of the Bank's affairs at a most difficult financial crisis, had worked early and late with conspicuous ability, in its interests, and had steered it successfully amid conditions demanding the utmost judgment and singleness of purpose. He concluded by apologising for his own inferior capacities, and by promising that the shareholders might trust him to work earnestly at all events.

The accounts for the half-year were then passed as follows:—

Gross Earnings for the half-year ended December 31st, 1898	Yen.
Working Expenses, losses, &c.	4,786,088
Net Profit	2,703,476
Brought over from previous account	303,341
Total	3,006,817
To Regulation Dividend (6 per cent.)	900,000
To Reserve	700,000
Rewards to Officers and Entertainment Expenses	180,000
Supplementary Dividend (6 per cent.)	900,000
Carried over to next account	326,817

Mr. Taguchi Ukichi is interesting himself very actively in the matter of taxing the Bank of Japan. He has compiled a statement, and circulated it among the members of the Diet, showing the profit realized by the Bank on its note issues and security reserves. The Bank lends 22 millions without interest to the Treasury, and 6 millions to the National Banks. Hence there remains 57 millions out of its legal issue of 85 millions. These 57 millions Mr. Taguchi accounts for thus, according to the system now actually in operation:—

Lent to Specie Bank, 20 millions at 2 per cent.	Yen.
Invested in Public Bonds, 31 millions at 5 per cent.	200,000
Lent to the public, 16 millions at 7 per cent.	1,550,000
Total	1,750,000
Total	2,870,000

Now, if the legal note issue be increased to 120 millions, as proposed by the Government, the Bank will have an additional 35 million yen to lend to the public, and since 35 millions at 7 per cent. produce 2,450,000 yen, the total profit of the Bank becomes 5,320,000 yen. The Upper House proposes to impose a tax of 1 per cent. on all the Bank's note issues, apart from the 28 millions which it is obliged to lend to the Government and the National Banks without interest; in other words, a tax of 1 per cent. on 92 million yen. Deducting that amount, there would still remain to the Bank 4,400,000 yen, which is certainly a handsome figure for an institution with only 30 millions of paid-up capital. It appears that the public share this view, for the prospect of the tax has not impaired the market value of the Bank's 200 yen shares: they were quoted at 328 on the 16th January, and they are now selling at 355.

THE POLICY OF PRIVACY.

The Fiji Shimpō has devoted much of its space recently to a campaign in the interests of the decencies of life. It takes for theme the social evil as seen in Japan and extra-marital relations as sanctioned, or tolerated, by Japanese usages. There is no suggestion of radical reform. All that our contemporary hopes is to see some deference paid to les convenances. "If you must do these things," it says, in effect, to its countrymen, "do them at least in secret. Respect the dictates of fair fame. Banish your priestesses of humanity to places where they shall be beyond the ken of the general public, and keep your family and your friends ignorant of your lapses from matrimonial fidelity." That is subtly conceived counsel. If only the necessity, or the expediency, of concealment were recognised, public opinion would have made a long stride towards non-denying the thing concealed. We may add, here, another item to the score of debts owed by Japan to foreign intercourse. The Fiji pleads for a more respectable record coram the Occidental observers whom the inauguration of mixed residence will bring upon the scene. We ourselves doubt whether it will bring many—not at first, at any rate—but we have no desire to weaken the force of our contemporary's appeal. Morality in the West has certainly one advantage as compared with morality in Japan: its sense of shame is more highly developed. Some things may be excused on the ground that they are natural. A great deal has been made of that point by apologists for certain Japanese customs. But, after all, nature is absolutely immolent, and it were an ugly business to accept her teaching implicitly in that respect. The farther we can remove ourselves from nature in some things, the better.

PATENTS.

The new Law of Patents has now passed both Houses of the Diet. In the Lower House it received no amendments. We observe that Mr. Silver Hall, who appears to have made a special study of the subject, addressed to the Japan Times a letter containing some useful suggestions. Owing to delay in publishing his letter, it did not see the light until after the Bill had emerged from its committee stage in the Upper House, and apparently his suggestions have not attracted attention in the Lower. We allude to the subject for the sake of recommending that anyone interested in a Bill which has reached either House, might sometimes be acting wisely if he forwarded suggestions direct to the chairman, or to some member, of the Special Committee appointed to report upon the measure. As to the nature of the reception they would have, we can not say anything confidently, but Japanese officials or legislators generally adopt a very liberal attitude towards advice tendered in an earnest spirit and possessing some value.

MARQUIS ITO ON THE ELECTION BILL.

There is an association called the Senkyō-hō kaisei kisei-Dōmei-kai, or Society for Effecting Reforms of the Law of Elections, and there is another association called the Zenkoku Kakushū-in Itō-Kōshō-kai, or Society of Committee-men of the various towns throughout the country for conferring with Marquis Ito. These two formidably entitled bodies had a meeting on the 20th instant, and listened to a very interesting address from Marquis Ito—interesting chiefly because it shows the ideas by which the Marquis was guided in framing the present election system and the ideas which he thinks ought to guide the present Cabinet and the political parties in recasting it. At the time of framing the system, the Marquis said, there was no practical experience to refer to, and Japan's juriconsults could only follow their own estimate of what would be likely to prove suitable. Looking abroad, they saw different methods pursued in different countries, and it appeared to them that in the absence of any distinct clue, the best plan was to make the business of election and the system of the franchise as simple as possible. They did not anticipate, and could scarcely have anticipated, the abuses which practical experience has revealed—the lavish outlay of money, the appeals to physical force, and other defects. The tendency of the Japanese people to attach comparatively little value to life and property was, no doubt, partially responsible for the scenes witnessed at elections. Such a disposition might be very useful in a war with a foreign country, but it was rather out of place in domestic broils. The system, however, must be largely to blame, and its amendment was one of the pressing needs of the time. With regard to signed ballots, that rule had been adopted because the framers of the Constitution did not appreciate any necessity for secrecy in such a matter as the election of a member of parliament. They were mistaken. It would have been better to follow the example of England. John Stuart Mill, indeed, said in one of his books that no occasion whatever existed for making these things private, but another writer shrewdly remarked that Mill, in his excessive respect for the duties of a man towards the State, lost sight of his duties towards his wife and children. Experience has shown that Mill's critic was right. There could be no real liberty of opinion for the franchise-holder unless he was permitted to refrain from signing his ballot. The abuses of the Japanese system had almost become habitual, and since 1893 Marquis Ito had fully recognised the necessity of making some changes. Enumerating the points calling for reform, the first was the limited enjoyment of the franchise. Naturally caution had been the principle originally observed in framing the Law. The qualifications had been fixed at a high point, so as to have only 470,000 voters out of 40 millions of people. In the Bill submitted by the Ito cabinet to the last Diet, the number of franchise-holders had been quadrupled, becoming 1,700,000. That was still a small figure compared with other countries, but even in progress precipitancy was dangerous. The second point was that with only a few voters the election districts had naturally to be small, their size being further restricted by the imperfect machinery of communications then existing. With a comparatively numerous body of voters and greatly improved communications, the much more advantageous method of making each prefecture an electorate could be adopted. That brought them to the question of scrutin individuel and scrutin de liste. The latter had been more or less inevitable with small electorates, but so soon as the constituencies were extended, the system of scrutin individuel at once commended itself, as freeing electors from the despotism of political parties and conferring representation on minorities. Passing, then, to the representation of the industrial and mercantile classes, the Marquis said that society consisted of manufacturers and traders as well as of agriculturists. No one class should be set above the others in parliament. In that respect the present system was unjust. The Marquis frankly acknowledged that he had been mistaken originally. He had supposed that the urban population would be sufficiently represented by enfranchising the Shi (urban district containing at least 10,000 inhabitants), and he had combined the Cho (urban district containing 5,000 inhabitants or less) with the Gun (rural district). Experience had proved that a change was essential. The Diet was a place for discussing the interests of the whole nation, not those of any particular class. It would be most injurious to the country if the industrials and merchants were not fully represented in parliament, and indeed the comparative indifference shown by these two classes towards political affairs could not be too much regretted. The urban population of Japan aggregated to millions, and ought, therefore, to return twenty-five per cent. of the members of the Lower House. As an example of the ratio adopted in foreign countries, the case of Sweden might be quoted. There every ten thousand of the urban population returned one member, whereas every forty thousand of the rural population had only the same representation. According to the system now operative in Japan, 140,000 of the population elected one member, making a total of 300 members. The Ito bill of last year proposed to have 473 members, making one for 88,900 of the population; the Bill drafted by the present Cabinet contemplated 444 members, or one for 94,600 people; and the same bill as amended by the Lower House changed the number to 464, making a ratio of one for 90,500. So far as representation was concerned, any of these measures might be considered satisfactory, but there ought to be no sort of compromise about unsigned ballots. The principle of signed ballots was not put into practice in England, Germany, France, Switzerland, and twenty-one States of the American Republic.

The Marquis then proceeded to speak of constitutional government in general in Japan. He considered that excellent results had thus far been obtained when it was remembered how sudden had been the transition from feudalism to representative institutions. Nevertheless, if collisions between the Government and the Diet were to be perpetual, as they had hitherto been, the issue could only be injurious to the empire. In England, where the record of constitutional government extended back for 800 years, they could trace the transition from parliamentary government to Cabinet government, and from Cabinet government to individual government, that is to say, to government by a majority thoroughly disciplined and working collectively under one head. The reputation of party government as a working system, had been saved by England. Another remarkable feature of English politics was the expansion that the horizon of a member of parliament had undergone in modern times. Parochial interests used to occupy the attention of the members, but they now considered national interests before everything. Japan was entering the era of cabinet government, but before she could take her next step, she seemed to have urgent need of leaders for her parties. The present chiefs of parties did not sit in the Diet; did not direct or control their followers for parliamentary purposes, and were simply an influence exercised in camera. They ought at least to attend in the House and be their parties' mouth-piece. Some people objected to rapid progress, and said that every advance, to be sound, must be regular and deliberate. That was true, to a certain extent, but too much deliberation might beget abuses more formidable than the dangers of haste. The Marquis hoped that the country would march quickly towards the admirable results of parliamentary government displayed by the English system.

JAPANESE EMIGRATION.

In one or two instances, such as those of Thursday Island, Hawaii, and the disastrous case of Peru, public attention has been directed to Japanese emigration. But for many years past there has been a steady and quiet outflow of population which has certainly not attracted the notice it deserves. The Yimmia publishes an interesting and instructive table showing the number of Japanese subjects actually residing in certain foreign countries at the end of 1897:—

MR. ISOBE YAIICHIRO.

Mr. Isobe Yaiichiro, editor of the Chugai Yei Shimbu and principal of the Kokumin Yeiak-kai (National English-scholastic Society) is about to pay a visit to Europe and America, for the purpose of studying the condition of things in the Occident. As one of his brother-members in the Association of Japanese and Foreign Journalists we wish him bon voyage, and trust that his investigations abroad may equip him still better for the very useful career he has hitherto been pursuing in Japan.

WAKAMATSU AND HANYANG.

There seems to be truth in the rumour that the Viceroy Chang, acting at the suggestion of Sheng Taotai, has proposed to Japan a kind of coöperative arrangement, by which China will furnish to Japan a supply of iron for the uses of the new foundry at Wakamatsu, in Chikuzen, and Japan, in return, will supply coke for use at the Viceroy's Hanyang works. It is not to be a direct exchange, of course, but the idea presumably is that the ships which carry the iron to Japan will return laden with coke. Hanyang is badly off for coke, but has abundance of excellent iron. Japan has coke, but her iron is a doubtful quantity. This latter statement must be made with all reserve, however, for it has been most confidently and publicly asserted on good authority that no difficulty need be anticipated about a supply of iron for the new Japanese foundry. The subject was naturally discussed in the Diet when a large appropriation for building and equipping the foundry appeared among the accounts of the post-bellum programme. The Special Committee appointed to report upon the project enquired whether credence should be placed in the generally entertained supposition that stores of suitable iron ore were not known to exist in Japan, and received an official reply in the sense that, not only were ample quantities of ore available, but also the quality of the metal had been proved by careful experiments. On that hypothesis the scheme obtained parliamentary approval, and doubtless this Hanyang modification will suggest a new query, namely, whether experts who announced the deficiency of Japan's supply and vouched for its quality are found to have been mistaken, or whether, in spite of having iron of her own, Japan will find it advantageous to go abroad for the metal. So far as the mere economy of the Wakamatsu foundry is concerned, this new departure will probably make no marked difference. In choosing a site for the foundry, the Authorities had to determine whether the vicinity of the coal or that of the iron was the more important, since unfortunately the ore and the fuel are not found in juxtaposition in Japan. The decision was in favour of carrying the ore to the fuel rather than the fuel to the ore, and we do not doubt that it was a wise decision in view of the disastrous experiences garnered at Kamaishi twenty-three years ago. The site, then, having been selected at Wakamatsu in Chikuzen, it would have been necessary to transport the ore thither from the mines in the north of Japan, and thus the new programme merely substitutes Hanyang-fu for Iwate Prefecture as the source of supply. It is a question merely of a voyage across the Eastern Sea and up the Yangtze, or a voyage on the Pacific along the eastern coast of Japan. That phase of the enterprise, however, does not touch the problem of going to a foreign country for an article which can be obtained at home, above all when the main purpose of the whole enterprise is to make Japan independent of alien assistance in everything relating to the iron-and-steel branch of her national needs. Perhaps the quality of the Hanyang iron constitutes a special consideration; possibly, also, politics are concerned. There is talk of a Japanese Syndicate's lending the Viceroy Chang a sum of two million dollars to develop his Hanyang enterprise, the syndicate receiving in return, and by way of security, an iron mine in Hupeh. According to present indications, China's regeneration, if it comes at all—which we have always doubted and do still most strongly doubt—will come from the south, and the Viceroy Chang will be the chief regenerator. Chang has shown a strong disposition to be friendly with Japan, and, what is still more important, has evinced a genuine appreciation of Japan's new civilization. It is sound policy for this country to assist him, inasmuch as every success he achieves along the lines of Western progress will strengthen his hands and tend to popularize the systems he represents. Of course the possession of an iron mine in Hupeh would bring Japan most unequivocally into the Yangtze Valley, but the only European Power possessing any title to object to her presence there, is not in the least likely to enter a protest. Meanwhile it must be confessed that the romantic side of the iron-foundry enterprise is forcing itself very prominently into observation. The foundry and its correlated works—among the latter being included some rather extensive improvements of Wakamatsu harbour—now stands in the estimates for 20 million yen, in round figures, and two millions more must be provided if this Hanyang project is consummated. Putting Hanyang aside, however, it is evident that the products of the foundry will be saddled with a first charge of over a million yen annually, on account of capital invested. In other words, some ten per cent. must be added to cost of manufacture before the output of the foundry can be quoted in comparison with foreign goods. That is the romantic side of the project—the price that Japan is prepared to pay for being independent.

THE INDUSTRIAL BANK.

The Industrial Bank of Japan held its third general meeting on the 18th instant. The President, Mr. Kawashima, in addressing the shareholders, said that they could congratulate themselves on a record much more favourable than might have been expected. The Bank had passed through a most difficult phase of its career. Organized on a system made up of selecting parts from both the French and the German methods of credit mobilier, it might be described as an institution of an altogether special character, quite distinct from companies formed merely for purposes of gain or for conducting ordinary operations of trade. Its officers were, consequently, new to the work, and had no trustworthy precedents to guide them, while, on the other hand, any serious error at the outset might fatally discredit an institution which, however novel, seemed likely to play an important and useful part in the national economy. In addition to these difficulties, they had been obliged to face very bad times, so that they might be compared to men who, without any experience of navigation, were required to take charge of a ship, equip her fully, and steer her to port in stormy weather over rough seas. Happily they had reached their first haven safely and he was able to submit to them a favourable report. They had received numerous applications for loans, and had actually lent sums aggregating 7 million yen, which was a satisfactory figure, all things considered. The dividend, 5 per cent., might have been made larger, but it had been deemed wise to carry considerable sums to the reserve, so as to place the Bank's affairs on a sound footing, and also to pay off, at once, the expenses incurred on account of starting and organizing the enterprise.

The account for the half year stood thus:—

Gross Earnings.....	Yen. 263,744
Government Subsidy	41,415
Total	305,159
Expenses and Losses	228,604
Net Profit	76,555
To Reserve against losses (75%) ..	Yen. 57,416
To Reserve for equalizing dividends (25%)	19,139
Dividend, 5 per cent.	76,555

One of the shareholders, Mr. Kuroda, objected to this account, first on the ground that the Bank had employed unfair discrimination in granting loans, and secondly because he considered that the Treasury should make a larger grant in aid. He moved that a committee be appointed to investigate the matter, but the meeting rejected his proposal and passed the accounts.

STATE PURCHASE OF PRIVATE RAILWAYS.

The Government, recognising the impossibility of ignoring the Representation voted by the Lower House with regard to the State purchase of the principal private railways, has presented to the House a supplementary budget, providing a sum of 11,182 yen, to cover the expenses of a committee for investigating the subject. The committee will be composed, it is said, of the principal officials whose Departments or Sections would be concerned in the scheme, and a number of members of both Houses of the Diet. That means, evidently, that no step in the sense of introducing a Bill will be taken during the present session of the Diet. The session closes on the 6th of March, presumably, so that there are just thirteen working days left. Even if the Bill were already drafted, its passage through the two Houses would be more than problematical. And who can tell how radically the conditions may not have changed by next December? There is no doubt that the four railways in question are worth a very large sum. Although the capital invested in them is less than a hundred million yen, they are yielding a net return of over seven millions, which will be considerably increased when the system is completely constructed and all the connexions made, and which might be still further increased if improvements were effected in the organization of the traffic. Foreign capitalists would very readily advance 140 or 150 million yen on the security of the four lines, provided that their earnings were hypothecated for a term of years, and their business management placed in competent hands. But their mere transfer to the State in return for interest-bearing domestic bonds is a transaction that has little to recommend it. Rumour now alleges that the principal shareholders of the Tanko Railway Company also are starting a propaganda to get their line included in the scheme of State purchase. It is not difficult to see why they desire such a step. For though, at their last general meeting, a dividend of 15 per cent. was declared, their old 50 yen shares are selling for only 93 yen, and their new 28 yen debentures command only 68 yen. On a purchasing basis of 5 per cent., the State would have to pay 150 yen for the old shares, and shareholders would find themselves very comfortably situated.

A Council of 25 members, a President, and a Vice-President have been instituted by Imperial Ordinance, for the purpose of investigating the question of the State purchase of private railways. It is to be under the supervision of the Minister President of State; by him the President, Vice-President, and members will be appointed after obtaining the Emperor's sanction, and to him the results of its deliberations are to be reported. The members are to be high-class officials, civil and military, and persons having expert knowledge of railway matters or experience in their working. It is difficult to interpret the exact significance of this step. It may mean the shelving of the question, or it may indicate a practical resolve on the part of the Government. We doubt, however, whether any Japanese Cabinet will have a life long enough to carry out such a scheme, unless things alter considerably in the political arena.

THE TANKO RAILWAY COMPANY.

The principal shareholders of the Tanko Railway Company are:—

	SHARES.
The Imperial Estates Bureau.....	18,460
Mr. Amenomiya K.....	11,881
Mr. Tanaka Shinichi	9,319
Mr. Tanaka Heihachi	9,140
The Tanaka Bank	6,946
Mr. Amenomiya S	6,149

The market value of the Company's old 50-yen shares is now 93.13 yen, so our readers can calculate for themselves the monetary equivalent of the above holdings. There are several owners of from 5,000 to 6,000 shares, but we need not enumerate them.

EMOLUMENTS OF MEMBERS OF THE DIET.

Vernacular newspapers allege that the Bill, or Representation, for increasing the emoluments of members of the Diet has obtained 240 or 250 supporters in the Lower House. What a chance the Progressists have thrown away in this matter! If they had stood forth boldly as opponents of the measure, they would have risen enormously in public estimation. So far as folks in general can perceive, they are occupying themselves with disputes about the maximum limit that should be fixed for State expenditures—disputes of a purely academical character, for the Progressists are not in a position to give effect to their decision, whatever form it may take. But if they had grasped this question of increased emoluments, and constituted themselves implacable opponents of a step which they can not endorse without bringing ridicule on their professions of economical motives, the barometer of their political fortunes would have gone up to "set fair" right away. On the contrary, they are among the 240 or 250 supporters. Truly a fine opportunity thrown away.

RESPECT PAID TO SCHOLARSHIP.

The latest complaint journalistically ventilated is that too much respect is paid to learning. It is interesting to observe the various revolts caused in Japan by the supremacy of any particular class of public men. For many years, the cry was against "class influence." Political agitators talked all the time of hambatsu, until really it began to appear as though the men who had made modern Japan must be mysterious malefactors of the deepest dye because they happened to belong to one or other of the leading clans. Administrative power was then obtained by party politicians, and in an incredibly short space of time their preponderance also provoked rebellion. The columns of newspapers and the speeches of publicists became so eloquent with condemnations of tōbatsu that a reaction was nearly created in favour of the departed era of hambatsu. And now, finally, when neither hambatsu nor tōbatsu can be said to present noticeable dimensions, voices are raised against gakubatsu, or the sway of scholarship. He is nothing, we are told, who is not a graduate of the Imperial University, and to be a graduate is to have a passport to public respect, official appointments and business consideration. The result is that men are content to have graduated, and never care to climb higher than the pinnacle reached on the day when their alma mater dubs them gakushi. It does not sound very serious, that lamentation. We suspect that the philosopher who contributed it to the columns of the Asahi lives under the shadow of a Sourgrape Vine.

HOKKAIDO.

A curious apprehension is suggested about Hokkaido. It is called the "second problem of Hokkaido," and it is based upon the prosaic fact that the northern island lacks fertilizers. When the colonization of Hokkaido commenced in earnest a quarter of a century ago, under the auspices of the Kaitakushi and Count Kuroda, the immigrants from Japan proper found lands that had been lying fallow for centuries. Of course one had only to use a mattock and a handful of seed to get a fine crop. But this reserve of fertility was not inexhaustible. The yield steadily declined, until, by and by, the soil gave no adequate return for the labour of the cultivator. Then the latter turned to coal digging, or simply transferred his agricultural attention to districts still offering virgin soil. There would not have been anything particularly objectionable in the breaking of new ground, had not the old been left on the hands of the Agricultural and Industrial Banks which had given accommodation to the farmers. It is alleged that the Banks now find themselves minus their money and plus certain landed estates which are quite valueless as securities. There is probably some exaggeration in the statement, but it has its interest. Another source of uneasiness is the decline of the fishing industry. Hokkaido depends chiefly upon its fisheries, and their yield is said to be diminishing year by year in a marked degree. The fisheries, too, may be said to have been virgin soil twenty-five years ago, but since then they have been exploited ruthlessly if not recklessly.

FUNERAL SERVICE FOR HIS EXCELLENCY THE LATE
M. FAURE.

High Mass was performed at the Tsukiji Cathedral in Tokyo on the 23rd instant at half-past ten in the forenoon, for the late President of the Republic of France. The Cathedral was impressively draped, and a profusion of beautiful flowers covered the catafalque. A great concourse of distinguished personages assembled. Among them were representatives of the Emperor and Empress, Imperial Princes, Ministers of State, the Members of the Foreign Corps Diplomatique, and almost all the principal Japanese and foreign residents of Tokyo, as well as several from Yokohama. There was also a large body of troops, who stood outside the Cathedral with reversed arms during the service. As a tribute of respect to the memory of a Chief Magistrate who deserved well of his country, and who died at his post in the discharge of duties rendered painfully arduous by the troublous circumstances of his time, this demonstration could scarcely have been more unanimous and impressive. We do not doubt that, together with prayers for the peace of the departed statesman's soul, many a supplication was sent up that the unrest from which his great country now suffers may soon be replaced by an era of profound calm, so that France may once more have leisure to lead the world along the path of artistic progress.

POPULAR REPRESENTATION IN JAPAN.

We ventured recently to express the opinion that the Government's proposal to extend the franchise largely, and to introduce an election system in accordance with the most enlightened modern theories, would fall to the ground, for this session of the Diet at all events. The prediction seems likely to be fulfilled, but the causes are not exactly what we had anticipated. Our belief was that the Lower House would pass the Government's Bill with amendments such as could not be accepted by the Upper; or that, even if both Houses, after a conference, succeeded in elaborating an agreement, the measure would be so mutilated in the process as to defy the Government's endorsement. But that is not what has immediately happened. The curious, and, in Japanese parliamentary procedure, unprecedented, fact is that the Bill "stuck" temporarily in its passage through the Lower House. When the Special Committee presented its report, on the 22nd inst., the Representatives rejected the suggestion of the majority of the Committee as well as that of the minority, and refused to read the Bill a second time in either its original or its amended form. Under ordinary circumstances that would have meant the final demise of the measure. But the House did not want to kill it outright. They wanted merely to bury it in its official ceremonies, and resurrect it in garments of their own tailoring. Such, at least, is the inference suggested by their proceedings. For while refusing to vote the crucial clause in any of the proposed forms, they voted that they wished to have it in some form or other; and, while refusing to read the Bill a second time as drafted by the Government or altered by the Committee, they voted that they wished to read it in a new hand-writing. Perhaps we ought at this point to explain exactly what constitutes the crux of the situation. There is, of course, a difference of opinion about the property qualification, and there is also a difference of opinion about the comparative representation of urban and rural populations. But these are minor points, capable of easy compromise. The really fundamental questions are whether ballots shall be signed or unsigned, and whether each voter shall write upon his ballot the name of one candidate only, or whether he shall write upon it the names of as many candidates as the district returns. Concerning the question of signed or unsigned ballots, the political parties are united against the Government. The latter advocates unsigned ballots, and will probably advise the Emperor to withhold his consent from any project of law which prescribes signature. The parties, however, being agreed on the subject, that particular problem did not constitute an obstruction to the passage of the Bill through the Lower House, though it is likely to constitute an obstruction to the final enactment of the measure. Thus the real difficulty centred upon scrutin individuel and scrutin de liste. Both the great political parties are unwilling to resort to the system of scrutin individuel, since, especially when supplemented by unsigned ballots, it practically frees voters from all the restraints of political organizations, and leaves them at liberty to exercise the franchise exactly as their conscience dictates. The Liberals, however, were not minded to maintain an inflexibly obdurate attitude towards this question. Their leaders advocated a compromise in the sense of limited scrutin de liste. They proposed that each voter should write on his ballot the names of one half of the number of members to be returned, when that number is even, and the names of the greater moiety when the number is odd. The Progressists, on the other hand, advocated, at the outset, scrutin de liste pure and simple, without any limitations; but, when they found the Liberals unyielding, they offered to compromise on the basis of a mutual advance and retreat, namely, the Liberal limit being raised from one-half to two-thirds, and the Progressist cipher being changed to one third. The compromise failed, and when the Special Committee presented its report, it was found that the Liberal majority of the Committee-men recommended the one-half limit, and the Progressist minority advocated scrutin de liste without restriction of any kind. It was then that the unexpected happened. Each of the parties had discussed the matter fully outside the Diet, and each had agreed, not only to treat it as a party question, every member being thus pledged to follow his party leaders; but also to vote in the sense explained above. The Progressists seem to have adhered to the programme, and probably the Liberals did so too. But apparently neither side had reckoned sufficiently on the attitude of the Independents. These latter, or, at any rate, a majority of them, have voted steadily with the Liberals throughout the present session, their principal political object, as sober men of affairs, being to compose the parliamentary strifes which have so greatly hindered national progress during the past ten years. The election problem, however, touches them very closely. The Lower House, as at present constituted, contains an immense preponderance of agricultural representatives. There are 251 members returned by rural districts, and only 49 returned by urban districts. On the other hand, the urban population of the empire aggregates 10 millions, in round numbers, so that, from a merely arithmetical standpoint, to say nothing of superior education, intelligence, and wealth, the urban districts ought to return 75 members in a House of 300. The explanation of the inequality is that the framers of the Constitution took 100,000 as the minimum enfranchisable unit of urban population, thus excluding a large number of towns which may fairly claim the right of returning a member. The Government now proposes a system under which the urban and rural districts would be entirely independent, for election purposes, and each urban district would elect one member for the first fifty thousand of its population, with an additional member for every additional eighty thousand, or fraction of eighty thousand. The rural districts, on the other hand, would elect one member for the first 120,000 of population, and an additional member for every additional eighty thousand, or fraction thereof. That would raise the membership of the Lower House to 445, and would give 98 seats to the urban population, a reasonable ratio, though still low. The Liberals, on their side, while willing to make the urban districts independent, decline to endorse any numerical differentiations in their favour, and insist that each urban and each rural district should return one member for the first 100,000 of its population, with an additional member for each 80,000 additional inhabitants, or fraction of 80,000 not less than 50,000. That would raise the membership of the Lower House to 470 and would give 76 seats to the urban population. In other words, whereas the ratio ought to be 3 rural members for 1 urban, it would be more than 5 to 1, according to the Liberal plan. We may note that, in one respect, the Liberal programme seems better than the official, for whereas the latter sets no inferior limit to the "fraction of 80,000" returning an additional member, the former fixes a limit of 50,000. It is conceivable that, according to the Government's scheme, a difference of one person in the population of a district might entitle it to return an additional member. Apart from these details, however, the broad fact is that whereas the Government proposes to have a House containing one urban representative for every three rural, approximately, the Liberals plan a House containing one urban representative for five rural. In short, although the number of urban representatives in the House, according to the Liberals' project, would be raised from 49 to 76, the proportion of urban members to rural would remain virtually unaltered, as will be seen by comparing the ratios $\frac{49}{251}$ and $\frac{76}{294}$. Accordingly, the Liberals appear to have found themselves suddenly deserted by their Independent friends. These, being strong enough to turn the scale whether they voted with the Liberals or the Progressists, were able to defeat the amendments proposed by the Liberal majority of the Committee as well as those proposed by the Progressist minority, but were not strong enough to carry the Government Bill which both Liberals and Progressists opposed. In the face of this difficulty the Liberals and Progressists came together, and the former having accepted the latter's proposal to compromise by limiting the scrutin de liste to two-thirds, the amended Bill was once more introduced in the Lower House on the 23rd, and rapidly passed, the Independents being, of course, quite powerless against the combined forces of the Liberals and Progressists. Thus the Bill goes up to the Peers, practically deprived of all the improvements it originally embodied. Its fate is sealed, too, in all probability. We do not see how it can be pushed through the two Houses this session, since only 7 working days remain. It looks as if this matter were likely to drift into a groove similar to that in which press-law revision stuck for so many years. Reform is urgently called for, but the majority in the Lower House can not bring itself to accept any measure of reform endurable by the other branch of the Legislature and the Government.

THE LAWS OF PATENTS, TRADE MARKS, AND DESIGNS.

The House of Representatives certainly made a record on the 17th instant when it passed three bills en bloc without a semblance of debate. The bills embodied projects of patent law, of trademark law, and of designs law, every one of them subjects concerning which more or less exhaustive discussion might have been expected from careful legislators. The session is drawing to its close, and the enactment of these laws is required to fulfil the engagements contracted by the country in the Revised Treaties. Possibly that reflection influenced the House, and induced it to accept without demur every provision of three long bills, and every amendment made in them by the Peers. We can well understand that if there is any genuine desire on the part of parliament to have a new code of laws put into operation, the members may shrink from amendments which, if once commenced, would probably prove unending. But that consideration scarcely applied to the three Bills in question. The House's attitude towards them goes to confirm the criticisms recently published by vernacular journals, namely, that the Representatives have become imbued with a spirit of perfunctoriness, and that the nation in beginning to regard their debates with indifference and even distrust. The Peers are making a much better record. In penning these comments, however, we must warn our readers that our own columns do not convey anything like an adequate idea of what actually takes place in the Houses. The exigencies of space, and also the limits of the editor's capacity—for he is obliged to prepare all these reports himself—compel us to give a mere outline of the business accomplished, emphasizing only the points that seem of special interest to foreigners. Readers of the Official Gazette, where everything is set down verbatim, receive a very different impression of the Diet's proceedings. Another point worth noting is that the committee system, though it conduces enormously to the discharge of business, tends greatly to discount debate. Before a bill comes up for its first reading, every member has had a printed copy of it in his hands for several days, and to every bill there is appended an exposé of motives which clearly sets forth the purpose and reasons of the proposed legislation. Then, when the bill is read, a speech is delivered by its introducer—a Minister of State or Government Delegate in the case of an official bill; a representative of the signatories in the case of a private bill. At this stage questions are asked in elucidation, and finally the measure is handed to a special committee, which devotes days, many or few, to its investigation, collects information with regard to it from the Government and the proposers, and at last compiles a minute report which is printed, circulated among the members, and left in their hands for at least two days before being presented to the House in session. When the report does come up for presentation, the chairman of the special committee makes an explanatory statement, an interval of questioning follows, and then, at last the debate preparatory to the second reading is opened. If after the debate the second reading is voted, another period of two days is usually suffered to intervene before the reading, though it may be taken at once if the House so wills. Of course, by the time that the bill reaches its second reading, every member has pretty well made up his mind about it, and the need for debate is greatly diminished. In fact, the talking and questioning is done almost completely in the committee rooms, and as the members have full stenographic reports of the committees' proceedings, they probably find that there is little to add in the majority of instances. Still, even when all these facts have been taken into consideration, it does seem that the debates are unduly abbreviated. There is in the Lower House a highly respected and most practical gentleman, Mr. Tsunematsu Riukei, who goes by the name of Shinko Gûm, on the "Member for Progress." His chief function is to move "that the second reading be taken at once," or "that the third reading be dispensed with." Not a day passes that does not see Mr. Tsunematsu on his feet half a dozen times or more. He acts like a kind of machine, and the House, recognising his great usefulness, accepts his suggestions in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred. Mr. Tsunematsu is a serviceable product of the Japanese parliamentary system, but the mechanically regular style of his methods seems to be hypnotising the House. A few days ago, when two long speeches had been delivered on an important measure—the Representation for nationalizing private railways—he stood up and said:—"One speech for and one against. That is the ordinary rule. I move the closure;" and the House voted the closure without attempting to query his peculiar codification of its procedure. Two speeches may often be quite enough. A little of that brevity might be introduced into other parliaments with advantage. But there is one thing to be remembered. It is the educating influence of a parliamentary debate. We do not believe that the interest of the British nation in politics could be sustained for a twelvemonth, or, indeed, that it would ever have been awakened, without the parliamentary debate, the effect of which is to present to the people the most abstruse subjects dressed in noble thoughts and adorned by the best eloquence of the time. In Japan there is virtually nothing of the kind. The Official Gazette alone publishes verbatim reports of the debates, and the Official Gazette has no circulation among the people at large, while as for the debates, they are becoming so brief and so matter-of-fact that an ordinary reader can find nothing to invite his perusal of them. If even the debates held in the Committee rooms were published by the press, there would be a better idea of the legislature's work, but they are not published, and under the circumstances it appears very natural that the public begins to regard the Diet with little interest, if not with absolute weariness.

SILK.

The two Houses of the Diet have unanimously adopted Representations urging the Government to organize associations, or guilds, which shall inquire into sericultural methods, and seek to improve them. All details are left for official elaboration, but the spokesmen of the introducers of the Representations—Mr. Furuhata in the Lower Chamber and Prince Nijo in the Upper—were very explicit about the objects they desired to see accomplished. Evidently they had conferred together on the question, and had agreed, in common with the other signatories of the Bills, that, owing to faulty methods of sericulture and of reeling, Japanese silk is so defective from the manufacturer's point of view as to be in danger of rejection by Europe and America, except for the purpose of supplementing a deficient crop in France or Italy. These are exactly the points to which attention was drawn in our leading columns last month, on the strength of views expressed by a correspondent of long experience in the silk trade. We do not pretend, of course, that our article had anything to do with the drafting of the Representations, but we may fairly express great satisfaction at the useful course taken by the Diet, and may also note the virtual identity between the opinions advanced by our correspondents and those laid before the two Houses of the Diet. Beyond doubt this matter is of the most vital importance to Japan, and the course pursued by the Government with regard to these Representations will be closely observed. To us it seems, we need scarcely say, that what is essentially needed is the aid of a few experienced foreigners to indicate the defects in Japanese methods and to show how they can be corrected. The Government conferred an inestimable boon on the country twenty-five years ago by establishing the Tomioka filature, engaging a staff of Italian and French experts to give practical instruction there, and opening the doors of the filature to a number of Japanese sericulturists, who visited the place in succession, carrying away knowledge which has brought tens of millions of yen into Japan. Those were the days of really sensible progressive effort, when the Japanese, true to the liberal spirit that had animated their forefathers centuries previously, did not shrink from free recourse to foreign assistance, and did not forget the venerable Chinese adage that the wise man is never ashamed to ask a question. We can not pretend to think that the present generation is equally large-minded or far-seeing, but we may be permitted to hope that in this matter of sericulture the Government will not hesitate to do what is right, in the interests of a staple which constitutes the back-bone of the country's export trade.

OFUNADO HARBOUR.

The latest project is to make Ofunado a port for foreign and domestic trade, and to connect it by railway with the Japan Railway Company's system. Ofunado is a place of which the majority of our readers probably know nothing. It is in the Kesen district of Iwate Prefecture; that is to say, on the north-east coast of Japan and within easy reach of the country's principal iron mines. But apparently the port has been selected, not on account of the iron mines, but with a view to the results of the opening of the Siberian Railway. The idea is that there must be some harbour in the north-east for the purposes of the trade which the railway will bring to Vladivostok. Hakodate has proved defective, and Matsu-shima could not be prepared without a heavy outlay, whereas Ofunado wants a pier only. A company has been formed to carry out the project. Its promoters appear to be all members of the House of Representatives—Messrs. Shimoiaki Gonzaburo, Sato Shozo, Kikuchi Kuro, Amenomiya Keijiro, and so on.

RAILWAY AND TELEGRAPH RATES.

The new rates which are to be charged on the Government Railways from April 1st, if not sooner, are said to be as follow, for third-class passengers:—

Up to 50 miles	1.5 sen per mile.
From 50 to 100 miles.....	1.3 " " "
From 100 to 200 miles.....	1.1 " " "
Above 300 miles.....	0.7 " " "

With regard to telegrams, the charge will be 20 sen for a message of 15 Kana syllables, including the name of the sender but excluding the name and address of the recipient, and 5 sen for every additional 5 syllables, or part of 5 syllables. Within the limits of Tokyo, the rate will be 10 sen for 15 syllables, and 3 sen for every additional 5 syllables. According to official calculation these changes in telegraph rates signify an increase of 35 per cent. on the average.

MEDIATION IN THE PHILIPPINES.

The suggestion is again put forward by the Hochi Shimbun that Japan should mediate between the Filipinos and the Americans. It is based on three considerations: first, that this country is on eminently friendly terms with both the people of the United States and the insurgents; secondly, that the effects of the war will be felt by Japan more than by any other Power; and thirdly, that this country would be acting wisely did it seize the opportunity to dispel the peace-disturbing reputation that attaches to it since the war with China. The idea seems highly commendable. The Filipinos, as the Hochi justly observes, do not aim at complete independence, and the Americans have no desire to conquer them entirely. Both sides would be content to take a via media, if one were found for them, and Japan is well qualified to do the finding.

JUNKER STRING QUARTET CONCERT.

The second Chamber Concert by the Junker String Quartet was given on Wednesday evening in the Vestibule of the Public Hall before a large audience. The performance does not call for any lengthy report: it was not up to the same high artistic level as the first concert given on 27th December, the absence of Professor von Koeber making a great difference in this respect. The pièces de résistance were two movements from Mozart's early String Quartet in E flat, and two movements from Beethoven's Piano Quartet in the same key. These lacked some cohesion, and the ensemble was not quite perfect. The remainder of the instrumental work consisted of sundry scraps, ancient and modern, arrangements and otherwise, which seemed to please the audience generally. Herr Junker displayed good tone and a cantabile style, in an uninteresting "Cavatina" by an obscure composer named Bohm; we would have preferred to hear him in some composition more worthy of his ability. Mrs. Payne, Mrs. Clarke, and Mr. Sulzer gave the necessary vocal relief by the solos put down for them—the first-named lady giving a fine rendering of a contralto solo by Brahms. Miss Poole made a charming first appearance at these concerts, and essayed the principal part in the Beethoven fragment. Altogether a very pleasant evening: and we hope for something better on the next occasion. Could we not be favoured with one complete work, either quartet or trio, before the series closes?

PROGRAMME.

PART I.

- 1—String Quartet in E flat Major.....MOZART.
Herr Junker, Messrs. Poole, F. Schmid, and R. Schmid.
- 2—Alto Solo....."Longing for rest".....BRANMS.
Mrs. W. T. Payne.
- 3—String Quartet—
(a) "Menuet".....HAYDN.
(b) "Erl'stact from "Mignon" THOMAS.
- 4—Tenor Solo....."Elegie".....MASSENET.
Mr. Sulzer.

PART II.

- 1—Quartet in E flat Major for Piano,
Violin, Viola, and Violoncello.....BEETHOVEN.
Miss Poole, Herr Junker, Mr. F. Schmid and Mr. R. Schmid.
- 2—Soprano Solo....."Ave Maria".....MASCAGNI.
Mrs. F. H. Clarke.
- 3—Violin Solo....."Cavatina".....BOHM.
Herr Junker.
- 4—String Quartet—
(a) "Song without words" Op. 17
MANDELSOHN.
(b) "Andante Cantabile" (by request)
TSCHAIKOWSKY.
(c) "Menuet".....BOCHERINI.

EDUCATION.

A very powerful movement is on foot to bring about an increase of State aid for education. The Representations presented to the Government by both Houses of the Diet have been already noticed in these columns, and we may add that the question is vigorously discussed by vernacular newspapers. The Tokyo journals show quite remarkable unanimity, and it is unlikely that the Government will neglect this wide-spread appeal. Indeed, there is every reason to suppose that the Government itself has the greatest desire to promote education, but its good intentions are effectually frustrated by want of funds. The Houses of the Diet, however, do not trouble themselves greatly about the financial difficulties lying in the way of their various projects. They vote, with a light heart, Representations and Bills for granting State aid to one enterprise or abolishing the tax on another, as if the Treasury had some infallible recipe for making ends meet. The Fiji Shimpō observes that it would be a mistake to speak of Japan's expenditure on education as a petty sum. The outlays in connexion with public schools aggregate 18 million yen and the Treasury's disbursements amount to 3 millions, while the sums privately spent must make a very large total. But the Fiji does not adduce these facts for the purpose of opposing the increased effort urged by the Diet and the press. It is wholly in favour of that effort. It takes the opportunity, however, of vehemently denouncing the conservative, anti-foreign spirit imbuving educationists. Their conduct, it says, is radically opposed to the national policy, as enunciated by the Emperor himself, and is entirely at variance with the fine liberalism and wisdom of the Japanese nation in old times.

A SPARK EXTINGUISHER.

Several inventions have been talked of lately, but they belong, chiefly, to the domain of military science. We now read that Mr. Kobayashi Shokichi, an engineer on the staff of the Japan Railway Company, has devised what is called a hwafunshiki; that is say, an instrument for fastening to the chimneys of locomotive engines with the object of extinguishing the sparks that come from them. These sparks have been the cause of more than one conflagration in Japan, and their dangerous potentialities having been recognised in foreign countries attempts have been made to find some contrivance for rendering them innocuous as they emerge. It was reserved for Mr. Kobayashi to succeed—so, at least, we are told by a Tokyo contemporary—and he has patented his invention. No particulars are given.

YOKOHAMA RECREATION GROUND.

The question of the Yokohama Recreation Ground, or Public Garden,—part of which is used by the Y.C. & A.C.—is apparently again coming to the front. We translate the following paragraph from the Yomiuri:—

The Yokohama Park was opened mainly for the accommodation of foreigners at the beginning of the Meiji era, when the limits of the Settlement were fixed, and its use has been ever since almost confined to foreigners, Japanese visitors being considered more or less in the light of mere guests. When the new treaties came in force, however, the question will arise as to whether it is not a want of economy to maintain the Park. The land is valuable and the dimensions of the grounds are considerable. Some of the newly elected members of the City Assembly are in favour of transferring the Park to the municipality and of choosing another site elsewhere for the purposes of a recreation ground.

In the Admiralty Division, the owners of the Cromartyshire have been awarded the £6,000 damages claimed by them from the French Transatlantic Company. Mr. Justice Barnes and the Trinity Masters held that La Bourgoigne was alone to blame for the collision, and that she was travelling at an excessive speed considering the foggy weather. The captain of the Cromartyshire had done all he could to avoid the disaster.

THE UNITED STATES & JAPAN.

NOTES and paragraphs appearing from time to time in vernacular newspapers show that there is a great deal of uneasiness about the results of American rule being established in the Philippines and Hawaii. We can not wonder that such should be the case. The United States represents the closed door in its most obdurate form. What between tariffs for protection and tariffs for revenue, interdicts in the field of coasting trade and vetoes upon the immigration of Oriental labourers, America closes her portals most effectively in the face of all foreign comers. Japan has nearly thirty thousand of her people in Hawaii, where they earn an honest living by hard labour, assist materially in developing the resources of the island, send considerable sums every year to their friends and relatives at home, and create a growing market for Japanese commodities. Under American sway that healthy movement of immigration will be checked. Already there are signs of the usual agitation—the agitation fomented in selfish interests by that curse of the nineteenth century, the news-monger. In Hawaii's case there is a different kind of investigator. A certain Mr. RICE, who appears to have been appointed for the purpose of collecting information and conveying it to Washington, is represented as having reported that the Japanese Emigration Societies are pouring labourers by the thousand into Hawaii, in anticipation of the enforcement of restrictive laws a few months hence. If Mr. RICE has forwarded any such report, it must be based on mere hearsay, for had he made investigations in loco he would know that the Japanese labourers for whose emigration arrangements are now in progress do not total even one thousand. That point, however, is unimportant compared with the absolute veto which will be imposed on the importation of Japanese labour when American sway is finally exercised in Hawaii. It has always been possible to sympathise, more or less, with the disposition of the people of America to legislate against the invasion of the field of labour by races living on a lower scale and content to work for wages which would not keep body and soul together in a white man. But in Hawaii there is no question of such competition. Japanese labourers are wanted to do work which white men cannot do, and which, in default of Oriental labour, must be left undone. That America, in the face of such facts, should extend her restrictive legislation to Hawaii disturbs the Japanese, not merely on account of Hawaii itself, but because it suggests the inference that a similarly indiscriminating policy may be pursued with regard to the foreign trade of the Philippines. Japan's commerce with the Philippines grew from 210,000 yen in 1888 to 2,670,000 yen in 1897. It is not a very large sum, but the rate of development is remarkable, and the possible destruction of the business can not be viewed with equanimity.

FORMOSA.

WE observe that a plea is advanced on behalf of the officials administering Formosa. The public is admonished not to pass precipitate judgments. Great difficulties must have been encountered by any Power attempting to manage the affairs of an island so singularly circumstanced, and it was not to be expected that signal results could be achieved in a short time. There is justice in such a comment. No one can be blind to the fact that political agitators have sought to make capital out of Formosa, and have even gone the length of suggesting that foreign interference might be expected if things were not managed more adroitly. That is, of course, an extravagant apprehension. England is the power chiefly concerned in Formosan trade, and England is not in the least likely to embarrass Japan by importunate or arbitrary demands. Neither are Englishmen impatient. They knew from experience that the quality of a work must be judged by the finished result, not by the preliminary processes. But it must be confessed that, though Englishmen are quite content to wait, they would wait with much greater confidence if they saw that Japan was following in Formosa the routes which have crowned British rule with success in all parts of the world. There may be other routes, royal routes, leading to the same goal, and their discovery may be reserved to Japanese wit, but the well-trodden, well-proved ways ought to be good enough, and certainly the new paths do not appear as yet to be leading Japan to happy results. Financially, the island is a heavy drain on the empire's exchequer. The official returns show that the revenues collected from 1895 to the end of the fiscal year 1899-00 will total 33 million yen, in round numbers, and the expenditures 116 millions, the Imperial Exchequer being consequently obliged to disburse a sum of 83 million yen. That is a heavy outlay in five years. There has certainly been a great improvement on the revenue side of the accounts, but equilibrium seems to be still very distant. The actual figures for the five-year period, omitting details, are these:—

FORMOSAN ACCOUNTS IN YEN.
	1895-6.	1896-7.	1897-8.
Expenditures	30,642,576	21,825,808	23,314,188

Revenue	8,121,504	9,067,244
Excess of Expenditures	10,840,020	12,121,597

We see from this table that the revenue is steadily growing. The expenditures, however, though they diminished perceptibly from 1895 to 1898, show an increase of over two millions in 1899. That is chiefly because the Government has resolved to undertake the fortification of the island at the charges of the Treasury, and to make such additional military outlays as shall secure, it is hoped, the maintenance of tranquillity. The total military outlays for 1899-00, including the building of fortifications, appear in the accounts as 8,769,111 yen and the naval outlays as 352,485 yen, the aggregate of the two being 9,121,597 yen. It appears, therefore, that the military and naval expenditures alone exceed the gross revenue of the island. Indeed, if we consider the ordinary expenditures only, it appears that while the army in Japan proper cost 28½ million yen for yearly maintenance, the troops and gendarmes Formosa cost 8½ millions, the new dominion being thus responsible for a military outlay more than one-third of that required for the rest of the empire. The Government has evidently made up its mind that Formosa will be a heavy item in the accounts during a considerable period, for in the financial programme from 1,900 to 1906, the Treasury's appropriations to the island are set down at 12 million yen annually. Productive enterprises are to be carried on with funds obtained by a loan of 52 million yen, sanction for which is now being sought from the Diet. Of course we may reasonably look forward to a considerable increase of the revenue collected in the island three or four years hence, but just at present Japan has to put her hand pretty deeply into her pocket.

Two leading journals, the Fimmin and the Kobumin, simultaneously plead for patience in judging the results of Japanese administration in Formosa, and also invite public opinion to support the scheme of productive expenditures now contemplated by the Government of the island. It is not a very extensive scheme—30 millions yen for railways; 15 millions for land surveys and assessment; 2 millions for harbour improvement; 1 million for water-works and 4 millions for offices and official residences; namely, 52 million yen in all. These outlays are to be spread over ten years, the minimum amount, 3½ millions, being spent next year (1899-00), and the maximum, 16 millions, in the year 1903-4. There are, nevertheless, opponents of any positive policy of development; men who think that the best plan is to let the island develop itself—a very comfortable kind of system were there the remotest probability of its success. Whatever Japanese optimists may say, foreign observers are unanimous in thinking that unless Japan goes to work more vigorously, she must expect Formosa to remain a heavy charge on her hands for many years to come. The Treasury anticipates being obliged to disburse 11 million yen for several years, but 9 millions of that total go to defray military and naval expenditures, and the remaining 3 millions are needed for expenditures which will not help materially to enrich the island or to develop its productive capacities. The Government, therefore, will have the approval of all foreigners in the resolute course it is now adopting. With regard to the method of obtaining the money, however, there may be differences of opinion. The first two installments of 3½ millions and 5 millions, respectively, will be provided by the Bank of Formosa in notes issued by that institution on the security of 4½ millions of silver yen lent to it without interest by the Treasury. But no provision is yet made for the succeeding installments, and we can only suppose that the Government hopes to find the domestic market capable of taking up Formosan loans from the year 1901-2 onwards, or that it intends to go on utilizing its remaining stocks of silver year by year in the manner planned for 1899-00 and 1900-01. To us the latter programme seems clever and sound, assuming that Formosa is to remain on a silver basis. But we observe with interest, and not without amusement, that Japanese financiers, though they acted with so much decision, not to say precipitancy, in committing their own country to gold monometallism, nevertheless appreciate the value of the silver standard for a nation exporting its products to the markets of gold-using States. It has often been suggested that fate has a special tenderness for Japan. This new dominion of hers, hitherto a white elephant, may now be made a dumping ground for her stocks of otherwise useless silver, to her relief and to Formosa's great advantage. The metal would otherwise have lain quite unserviceable in the Treasury's vaults, whereas it will henceforth discharge a wealth-producing function. The Government's forecast is that, after 15 million yen have been spent on the survey and re-assessment of the island, the yield of the land tax will be so greatly increased that 88 million yen may be appropriated from it during 45 years, from 1904 to 1948, for repaying a portion of the principal and interest of this 52 million yen loan. The aggregate disbursements on account of principal and interest will be 116½ million yen—supposing the amortization to be commenced in 1899 and finished in 1948—and if the land tax contributes 88 millions from 1904 onwards, the Customs will provide the remaining 28½ millions, during the forty-year period 1899—1940. We have here another example of the heroic methods so much affected by Japanese financiers. They work on the principle that loans must be paid off with the utmost possible celerity. In the case of Formosa, there is not to be even the usual brief period preparatory to amortization. Repayment is to commence from the very year when the loan begins to be contracted. Instead of waiting at least 5 years, until some of the objects on which the money is to be spent become revenue-producing, the process of amortization is to commence in the fiscal year 1899-00. If the whole loan of 52 millions were raised at once, we could understand this programme of repayment, though we might not endorse it, but how are we to account for a scheme which contemplates the receipt of installments varying from 3½ millions to 5 millions during the first four years and the simultaneous amortization of the debt at the average rate of 680,000 yen annually? If appears to us that the Government has an idea of making Formosa lend money to itself, and that we are in the presence here, not of an ordinary loan, but of a plan for giving the island a paper currency—convertible, of course, not fiat. If the Customs lodge 680,000 yen annually in the vaults of the Bank of Formosa from 1899-00 onwards, and if the Land-Tax Bureau lodges about 2 million yen annually from 1904-5 onwards, the vaults receiving, at the same time, ten or fifteen millions in silver bullion from the Treasury, there is no apparent reason why the Bank should not finance the whole loan, without any recourse to outside aid. The long and short of the matter is that the Government appears to have resolved that all increases of revenue obtained by direct or indirect taxation in Formosa shall go to develop the resources of the island during the next half-century, and that the mother country shall defray all military and naval expenditures in the new dominion. It will be very interesting to see how the Diet views this courageous programme.

IMPERIAL DIET.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 17TH.

HOUSE OF PEERS.

The House met at 10.30 a.m., and, having handed to the Budget Committee two Supplementary Budgets for 1898-9, with instructions to report on them by the 24th instant, accorded post-facto approval to eight extra-budget expenditures made in 1896-7.

NATIONALIZATION.

The Lower House's amendments of the Law of Nationalization were then considered. Mr. Hozumi, Government Delegate, strongly opposed the amendments, especially that which excluded marriage (as a niufu) from the catalogue of qualifications for obtaining Japanese nationality. Such legislation was contrary to the immemorial family system of Japan, and conflicted with Law No. 103 of 1873, which conferred on foreigners the privilege of becoming niufu, with the consent of the Home Minister. It would also conflict with the provisions of the Census Law. He begged the House to consider the question maturely, and to open a Conference with the Representatives even at the risk of deferring the passage of the Bill.

The House handed the Bill to a Special Committee, on the motion of Mr. Miyoshi Taizo.

BANKS, ETC.

The Government Bill (sent up from the Lower House) for amending the Agricultural, and Industrial Banks Law, in the sense of making the Banks depositories of Communal funds, was then passed, but the two private Bills (sent up from the Lower House) for extending the jurisdiction of the Administrative Court, were unanimously rejected.

ELECTION QUALIFICATIONS.

Mr. Miura Yasu introduced a Bill for amending the system of determining the qualifications of an elector or a candidate for election. According to the present method, which takes account of the Land Tax only, it is possible for a man to qualify merely by obtaining a nominal and temporary transfer of land, without being registered as its proprietor, and many abuses have arisen in consequence. The Bill proposes that only facts duly entered in the Local Registers (tochi daicho) shall be considered in determining election qualifications. The Bill was handed to a Special Committee.

SILK.

Prince Nijo introduced a Representation urging that Associations for investigating sericultural matters be organised. The Prince spoke in the sense of the speech delivered by the introducer of a similar Representation in the Lower House on the preceding day. He read statistics showing the immense development of the export of Japanese silk during the past twenty years; pointed out the great importance of the staple to the country's foreign trade and declared that, great as had been the increase of production, there had been virtually no improvements in the methods of sericulture, so that the chief manufacturing countries of the Occident were now disposed to turn their backs upon Japanese silk, owing to the marked defects that it showed from the weaver's point of view. In answer to a question, he said that the selection of silk-worms' eggs would naturally be one of the points calling for attention under the system he proposed.

The House adopted the Representation without debate.

MARINE PRODUCTS.

Mr. Murata Tamotsu introduced a Representation urging that steps be officially taken for the construction of boats—steam or sail—suitable for investigating and studying matters connected with marine products. The country already possessed places for giving instruction in things relating to marine products, as well as a law for encouraging deep-sea fishing; but there were no boats suitable for the employment of modern methods, and the consequence was not only that the nation failed to develop one of its chief sources of wealth, but also that foreigners were enabled to visit Japanese waters and carry away their products under the eyes of Japanese fishermen.

The Representation was adopted.

RULES OF DEBATE.

Baron Sayematsu Kencho moved that a Special Committee be appointed to investigate and report upon two questions; first, the rule observed by the House with regard to the Closure; secondly, the desirability of imposing some limit on the exercise of the right of querying the result of a division. As to the former, he explained that the practice adopted by the Peers had the effect of invalidating any motion duly made and seconded, though not yet put to the vote, prior to the application of the closure. Such was not the method pursued in the House of Representatives, and experience went to show that the latter's plan was preferable. As to the right of querying the result of a division by show of hands or even by roll-call, it was repeatedly exercised in a manner which might be called frivolous, which was scarcely ever justified by events, and which squandered much of the House's time.

The motion was passed, and, after adopting various petitions for presentation to the Government, the House rose at 2.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House met at 1.15 p.m.

THE POLICE.

The Vice-Minister of Home Affairs, replying to the Question presented on the 14th instant by Mr. Kagami Tsurematsu, with reference to abuse of power by the Fukagawa police, said that the matter had already been duly dealt with.

BANK OF JAPAN TAX.

The House then proceeded to discuss the Peers' amendments of the Bill for taxing the Bank of Japan. A motion to accept the amendments was made by Mr. Tsunematsu, but Mr. Taguchi Ukichi opposed it strenuously. He recommended the House to be consistent. It had voted several measures for increased taxation, though the principles underlying them did not always command approval, and towards this one measure for taxing the Bank of Japan it could not properly adopt an exceptional attitude of opposition. He recommended that, whatever be the effect on the fate of the Bill, a conference be opened with the Upper House.

Mr. Shimada Saburo moved that the decision be taken by signed ballot, but the House rejected the motion, and, voting by unsigned ballot, declared in favour of a conference by 100 to 94.

OKINAWA.

The Government Bill (sent down from the Peers) for the better assessment of lands in Okinawa Prefecture was reported on favourably by the Special Committee, and the House voted for the Second Reading, but did not proceed to it as once.

On an urgency motion by Mr. Hoashi Toru, the Order was changed for the purpose of reading a Bill to amend the Local Government System in Cities, Prefectures, Towns, Districts, and Divisions. The Bill was handed to a special Committee of 18.

EXPEDITION EXTRAORDINARY.

The House then, without debate, passed the Law of Patents, the Law of Trade Marks, the Law of Designs, together with a Bill for amending the Registration Law so as to bring its provisions into accord with the above.

The Government Bill (sent down from the Peers), relating to the use of stamps by foreign litigants, and to succour in litigation where foreigners are concerned, was handed to a Special Committee; as was also a Government Bill embodying a long project of Customs Law, the Government Delegate explaining, with regard to the latter, that the Customs Regulations now in force were enacted many years ago, and stood in need of so much revision and alteration that the drafting of a new law seemed essential.

The House rose at 3.50 p.m.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 18TH.

THE HOUSE OF PEERS.

The House met at 10.10 a.m., and agreed that the President should nominate 10 Managers to confer with the Lower House on the subject of the amendments of the Bill for taxing the Bank of Japan.

Viscount Tani, Chairman of Special Committee, then reported, on behalf of the majority of the Committee, in favour of the Government Bill for amending a portion of the Code of Criminal Procedure, and explained the further amendments recommended by the Committee. The Bill, thus changed, contained the following clauses:—

CODE OF CRIMINAL PROCEDURE.

Art. 178.—It shall be competent for a Court to issue at any time a summons to appear, or a mandate of arrest, against any person accused of a crime punishable with imprisonment or a graver penalty.

In this Article the Committee elides the words or a mandate of arrest, thus securing all accused persons against arrest before their case has been actually investigated. The Committee adds, however, the following clause:—

After a Court has examined an accused person, it may at any time issue a mandate for his arrest provided that his crime be punishable with imprisonment or a graver penalty.

Art. 189.—The following clause is added:—In the undermentioned cases, the Court, at the instance of the Public Prosecutor or by its own initiative, may allot an advocate to defend the accused, even though the latter has not appointed one:—

1. When the accused is under 15 years of age.
2. When the accused is a female.
3. When the accused is deaf or dumb.
4. When the accused is insane or not in the possession of his full mental faculties.
5. When from the nature of the accusation the Court considers that an advocate is necessary.

Provided that an advocate appointed under this Article shall be taken from those attached to the Court; and provided, further, that one advocate may undertake the defence of several accused persons simultaneously.

Art. 203.—The Committee amends this Article so as to read:—In pronouncing judgment, the facts constituting the offence, the proofs upon which the judgment is based, and the reasons for accepting them, shall be clearly expounded, and further, the law applicable to the case, with the reasons of its applicability, shall be set forth. Judgments of not guilty or of acquittal must also be accompanied by a statement of reasons.

Art. 85.—This Article is amended to read:—A person under mandate of a real may see visitors, in the presence of an official, and may receive from or convey to outsiders books and documents or other articles, after such books, documents, or articles have been inspected by a Judge of First Instance or by a Public Prosecutor. (N. B. The italicized portions are added by the Committee.)

When a Judge of first instance deems it necessary (for the purpose of eliciting the facts), he may order the accused to be placed in a separate cell and may forbid him to see visitors, or to receive from, or convey to, outsiders books, documents, or other articles. (N. B. the words in brackets are excised by the Committee.)

Viscount Niwa, on behalf of the minority (10) of the Committee, including ex-Chief Justice Miyoshi Taizo and ex Chief Justice Kodama, presented a report recommending the following amendments, in lieu of those proposed by the Government and advocated by the majority of the Committee:—

Art. 68.—(To have these clauses added). (1) During the preliminary examination, an accused person may at any time employ counsel. (2) The Public Prosecutor or the counsel for the defendant shall have the right, at any time during the preliminary examination, to inspect the records, on making application to the Judge for that purpose. Further, they shall have the right to make such application at other times on the ground of necessity.

Art. 85.—(The provision empowering the Judge to order an accused person into separate confinement is wholly rescinded, and the Article read:—An accused person who has been placed under arrest may see his counsel, or his relatives or his friends, in the presence of an official; and may receive from, or transmit to, outsiders books or documents after these have been examined by the Judge. The Judge of First Instance may, if he considers it necessary, order the seizure of such books or documents.)

Art. 91.—To have the word "counsel" introduced, in accordance with the changes made in Art. 68.

Art. 92.—(A clause is added enabling the Public Prosecutor or the counsel for the accused to be present at examinations of witnesses or experts and at inspections, which take place beyond the precincts of the Court.)

Mr. Kioura, Minister of Justice, said that the question of allowing an accused person to employ counsel at the preliminary examination called for careful consideration. It would necessitate a radical alteration of the present judicial system as followed in the first proceedings against accused persons. It might also prove a source of delay in determining guilt or innocence, and thus involve an accused person in needlessly protracted proceedings. The object of a preliminary examination under the present system was to collect information and to determine whether a prima facie case existed. If counsel were employed, the result might be that guilty persons would escape, and that obstacles might be placed in the way of discovering the truth. In short, it was a delicate question whether the amendments proposed by the minority of the Committee might not impair the rights of the individual which they were intended to protect. The Government had long been sensible that some reform of this section of the Code was necessary, and investigations were now being conducted. He therefore begged the House not to endorse, for the present at all events, the suggestions of the minority of the Committee.

After some questions, the House voted to carry the Bill in a Second Reading, but did not proceed with the reading at once.

TONNAGE DUES.

Count Yoshii, on behalf of the Special Committee, reported on the Tonnage Dues Bill. The Government Bill, as presented to the Lower House, proposed to levy Dues at the rate of 10 sen per ton (displacement), or per 10 toku of carrying capacity, and provided that a single payment of 30 sen per ton should exempt a vessel from further liability during the space of one year. The Lower House had amended this in the sense that the dues should be 5 sen per ton (registered), or per 10 toku of carrying capacity, and that a ship which had to enter two or more ports should be cleared by paying 10 sen per ton at the first port of entry. The Committee now recommended that the dues should be 10 sen per registered ton or per 10 toku of carrying capacity, but that a larger sum than 30 sen per ton should never be levied on one ship during a year. The revenue estimated to accrue under the Government's plan would be 475,000 yen annually; the revenue under the plan of the Lower House, 350,000 yen; and the revenue under the plan of the Committee of the Peers, 263,000 yen.

The House voted for the Second Reading of the Bill.

FISHERIES.

A Government Bill for the Regulation of the Fishing Industry was then read and handed to a Special Committee, and the House rose at 12.50 p.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House of Representatives met at 1.15 p.m.

Mr. Hanei Takusa presented a Question with regard to the settlement of the Shashi affair. The Government Bill relating to local boundaries in Oita Prefecture was passed.

LACQUER JUICE TAX.

Mr. Taguchi Ukichi, on behalf of the Special Committee, reported on the private Bill for imposing a duty of 50 per cent. on imported lacquer juice. The Committee had been equally divided in opinion, and the chairman, Mr. Taguchi, had given the casting vote against the measure, being persuaded that its effects upon lacquer manufacture would be injurious.

Mr. Mitamura supported the Bill, and claimed that by penalizing the use of inferior lacquer juice, the manufacture of Japanese lacquer ware would be improved and its export increased.

The House rejected the Bill.

FERTILIZERS.

The private bill for amending the Statutory Tariff was then passed. This Bill provides that No. 514 shall be supplemented by a clause exempting all fertilizers from the payment of import duty.

The House then passed the private Bill for including marine products in the list of subjects of technical education; and also the Representation to appoint a committee for investigating the question of constructing new buildings for the Diet.

Two private Bills relating to State Aid for Education were handed to a Special Committee; as were a Representation urging that Credit Associations be organized and a Bill relating to the pensions of shishu whose property had been confiscated for political offences.

The House rose at 2.40 p.m.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 20TH.

HOUSE OF PEERS.

The House met at 10.10 a.m.

NEW BILLS.

The following Bills were read for the first time, and handed to Special Committees:—

Government Bill embodying a Law of Operation of the Commercial Code. This Law, which consists of 147 Articles, was briefly explained by the Government Delegate, who described it as a piece of legislation necessitated by the revision of the Commercial Code.

Government Bill (sent up from the Lower House) for amending the Registration Tax Law.

Government Bill (sent up from the Lower House) for Amending the Law of Registration, so as to bring it into accord with the new Laws of Patents, Trade Marks, and Designs.

Private Bill (sent up from the Lower House) embodying a project of Agricultural Associations Law.

Private Bill (sent up from the Lower House) for amending the Deep-Sea Fishing Encouragement Law.

The Special Committee reported favourably on the Government Bill relating to the Stamp Tax Law (sent up from the Lower House), but recommended certain amendments, which the House endorsed, despite the opposition of the Government Delegate, and the Bill was passed. The House rose at 11.35 a.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House met at 1.15 p.m., and received the Special Committee's report on the Government Bill for Surveying and Assessing the Land in Okinawa Prefecture.

TANAKA SHOZO INTERPELLATES.

Mr. Tanaka Shozo, under the pretext of asking a question, denounced the "wolfish rapacity" of the Government; declared that "robbery and plunder" were rife with regard to the public forests in Okinawa; said that the system of local government there was most defective, and concluded by describing the islanders as insensible to anything but lust of the flesh and lust of gain.

Mr. Takagi understood that the forests on Ishigaki Island had been rented to Mr. Matsuo, when the latter was Vice-Minister of Home Affairs. He wished to know how these forests were disposed of at present.

The Government Delegate replied that the operation of the proposed measure would not be retrospective, and that he was not at the moment in a position to reply about Ishigaki. The Bill was passed.

NEW BILLS.

The following Bills were read for the first time and handed to Special Committees:—

Government Bill (sent down from the Peers) for regulating Strategic Zones in the vicinity of Fortifications.

Government Bill for amending the Registration Tax Law, so as to bring it into accord with the new Laws of Patents, Trade Marks, and Designs.

Government Bill for including in the system of Special Accounts the Public Works and Railway Loan of Formosa.

REPRESENTATIONS.

Representation for establishing a Central Industrial Experiment Station, for the purpose of employing expert scientific knowledge to test the quality of manufactured articles, and thus promote the country's industries.

A Representation for extending the sphere of operations of the Agricultural Main and Branch Experiment Stations, was passed at once, without being handed to a Committee. The exposé of motives attached to this measure explained that the yield of the land in Japan was very small as compared with the yield in Western countries. In Japan each square ri (6½ square miles) of cultivated land produces only 4,605 yen worth of crops, whereas the corresponding European figures are, for England 21,775 yen; for France, 34,597 yen; for Germany, 20,480 yen, and for Italy, 14,699 yen. The difference was doubtless to some extent a question of price, but it must also be attributed to defective methods of farming, and the framers of the Representation thought that some improvement could be effected through the medium of the Agricultural Experiment Stations.

Two Representations relating to Railways were read, and handed to a Special Committee. The first pointed out that among the seven railways included in the First Period programme of State lines, to be commenced in 1893 and finished in 1904, the only one likely to be built within the appointed time was the Hokuriku, and the signatories of the Representation called upon the Government to employ greater expedition, in the interest of means of communication and of the national economy. The Second Representation proposed extensive changes of the State-railway System, and large increases of expenditure, with the object of effecting a junction between all the roads in the Empire.

FIFTH DOMESTIC EXHIBITION.

An animated debate now took place with regard to two Representations, one of which urged that the Fifth Domestic Exhibition, which is to be held in 1902, should be in Osaka, while the other advocated Tokyo. The supporters of the Osaka scheme contended that, of the four exhibitions hitherto organized, three had been in Tokyo and one in Kyoto, and that Osaka's turn had fairly come. They also claimed that Osaka was the central trading mart of Japan, and that it could boast a brisker movement of commerce and capital than any other city in the empire. The advocates of the Tokyo proposal, headed by Mr. Hoshi Toru, laid considerable stress on the fact that the exhibition of 1902 would be the first held after the opening of the country to mixed residence, and that it ought to be in the most populous and accessible place in the empire, qualifications which Tokyo possessed preeminently. They also contended that the Kyoto exhibition had been, in effect, an Osaka affair, and they denied that Osaka, with its narrow streets and limited accommodation, was suitable for such an enterprise.

A signed ballot was ultimately taken to determine whether the Representations should be handed to a Special Committee, when 127 voted in favour of a Committee and 99 against. The House rose at 4.10 p.m.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 21ST.

HOUSE OF PEERS.

The House met at 10.10 a.m., and received the report of the Petitions Committee, to the effect that out of 41 petitions examined since the date of the last report, 30 were set aside for the House's consideration; one was rejected, and nine were considered unworthy of Parliamentary attention.

MISCELLANEOUS MATTERS.

A measure relating to amendments of the Peers' Regulations was then debated with closed doors, and, the open sitting being resumed at 1.45 p.m., a Government Bill (sent up from the Lower House) for changing local boundaries in Ota Prefecture was passed, as were also Supplementary Budget No. 7 of General Revenue and Expenditure for 1899-00, and Supplementary Budget No. 4 of Special Accounts for the same year. With reference to the former, Mr. Izawa drew attention to an item of 200,000 yen, to meet expenditures in connexion with the subjugation of the bandits. He asked what was the present state of affairs in the island; what results had been attained by the Government's new policy, and how far it was intended to carry the process of subjugation by force. The Government Delegate replied that tranquillity might reasonably be said to have been restored in the northern part of the island, but that the south and west were still disturbed, and that an outbreak which occurred last October had resulted in the assassination of a great many persons, whose names he read to the House. It was a matter of very great difficulty to deal thoroughly with the lawless section of the population, for, although a portion of a band of raiders might be exterminated or apprehended, the remnant could always escape to some district where the topographical conditions rendered it impossible for the military or police authorities to exercise complete, sometimes even partial, surveillance. The Government contemplated a policy of mingled clemency and force, and it was confidently believed that, although no immediately satisfactory results might be witnessed, peace and good order would gradually be established.

CODE OF CRIMINAL PROCEDURE.

Supplementary Budgets No 5 and 6 of General Revenue and Expenditure for 1899-00 were then passed without question or debate, and the House proceeded to the Second Reading of the Bill for amending the Code of Criminal Procedure.

Mr. Kaneko Kentaro moved that as this Bill had an important bearing on the country's for-sign relations and the question of Treaty Revision, the House should discuss it with closed doors.

Ex-Chief Justice Miyoshi seconded the motion, and, the House having endorsed it, went into secret session at 2.30 p.m., from which it rose at 4.05 p.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House met at 1.15 p.m., and received the Budget Committee's Report with regard to four supplementary Budgets for 1899-00.

Mr. Shimada Saburo strongly opposed the Government's proposal for a largely increased appropriation an account of the Iron Foundry, but the House passed all the Budgets.

A Government Bill with regard to changes of Districts in Kagawa Prefecture was passed, and the Second Readings of two Government Bills for amending the Local Government System were then taken. These Bills, of which one contains 147 articles, the other 129, are described as embodying changes which the practical working of the Local Government system has indicated to be essential. They were discussed Article by Article, and passed as amended by the Special Committee.

The following measures were passed without discussion:—

A private Bill for amending the Stud Horses Inspection Law.

A Representation urging the construction of vessels suitable for carrying out investigations connected with marine products, and for establishing new stations for giving instructions in matters relating to the same.

A Representation advocating that Iizaki (in Hiroshima) be opened to foreign trade.

A Representation urging that the work of riparian improvement set forth in the programme of State enterprises, be prosecuted with greater vigour.

The House rose at 3.40 p.m.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 22ND.

HOUSE OF PEERS.

AMENDING THE BOURSE LAW.

The House met at 10.15 a.m., and, having fixed a limit of 3 days for the Budget Committee to prepare its report on certain Supplementary Budgets for 1899-1900, and handed to a Special Committee the Government Bill for surveying and assessing the land in Okinawa Prefecture, proceeded to the First Reading of a Government Bill for amending the Bourse Law in the sense of allowing foreigners to become shareholders. The Government Delegate explained that this change was desirable in connexion with Treaty Revision, and the Bill was handed to a Special Committee.

THE SOY TAX.

Viscount Tani, on behalf of the Budget Committee, reported that the Committee had been equally divided with regard to the Bill for increasing the duty on Soy, and he, as Chairman, had given the casting vote against the Bill. He denounced the idea of taxing an article which constituted a daily necessary of the poor man's life, for the sake of raising a paltry revenue of 1,400,000 yen, and he took the opportunity to inveigh in bitter terms against the project which was understood to be on foot for increasing the emoluments of members of the Diet.

The Government Delegate, in answer to a question, having stated that the quantity of undiluted soy manufactured every year was estimated at 115,000 roku, Mr. Watanabe Hiro-moto supported the Bill, as a necessary and proper means for supplying the deficiency in the revenue, and Mr. Miura Yasu condemned it as a cruel hardship. Was there no way of obtaining funds, he asked, except by taxing the daily food of the poor? In his opinion a tax on sugar would be a wiser and more appropriate device. The House nevertheless passed the Bill by a large majority.

POSTAL RATES INCREASED.

The Bill for increasing Postal Rates then came up for its Second Reading. Marquis Kuroda reported that the Special Committee approved the Bill, but in his individual capacity he condemned it in toto. Instead of the State's deriving a revenue from such things as posts and telegraph, it should be prepared to spend money for their improvement and efficiency. The Marquis, like Viscount Tani, alluded in scathing terms to the rumoured proposal for augmenting the emoluments of members of the Diet, and said he presumed that a further increase of taxation would soon be sought on that account.

Mr. Mizuno said that no one approved of high postal rates as a principle, but this seemed to be virtually a case of necessity. They had to choose the least objectionable of several evils.

Viscount Mishima opposed the measure. Its advocates pleaded that the postal rates in Japan were cheaper than those in western countries, but they seemed to forget that the standard of living and the degree of wealth must be taken into consideration before accepting such a comparison. As a matter of fact, even without making any allowances of that nature, it could be shown that letters were carried more cheaply in several foreign countries than in Japan. He quoted statistics in proof of that assertion.

Baron Kikkawa having spoken in favour of the Bill, an unsigned ballot was taken, when, 133 voted for it and 70 against. The Second and Third Readings were passed.

The House was counted out at 3.15 p.m., when the Special Committee on the Tonnage Dues Bill was about to present its report.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House met at 1.10 p.m., and, having decided that a Conference should be opened with the Upper House in the matter of the latter's amendments of the Stamp Tax Law, proceeded to the Second Reading of the Copyright Law (sent down from the Peers), and passed it without debate or amendment.

THE PROPOSED FRANCHISE EXTENSION.

Mr. Hoshi Toru, on behalf of the Special Committee, then reported on the Government's Bill for amending the Law of Election for the Lower House. He stated that the majority of the Committee were in favour of making the following changes in the Government's proposals:—

1. That the property qualification, in the case of persons not paying Land Tax, should be the payment of annual direct taxes aggregating 5 yen, not 3 yen, as proposed by the Government.
2. That the system of voting be limited scrutin de liste, not scrutin individuel.
3. That ballots be signed.
4. That electors unable to sign their names might employ an amanuensis.
5. That whereas the Government proposed to allow officials to become members, provided their parliamentary duties did not interfere with their public duties, the Committee recommended that officials be forbidden to become members of the Diet unless permitted by Imperial Ordinance.

6. That the security lodged by a candidate appealing against the result of an election, be reduced from 500 yen to 100 yen.

7. That whereas the Government proposed to fix the number of representatives at 1 for each rural district containing not less than 120,000 of population, and 1 for every urban district containing not less than 50,000, with an additional member in either case for every additional 80,000, or fraction of 80,000 of population; the committee recommended that urban and rural districts alike return one member for the first 100,000 of their population, with an additional member for every additional 80,000 or fraction of 80,000, provided such fraction be not less than 50,000. The numerical result of these alterations would be that, whereas the Government's project gave a total of 445 members, namely, 98 representing the urban population and 347 the rural, the Committee's system would give a total of 470, namely, 76 for the urban population and 394 for the rural. The Committee further advised that Okinawa Prefecture return two representatives; that the new system include the districts which will become urban under the amended Local Government Law (operative from April 1st), and that Sado and Iki be enfranchised.

Mr. Kudo Kokan addressed the House on behalf of the minority of the Committee. He opposed the principle of making the urban districts independent of the rural, and he advocated scrutin de liste without any limitations, his contention being that the effect of the Government's proposals, as well as of the amendments advocated by the majority of the Committee, would be to impair party organization, and thus postpone the practical consummation of the system of party cabinets.

The Government Delegate stated briefly that the Government could not give its consent to the changes recommended by the Committee.

Mr. Taguchi Ukichi attempted to speak in favour of the Government's Bill, but could not obtain a hearing.

Mr. Koyama moved that the Second Reading be postponed for the usual interval of 2 days, but the House rejected the motion.

On the motion of Mr. Hoshi Toru, it was decided that discussion be at once directed to Article 36, that being the crucial question—namely, scrutin individuel or scrutin de liste, and signed or unsigned ballots.

Mr. Hiya-kawa attempted to speak in opposition to Mr. Kudo Kokan, but Mr. Hoshi Toru recommended him to let the question go to the vote at once, as there was no occasion for speech-making.

A signed ballot being taken with regard to the Minority's report (as presented by Mr. Kudo Kokan), it was rejected by 151 votes to 117.

A second signed ballot with regard to the majority's proposal of limited scrutin de liste resulted in 150 "noes" and 106 "ayes."

Finally, the House being asked to vote by show of hands with regard to the Article as proposed by the Government, rejected it.

Mr. Hoshi thereupon moved that the House decide by vote whether an Article providing for the matters referred to in Article 36 was essential, or whether it might be omitted, and the House voted that it was essential.

The President announced that a ballot would be taken to determine whether the Bill be read a second time. The result was 98 "ayes" and 140 "noes."

Mr. Hoshi Toru moved that the President nominate a Drafting Committee of 9 members to prepare a new measure, and the House passed the motion.

PRIVATE BILLS.

The private Bills for the Regulation of Fertilizers (in the sense of making them liable to police inspection), and for abolishing the Tax on Marine Products in Hokkaido—which produce a revenue of 360,000 yen annually—were read a second time, and passed without debate.

A private Bill with reference to the registration of certain lands was then read and handed to a Special Committee. The lands in question are those indicated by Law 39 of 1897, which provides that exchanges be effected between parcels of land which are separated from the main holdings of their owners, the object of such exchanges being to concentrate and thereby increase the efficacy of agricultural labour. These transactions may now be entered in the Great Register (Tochi daicho) without payment of fees, but do not enjoy the same immunity with regard to the Local Registers (Tochi bo), and the Bill proposes to correct the latter differentiation.

Another private Bill was then read and handed to a Committee. Its purport is to extend the scope of the revision provided by Law No. 30 of 1897, with regard to errors committed in assessing the computations of hereditary revenue at the time of the Restoration.

BARRISTERS AND THEIR DISCIPLINE.

The following measures were read for the first time and handed to Special Committees:—

A private Bill (introduced by Dr. Hatoyama) for amending the Barristers Law. According to the present Law, although the subjects of examination are the same for Judges, public procurators, and barristers, it is provided that, in the case of the two former classes, to have passed the examination does not qualify them to practise at the Bar; they must first have served as probationers in a Law Court. Dr. Hatoyama proposes to abolish this discrimination. Further, the Law now in force empowers the Bench to impose restrictions upon a barrister when addressing the Court, and to enforce its vetoes by penalties. The Bill advocates the total removal of such restrictions, and the granting of complete liberty of speech provided that no expressions disrespectful to the Imperial Family be employed. A barrister would, however, be held responsible for any utterances made in a public address or printed and circulated.

TOKYO MUNICIPALITY.

A private Bill (introduced by Dr. Hatoyama) for amending the system of Local Government in Tokyo. The exposé of motives points out that Tokyo is a city of 1,400,000 inhabitants; that it has seventeen times the average population of the towns of Japan, and double the average population of the cities and prefectures; that it spends 2 millions annually on local objects, which sum is twenty-three times the average disbursements of Japanese towns, and twice the disbursements of cities and prefectures; that it further makes large outlays on account of city improvement and Water Works, and contemplates other large outlays on account of harbour improvements. In spite of these facts, which differentiate it so signally from other towns and cities, it has precisely the same system of Local Government. The Bill therefore proposes that the Minister of State for Home Affairs shall undertake the direct supervision of all public works in Tokyo; that the Governor and Councillors of the city shall regard the Minister as their chief in matters relating to the discharge of these municipal duties, and that the Mayor of the City shall obtain the approval of the Minister when acting on behalf of the Town Assembly or Town Council.

REPRESENTATIONS.

A Representation for appointing a Committee of Investigation of State Forests and Moors.

A Representation urging that a system be devised for obtaining good breeding cattle. Great benefits had been derived from the foreign breeding stock kept at the Shimosa Farm, and the abandonment of that enterprise had exercised an injurious effect, which, if not corrected, would have serious consequences.

A Representation urging that the method of compiling the sections of the Budget for the Army and the Navy be made more explicit, so that the objects of the various expenditures can be better understood. The system now pursued in those two sections is much briefer and more general than that followed in other Departments.

The House rose at 4.15 p.m.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 23RD.

HOUSE OF PEERS.

TONNAGE DUES AND PILOTS LAW.

The House met at 10.30 a.m., and, having agreed that Managers be appointed to confer with the Lower House on the subject of the amendments of the Tonnage Dues Bill, and that three days be allowed for the Budget Committee to report upon Supplementary Budget No. 9 for the year 1899-00, proceeded to read for the first time a Government Bill embodying a project of Pilots Law. The exposé of motives explains that the present law is imperfect, and that its defects will become specially inconvenient after the Revised Treaties go into operation. The Bill was handed to a Committee.

COMMITTEE WORK.

The following Bills were similarly treated.

Bill (Government) for amending the Law of Procedure in non litigious cases, so as to bring it into accord with the New Civil and Commercial Codes.

Bill for changing Local Boundaries in Nagano Prefecture.

Bill (Government, sent up from the Reprerepresentatives) for changing Local Boundaries in Kagawa Prefecture.

Bill (Government, sent up from the Representatives) for amending the Law of State Aid to Technical Education, in the sense of including Marine Products.

Bill (private; sent up from the Representatives), for amending the Statutory Tariff in the sense of removing the import duty on fertilizers.

Bill (private; sent up from Lower House), for amending the Stud Horses Inspection Law.

NEW LEGISLATION.

The following Bills were passed:—
Government Bill relating to Security in Appeals from Judgments in Cases of Crime.

Government Bill for the regulation of Fisheries.

Government Bill (sent up from the Lower House) for amending the Registration Law.

Representation urging that a Hokkaido Colonization Bank be established, as the present Agricultural and Industrial Banks are not suited to carry on business in Hokkaido.

The Bill relating to Tonnage Dues was represented to the Special Committee, the latter's number being increased by two, and the House, having considered and adopted 16 petitions, rose at 12.25 p.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House met at 1.15 p.m.

BANK OF JAPAN TAX.

Mr. Suzuki reported that, after some difficulty, the Conference of the two Houses had agreed to a compromise in the matter of the Bill for taxing the Bank of Japan, and had fixed the rate at 1.25 per cent. of the note issue.

The House endorsed the change, and having passed, without debate, the Government Bill relating to the use of stamps (natsuin) by foreigners on legal documents, and to succeed in litigation where foreign suitors are concerned, read the following Bills for the first time and handed them to Special Committees:—

MARITIME DISASTERS.

Government Bill relating to Aid in Maritime Disasters. The object of this Bill is to correct the defects and supplement the deficiencies in the present system, in view of the operation of the Revised Treaties, which will increase Japan's responsibilities in the matter.

PENSIONS.

Government Bill for dealing with Hereditary and Reward Pensions. This Bill proposes the issue of 10 million yen worth of pension bonds, to be handed to persons who have just cause of complaint with regard to the steps adopted in dealing with their pensions at the time of the Restoration. It is the result of Representations made by the Diet in previous sessions.

PRIMARY EDUCATION.

The Special Committee reported, with reference to two private Bills for granting increased State aid to Primary Education, that it recommended the adoption of the Bill which advocated the disbursement of a sum equal to the difference between the amount (3,360,600 yen) of school fees paid by the 67 per cent. of school-age children now attending Primary Schools, and the amount (4,073,300 yen) that would be paid if 100 per cent. attended. The House passed the Bill.

THE NEW ELECTION LAW.

Mr. Hoshi Toru announced that the Committee appointed on the preceding day to re-draft the 36th Article of the Law of Election had completed that task, and he moved that the Order of the Day be changed, in order to proceed with the Second Reading of the Bill.

The Order having been changed, Mr. Hoshi reported that the Committee had amended the 36th Article in the sense of imposing a limit of two-thirds on the system of scrutin de liste. The House approved the Articles as then amended, and then proceeded to read the whole remainder of the Bill a second time. After brief debate, all the Articles, with one trifling exception, were passed — amended by the original Committee, the system of signed ballots and of permitting the use of announcements being thus adopted, as well as the new numerical bases of representation.

PROPOSED MANUFACTURES BANK.

The Representation for granting aid to the inventor of the jinrikisha, though recommended by the Special Committee, was rejected by the House, and a private Bill was then read for establishing a Manufactures Bank of Japan (Nippon Kogyō Ginkō). This Bill was presented by the leaders of the two political parties, the Liberals and the Progressists. The exposé of motives lays down the proposition that the development of a country's resources depends largely on the quality of its machinery for distributing capital and on the vigor of its manufacturing industry. The Bank of Japan discharges the function of capitalist for the mercantile community. The Agricultural and Industrial Bank plays the same part for agriculturists. But there is no institution which meets the needs of manufacturers, and the deficiency is seriously crippling Japan's development. The Bill proposes that a Manufactures Bank be established, with a capital of 10 million yen, payable in public loan bonds; that its shares be 100 yen face value; that its charter be for 50 years; that it be authorized to issue debentures to the extent of ten times its paid-up capital, their denominations varying from 20 yen to 200 yen; that in the event of the debentures being offered for sale abroad, the Government should consider that the state of the foreign market demands such a course, may guarantee the payment of the interest and principal of the debentures; that the Bank shall set aside every year a sum equal to 8 per cent. of its profits as a reserve against losses of capital, and a sum of 1 per cent. of its profits as a reserve for the equalization of dividends, and that the Bank be under the supervision of the Minister of State for Finance.

Baron Tajiri, Vice-Minister of Finance, said that the Government approved of the project, but could not endorse the method proposed for carrying it out. The question was now under consideration, and it would be better to defer a final decision on this Bill. The House voted to hand the measure to a Special Committee.

THE DUTY ON IMPORTED PRINTING PAPER.

A private Bill was then read, for abolishing the import duty on paper used for printing purposes. Mr. Taguchi Ukichi, as introducer, urged the expediency of the measure. The quantity of such paper now annually imported was two million caties, and the duty, at 15 per cent. ad valorem, would be 90,000 yen; not a large sum, but calculated to make an immense difference to newspapers, and to publishers of books for school use. He denounced the idea of taxing the spread of intelligence and education for the sake of ten or eleven companies engaged in the manufacture of paper in Japan.

Mr. Komuchi opposed the Bill. He maintained that the paper-making industry ranked with cotton spinning as one of the flourishing enterprises of modern Japan, and that its interests deserved consideration. As to the newspapers, he alleged that the abolition of the import duty would not make a difference of more than 1.5 sen per month to the cost of them.

OTHER MATTERS.

The Bill was handed to a Special Committee, as was also a private Bill empowering the Minister of State for Home Affairs to gradually abolish, at his own discretion, the liberty now enjoyed by provincial medical practitioners to act as compounders as well as prescribers of medicines.

The first reading of a private Bill for establishing a Colonial Bank in Hokkaido having been postponed by desire of its introducers, the House rose at 4.15 p.m.

Mr. Hagiwara, Governor of Saitama. Mr. Midzuno, Governor of Nara, and Mr. Yoshida, Governor of Miyagi, have been released from their posts; and Count Ogimachi, Mr. Terahara, and Mr. Yamada, Director of the Kumamoto Tax Controlling Bureau, were appointed to the vacancies. Mr. Rika, Governor of Miye, was appointed Governor of Tokushima; and Mr. Yamagata, Governor of Tokushima, is to fill the post of the former.

ASIATIC SOCIETY OF JAPAN.

A General Meeting of the Asiatic Society of Japan was held at the Parish Buildings, No. 54, Teukiji, on Wednesday, the 8th February, at 3 p.m., the President of the Society, Sir Ernest Satow, being in the Chair.

The minutes of the previous meeting having been taken as read, the Chairman called upon Dr. Florenz to read his paper on ANCIENT JAPANESE RITUALS.

Dr. Florenz observed that the great length of his paper did not admit of its being read in extenso; moreover, a large portion of it consisted of critical notes which were not adapted for reading. He would, therefore, read only certain passages which he had selected for this purpose as being likely to have most interest for the meeting. The following is a brief abstract of what was read:—

Dr. Florenz explained that his paper was strictly speaking a continuation of papers on the same subject written many years ago by Sir Ernest Satow, and published in Vols. VII. and IX. of the Transactions of the Society. Sir Ernest Satow had translated 9 out of the 28 Rituals. The present paper dealt with Ritual No. 10, entitled "Minadsuki Tsugomori no Oho-harake," or "Great Purification celebrated on the last day of the sixth month." The literature he had consulted in the course of his studies included, in addition to the older commentaries of Mahuchi, Motowori Norinaga, and Fujimi, the "Norito shiki-kōgi," by Haruyama Tanomu, the "Norito bemmo," by Shikida Toshiharn, Notes of Lectures delivered by Motowori Toyokahi in the Imperial University, and an interesting paper on the Oho-harake, or Great Purification, contributed by Dr. H. Weipert to the Transactions of the German Asiatic Society.

The Great Purification was one of the most important and solemn ceremonies of the Shinto religion, its object being the purification of the whole nation, from Princes and Ministers down to the common people, from sins, pollutions and calamities. In early times it appeared to have been celebrated not at fixed intervals, but only when special reasons offered. The chief ceremony was performed in the Capital, near the South Gate of the Imperial Palace, and might be styled the Purification of the Court. But a similar ceremony was conducted at every important shrine throughout the country, whence the expression "Great Purification of the Provinces," in contradistinction to the Great Purification of the Court. The Great Purification consisted of certain ceremonial acts, chief of which was the throwing away into the water of the so-called harake-tsumono, or purification-offerings, and the reading of a ritual.

The Great Purification was to be distinguished from:—

1.—The simple Harake, or purification of an individual from the pollution contracted by some offence, in which case the guilty person himself had to provide certain offerings to the gods. This was originally a mere religious ceremony, the offerings provided by the offender being in the beginning probably only such articles of his personal property as were considered to have been polluted. These were thrown away into the water. But out of this developed in the course of time the idea of a penalty. It was interesting to notice for what reasons, in what way, and to what extent in ancient times penalties came to be exacted under the name of a harake. Both the Kojiki and Nihongi (passages from which were quoted by the lecturer), furnished much information on this point.

2.—Another kind of Harake, generally called "Misogi," or "Ablution," which was the purification of an individual or a place from pollution contracted by contact with something ceremonially impure, as, for instance, dead bodies.

3.—A third species of Harake, which preceded every important festival of a Shinto shrine, and by means of which the priests and others taking part in the festival were purified. This ceremony took place in a hall or open place specially prepared for the purpose, and consisted in the "Kami oroshi," or "bringing down of the spirits of the purifying deities," the recitation of the purification-prayer, the performance of various symbolic acts, and the "Kamigae," or "Sending back of the gods." The festival could then begin.

4.—A kind of private Harake, mentioned by Fujii in his "Gogoshatsu," which, like the Oho-Harake, was performed on the last day of the sixth month.

The lecturer then dealt with the questions of the age of the Great Purification ceremony, and that of the Ritual itself, quoting extensively from Japanese authorities; dwelt on the recitation of the Ritual, and described the details of the ceremony as conducted both in ancient and modern times. He also explained the legendary origin of the ceremony, and read a translation of the Ritual now used.

In the course of the discussion which ensued Dr. Florens gave some further explanations in reply to questions which were put to him on various points connected with Shintô ceremonies.

The Chairman thanked Dr. Florens in the name of the Society for the valuable and learned paper which he had contributed to the Society's Transactions.

The meeting then adjourned.

THE FIGHTING AT MANILA.

The Nagasaki Press prints the following account of the recent fighting at Manila, having been allowed the courtesy of copying some extracts from a private letter, dated at Manila Feb. 1st:—

THE POSITION BEFORE FEB. 4.

"The conditions here are complicated and not easily understood, still less easily described. The facts are these. We hold Manila and its Bay. We have 20,000 men here and a powerful fleet. But that is all. The rest of Luzon, except a few ports, is absolutely in insurgent control, owing away and paying taxes to the Philippine Republic—a full fledged government with a president, a cabinet, national legislature, and an army. Round about Manila, in a semi-circle twelve miles long, are disposed anywhere from 15,000 to 30,000 Malays, some armed, some not, possessing at least 15,000 rifles, no artillery, and plenty of ammunition. Manila, therefore, is in a state of siege. Alarms are of almost daily occurrence. Threats are made of fire, assassination, rapine. Several lives have been lost by the over-bold, but so far no actual conflict has taken place. Our troops are doubled here, trebled there, in some places quadrupled. Our men are ready for instant action. Afloat it is the same. This has been going on for several weeks. What the issue will be no one dare foretell. Indeed, no one can. General Otis is strictly enjoined from Washington to do everything to avoid a conflict. We do not know whether the natives will attack or not. If they do, a fight must take place; but they will not stand. They cannot. They have no training, no military instinct, no knowledge of the gun. They will be scattered like sheep. But there they are. There they have been for months, drilling, gathering arms, strength, and confidence.

"They believe that we are afraid of them; that they can whip us; and, if reports representing their opinions are true (which I do not know), that they can take Manila in twenty-four hours and drive us into the sea. I hope they are not going to be undeceived on the field of battle; but it is there that they will receive education if they attempt to put their theories into practice.

"How has this incredible condition of things arisen? It is due, first, to the uncertainty as to the fate of the Philippines. We did not know in the U.S. till early in December or late in November what we were going to do about them. We could make no promises here. We could not even assure these people that Spain was not to retain the islands. So we sat still and waited. Then came the results of our inexperience, of our utter want of knowledge of the Ma'y character. They do not understand us; we do not understand them any better. With our natural sense of justice, we tried conciliation. They took it for weakness. We essayed kindness—to them it was an unknown thing. We dealt with them justly; and in return we are esteemed cowardly. In short, our virtues became faults. We treated them from an American, not from an Asiatic, standpoint. I do not see how we can blame them if they misunderstood us. They have never seen any foreigners but the Spaniards. Spanish aggression, greed, and blood thirstiness, they understood, and perhaps respected. They have no standard by which to gauge the qualities we have shown. We have prated about how nice it would all be when the natives came to understand and appreciate the good things America was to bring to them; never a word has been uttered about fitting our gifts to the characters of the recipients. What has been needed, and is now, is not to make the Filipinos understand the Americans, but to make the latter understand the former. Instead of commanding, we have requested; and when denied, we sat down quietly waiting for the Tagal to size up the U.S. of America and its citizens. He cannot. He will die in his ignorance. His son may have a glimmering of the good intentions of the great Republic; and that spark may grow, by judicious fanning, into intelligence. I am speaking, of course, of the millions, not the handful of Messiahs and educated Tagalos. The Filipinos, I should judge, are not a hard people to govern. They are children, having some excellent traits and some very vicious ones. They are famous for their hospitality, but equally infamous for stabbing in the back."

THE OUTBREAK.

Writing a few days later, the same correspondent gives the following account of the battle. "On Saturday night, February 4th, at about nine o'clock (night fighting is a favourite form of combat with the natives) the insurgents attacked our forces about Manila. The firing was heavy most of the night. The insurgents made several advances, but were driven back by our men. Our men did not advance, satisfied to hold their ground, but all night long the musketry fire continued, interspersed with shots from field-guns (a few of them the insurgents had), the volley-firing of our troops sounding like a hundred Gatlings. The Charleston and Callao were already in position north of our lines (on the left); the Monadnock was to the south, i.e., on our right. The Concord took up a position towards our left, and near the Charleston and the Callao. North of the city was Malabon, four or five miles off; and between it and opposite our left were the enemy's strongest entrenchments and earth-works, with natural defences in bays, creeks, and bayous. At dawn, when the ships got the positions, they opened fire with tremendous effect. The slaughter is described as terrific. The Charleston, farthest out, fired 8 and 6 inch shells; the Concord, nearer in, fired shrapnel; the Callao, the nearest to the enemy, used her rapid fire and machine guns. The forts and intrenchments were destroyed; and our army charged and drove the natives out pell-mell. All round the city it was the same story. The insurgents stood for a while and then broke. Our men are said to have behaved magnificently, fighting like a lot of old tigers. A battalion of the 14th Infantry charged across a paddyfield, and, though they suffered severely, they captured three Krupp field pieces and two Gatlings and the natives left. At night, not an insurgent was in sight. Our losses are said to be 150 to 200 killed, and the same number wounded. I do not dare say how many the enemy lost in killed. It is put as high as 4,000. We have 2,800 prisoners. To-day (Feb. 6th), our troops have been all day pursuing the fleeing natives. General Anderson is marching against Malolos, the insurgents' capital 25 miles north or Manila. It is expected he will take it tomorrow. Our victory is complete, and from all I can learn of native character, will be decisive. I trust we shall hear no more of the Filipino Republic."

THE FILIPINO STORY.

The China Mail of February 14th, says:—The Filipino junta in Hongkong have cabled to Great Britain and America their version of the outbreak of hostilities in the Philippines. They state that the American censored version of the occurrences is utterly false. The Americans treacherously commenced the hostilities simultaneously on land and sea. Aguinaldo having signed a guarantee with the American Commissioners not to commence hostilities, the Filipino troops were resting, and many Filipino officers who were at the theatre on the Saturday night were arrested shortly before the outbreak. The bombardment of the defenceless towns of Malate, Paco, Santa Anna, and Malabon had caused frightful slaughter of women and children. It is estimated that four thousand of those defenceless people were slaughtered. The Americans committed many outrages in the suburbs, compelling the inhabitants to leave their houses and then shooting them down regardless of sex. There was a regular reign of terror in Manila, and Filipinos were shot down in the streets unchallenged. The Iloilo Commissioners arrived at Manila on the invitation of the Americans, and were arrested when starting to return. The Americans were apparently determined on a war of extermination, and were violating the rights of mankind and civilized warfare. The action of Otis was a political move, and the firing was commenced on Sunday to prevent exposure of corruptions at Manila.

Such is the marvellous language of the telegrams despatched by the Filipinos!!

AMONG THE CAPTIVES.

The China Mail says:—These were some fifteen or twenty wounded savages in the hospital who wore headresses of roosters' feathers and had long hair hanging down their backs. There were a great many of these fellows amongst the killed.

The Hongkong and Shanghai Bank premises at Iloilo escaped destruction at the fire.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

H.E. H. Lisboa, late Brazilian Minister to Japan, has been appointed to St. Petersburg in a similar capacity.

A special despatch to the Chungwai Shogyo from Korea reports that the Korean Government has decided to open Gushang and two or three other places for foreign trade.

The P. & O. shroff at Hongkong has been sentenced to six months' imprisonment with hard labour and fined $1,000 for selling lottery tickets. $2,000 found in the prisoner's safe were also confiscated.

At a meeting of Bishops of the Church of England, held at Lambeth Palace, it was resolved to submit to Convocation in February a Bill reforming the Ecclesiastical Courts on lines recommended by the Commission of 1883.

The body of one of the female servants at the Ferris Seminary, 178 Bluff, was found in a deep well on the compound, on Monday afternoon. There were no marks on the body suggesting foul play, and it is supposed to be a case of suicide.

Acting on the doctor's strongly urged advice, Bishop Burdon who is staying in Shanghai, has decided not to return to Pukhoi, but to retire from active missionary work and devote himself to helping to complete the revision of the New Testament and to assisting in any other work that is suitable. The Bishop has been connected with the C.M.S. for nearly fifty years, and is now seventy-two.

Professor Grassi is said to have discovered the bacillus of malaria fever. The professor has a bacteriological laboratory at the hospital of Saint Spirito, Rome, and has, therefore, good opportunities of studying the subject. The bacillus is thought to be the parasite of an insect belonging to the mosquito family. We may add that the American surgeons, Geddings and Wasdin, have gone to Havana to study the yellow fever.

The Italian third-class cruiser Elba, which has come out to relieve the Marco Polo on this station, is of 2,730 tons and 7,471 horse-power, and four 5.9-in. q. f., six 4.7-in., one 2.9 in., eight 3.3-in., eight 1.4 in., and two M. guns. She was built at Castellammare in 1893.

A fatal accident occurred in Tokyo on the 16th. A man named Mita Ikuso was passing a level crossing at Yanaka by jinrikisha when a train came up, smashed the jinrikisha, and ran over and killed the rider. The jinrikisha coolie narrowly escaped. He had been running down a steep road which leads to the crossing, and, though the watchman warned him of the approach of the train, he was unable to stop his vehicle.

At a recent examination of school children in Oregon the subject discussed was the exports of the United States, and the question was put, "What do we send to Spain?" The answer came quickly from a little girl, "Soldiers." "And what," asked the astonished examiner, "do we get in return?" "Islands," was the answer. And then, of course, the teacher had to explain that what America really sent to Spain was the blessings of civilisation, progress, and enlightenment, and that all she got in return was the humble approval of her conscience. "And now," concluded the teacher, "we will take the next lesson."

Reports of the gale which swept over Great Britain about the middle of January show terrible and widespread results. The sea demolished a thick seawall and washed a breach of seventy yards in the North Western line, alongside Conway Bay, between Chester and Holyhead about midnight on the 12th ult. It was pitch dark, the tempest terrible, and a Manchester goods express, heavily laden, dashed out of a tunnel across a gap along unsupported rails, and was precipitated into the sea. The driver and fireman were lost, and the wreckage of eight trucks strewn the Bay; but the others remained suspended on the rails which are unbroken. The Liverpool express and the Irish mail, which were due shortly afterwards, were saved. The Channel traffic suffered terribly, vessels standing in the Downs all night.

There has just been constituted in Hungary a new sect, which has many adherents at Fogarás and Hermannstadt. It is called "The German Union of Seven Day Adventists," and it appears to have originated in the United States. The principal "agency" is at Hamburg, and the apostle is named J. Huenergardt. He is about 50 years of age, and is a man of commanding eloquence. The dogmas of this sect have much in common with those of the Jews, that is to say, there are liturgical chants, special preparation of food, and a strict observance of the Sabbath. The adherents occupy themselves a great deal in diffusing pamphlets bearing on religion and health. The new sect has strong followings in Germany, Austria-Hungary, Roumania, Bulgaria, and Servia.

Mr. Henry De Morgan the American archaeologist, is responsible for the view that the ancient Egyptians had an Asiatic origin. Of late this hypothesis has been controverted by many eminent anthropologists, who claim that Egyptian civilisation comes directly from the New Stone Age people of that part of Africa, and has only been influenced by Asiatic culture. Among those who support this view are M. de Bising, in L'anthropologie, Dr. Fraas, of the German Anthropological Society, the Russian Professor Anontchine, and Schweinfurth the traveller. It is in accordance with Professor Sergi's hypothesis to the effect that the earliest Egyptians came from Somaliland or somewhere up the Nile in the region reconquered by the Sirdar. For aught we know, Khartoum may be the "cradle" of the North African and Southern European race; or certain elements of it, at least.

CHINESE NEWS.

A daring robbery recently took place at Ningpo, the house of a rich native being entered by an armed band of thirty or forty robbers who carried away property and money to the extent of four or five thousand taels, after wounding two of the owner's servants.

The death of the once famous Chinese General, Yeh Chi-chow, is announced from Peking, where he was imprisoned for his "masterly retreats" from Yashan and Pingyang in the Japan-China war. Poor old Yeh, says the China Gazette, was a typical Chinese hero, and was one of the first to bring disgrace and disaster upon China in the war by his astonishing cowardice and ignorance of every military virtue. He was at one time Li Hung-chang's great friend, but Li abandoned him when he fell into disgrace and shifted all the blame he could for China's defeats upon his fallen friend's shoulders.

Fully 20,000 Imperial troops have been ordered by the Empress Dowager from Chihli and Shantung to suppress the rebellion in Anhui, which is hardly consistent with the oft-repeated official declarations that the rebellion is finished and the rebels scattered. A telegram to the Universal Gazette records the arrival of some of these troops at Chinan-fu, (Shantung). General Sung Ching has sent 5,000 troops from Shanhaikwan, General Li 5,000 from Chenting-fu, General Liu 50,000 from Honan, and 5,000 more are en route from Shantung. A great deal will depend upon the attitude of these troops when they arrive at the scene of operations and meet the rebels who have inscribed on their banners that they are fighting for the Emperor against the Empress Dowager.

Five persons—a man and four women, all Chinese—were burnt to death in a fire that broke out in North Fokien Road, Shanghai, on Feb. 11th.

Mr. C. Reverud, mate of the British barque Osaka, while stepping into a sampan to go ashore at Shanghai, missed his footing and fell into the river. He was never seen again. The fatality occurred on Feb. 10th.

The health of the British Minister at Peking has so broken down that he has been compelled to take a change either home or to India.

The N.-C. Daily News says that according to a Tientsin dispatch robbery seems to be very rife there this winter, the daring gentry even robbing with impunity houses of wealthy people inside the City walls. The brigands disguise themselves, daubing their faces and putting on false beards, and, robbing in large gangs of thirty to forty, defy the interference of the night patrols sent by the City garrison commandant. It is also stated that a Japanese travelling in a mule cart on the great Taku highway between the Taku forts and Tientsin was stopped on the road, the other day, by a gang of a dozen robbers who drew their swords and threatened to cut down the first person who dared to resist. As no one did so, the robbers left their victims unharmed, but shivering on the roadside, having made a clean sweep of everything in the cart even to the warm winter clothes on the bodies of the victims. The Tientsin Magistrate now offers $500 reward for the capture of any one of the gang.

Mr. John E. Hamlyn, Chief Examiner of the I.M.C. at Shanghai, died there of bronchitis on Feb. 11th. He had been in the service nearly 32 years.

The Universal Gazette publishes a telegram from Peking of the 9th inst. in which it is stated that a telegram reached the capital on the same day, reporting the safe arrival at Urumtsi (Tihua), the capital of Chinese Turkestan, of Chang Yin-huan, and that in obedience to recent Imperial orders he had been imprisoned there instead of being sent to work on the post roads as at first ordered.

GERMANS AND BRITISHERS ABROAD.

A German merchant long resident in Singapore, who has just returned to the Colony after a trip home, writes to the Free Press:—"I never omitted to point out to Britishers and Germans in Europe alike to go forth into the world and observe their respective countrymen in the Colonies, how they work and enjoy themselves together for the benefit of the Colony they live in. A mutual respect is the natural outcome of their continual close contact. A Britisher finds out that a German after all is not that lager-beer-swallowing sausage or sauerkraut-devouring, uncouth creature, as the papers insist upon ramming into every Britisher at home, and the Germans when out in the Colonies realize gradually that as little as they may have thought of Great Britain in Europe, Greater Britain is an enormous, well and liberally-governed world's Empire, strong in defence, and imposing, obtaining nay even extorting admiration from unwilling minds almost at first sight. It is only natural that in the old countries, with their different but firmly set traditions, some of their particular run of ideas and principles should produce divergencies of opinion now and then. These occasional little political frictions, however, are more like tiffs between husband and wife; if both have education and common sense it will not come to blows.

Our English cousins are quite aware by now that to every normal German the German Emperor is what his Queen is to every Britisher, viz., the symbol and personification of all those glorious traditions which are dear to everyone of us and around whose persons we would eagerly gather in time of danger. When at special occasions a Britisher sings "God save the Queen," he instinctively thinks of the Spanish Armada, of Trafalgar, the squares of Waterloo, and the Indian mutiny, and up comes his chest, and quite right too.

Of opportunities to criticise the Kaiser's actions and speeches there may be many, as he does not stay much at home. Nobody will at all object if such criticism is based on sound reasoning and is given in decent English. In that direction we London Germans have to stand one or two paragraphs a day in almost every paper, but I for one enjoy them heartily as long as there is intelligence in their line of argument and originality and humour in their construction, quite apart from the great advertising value for the young German Empire all over the world. If the English underrate the Kaiser they will be the losers in the long run, and I am glad to see that the best and most serious writers in England are beginning to take him not only very seriously but watch all his initiatives with a keen interest. A talent does not recognise out-trodden roads, he strikes out for himself, and original throughout, he confuses the enemy, and secures every chance to follow his own course. Talent and genius begins when nature has blended a number of good qualities with a grain of originality even eccentricity. The average observer says, "mad," (Bismarck was labelled so after his first speeches in the Prussian diet), and he continues to walk blindfolded but happy in his blissful superficiality.

Tempora mutantur. Every Britisher has long ago realised this with respect to the young German Empire, so that I, attached to Germans and Britishers alike, do not see the object of continuing a mining warfare when everybody knows that everybody else is a jolly good fellow with no intention whatever to offend. The battle axe should be buried at last.

I shall then again be able to point to the British Colonies as the training ground for mutual political tolerance, where Britishers and Germans work heartily together for general commercial expansion, the most efficient factor towards civilization, which again is the goal of Christian ethics and of religious teaching.

THE LEOPOLD BANKRUPTCY.

FIRST MEETING OF CREDITORS.

The first meeting of creditors in the bankruptcy of Charles Emil Leopold, a convict undergoing sentence of imprisonment in H.B.M.'s Jail, Yokohama, was held in H.B.M.'s Court for Japan on Monday morning. Mr. C. D. Moss, Official Receiver, occupied the chair; Mr. A. B. Walford appeared for the Hongkong and Shanghai Bank; Mr. J. F. Lowder for the Chartered Bank of India, Australia and China, (the petitioning creditors) and also for Messrs. Ahrens and Co., Nachi; and the debtor was represented by Professor Terry, of Tokyo. On behalf of the creditors who had proved, there were present:—Messrs. B. M. Janion, Accountant of the Chartered Bank; E. Wismer, Messrs. Ahrens & Co.; L. Stornbrink, Sawada, and F. S. Mayer, of the Japan Herald.

The following is the list of debts that were proved:—F. S. Mayer, Manager of the Japan Herald, yen 40; Chartered Bank, yen 49,259.80; Peyre Freres, yen 141.55; Hongkong and Shanghai Bank, yen 8972.34; Messrs. Ahrens & Co., yen 308,704.70; John W. Hall, yen 486.72; L. Stornbrink yen 24; Uchiyama Rosetsu, yen 2000; Ishii Riye, yen 3,421.73; Sawada yen 450.

The headings of the debtor's statement read as follows:—Gross Liabilities; liabilities as stated and estimated by debtor; expected to rank; assets (as stated and estimated by debtor; expected to produce. This was virtually a nil return.

The list A of unsecured creditors comprised 24 names for sums varying from as little as yen 120 to yen 57,986. List B "Creditors fully secured" was nil. List C "Creditors partly secured" included: Ishii Riye, amount unknown, probably yen 3,000; holder of security of lease of Nos. 98 & 100 Bluff, and reversion of lease of Lot No. 125 Settlement, from A. D., 1910. List D. E.

F. G. and H. all nil. List I "Debts due to the estate: J. D. Mc. C. Gardiner, architect, Tokyo, yen 880.50, classed as bad; Weber, Lohmann & Co. of Sydney, N. S. W., yen 72 for doors, classed as good. List J. & K. are nil returns.

The Official Receiver first directed the attention of the creditors present to the advertisements calling the meeting and proceeded to say that the receiving order was dated the 27th January, but that some delay had occurred in obtaining possession of the debtor's books, as they were beyond the jurisdiction of the Court. He was consequently obliged to apply for an extension of time for filing a statement of the debtor's affairs. Proceeding the Official Receiver said:—On the 4th February I obtained possession of the debtor's books, now in Court; on the 10th I filed debtor's statement of affairs and notified all the creditors. The statement of affairs is here and is open to your inspection. That is the original copy, and here is another copy, my working copy. The creditors filed their proofs of debt as per list exhibited. I examined the debtor with reference to each proof, and in consequence of the statement of affairs being so extremely bald, I put to him the following 50 questions and took down his answers to each, which he duly signed. I will first of all tell you what I have done in reference to the proofs of debt.

Mr. Lowder—Are these the Board of Trade questions?

The Official Receiver—Yes, but first of all I will make a few remarks as to the proofs of debt. The Japan Herald is the first one, yen 40. The debtor says he does not owe so much as 40 dollars. He thinks 20 dollars is all he owes. He says he paid ten dollars on account, on the 1st July of theseabouts. But that will be gone into by myself afterwards. Next is the Chartered Bank. They claim yen 49,294 as a judgment debt. The judgment was before this Court in the month of June. The debtor says he has paid off various sums amounting to yen 21,000 and that the balance of that claim is only yen 28,000; but he admits he is further indebted to the Bank for yen 7,000 odd, and that his total liability is yen 55,851. The debtor admits the indebtedness, but claims that on the judgment which they claim to be only indebted to the amount of yen 28,125. That is a question which can be settled later on. Peyre Freres' claim of yen 141. There is a small error there, the debtor says, of two dollars. He admits owing yen 139. The Hongkong and Shanghai Bank's claim appears to be correct. Ahrens & Co.'s is a large claim of yen 38,704, which the debtor says is not correct. He says he has frequently asked Ahrens & Co. for an account and sees it for the first time to-day. That was last week. The account requires investigation like some others. No. 6. This is a claim of John W. Hall. He is not here, but has proved the debt. The amount is reasonable and correct, but the debtor thinks he is not liable and that it should be claimed from the Japanese Yoshizo and Toda Gisaburo, who gave the order for the work. The 7th is the Ice Works claim, Mr. Stornbrink's, and that is correct. The 8th is a claim by Uchiyama Rosetsu, yen 200, and the debtor says it is reasonable and correct. The 9th claim is by Ishii Riye, yen 3,421.73. This account is correct and reasonable, but the creditor holds as security the leases of 98 and 100 Bluff and Lot 125 in the Settlement for 18 years more and it is impossible at this moment to place a value on these securities, but I have explained as well as I could to Ishii Riye that she cannot hold her claim and her security, and therefore that account stands in abeyance. The 10th claim is Sawada yen 45. That is correct. Then there are other claims by Messrs. Melchers and Co., for instance, but they have not been proved, so we have not to do with them at the present moment. And now in reference to the assets. In the debtor's statement of affairs you will see J. McDonald Gardiner, of Tokyo, is put down as owing yen 880.50 for timber supplied. This is entered as a bad debt because the debtor says Mr. Gardiner disputes the account and always has disputed it and the debtor says he is very unwell and also has no funds. That is the debtor's explanation of that. Weber, Lohmann & Co., Sydney, 72 dollars for doors sent to them. The debtor thinks that they will pay on application if they have not already paid Ahrens & Company. Then I have sundry explanations as to what has become of a lot of money, but a great deal of these explanations will be embodied in the answer to the Board of Trade questions which I will read to you, and if you want any further information afterwards I will give you that information. I will now read these questions and the answers which have been signed by the debtor. They are questions to the debtor supplying his statement of affairs.

The Official Receiver said he had put to the prisoner the questions specified by the Board of Trade, and he would read the answers to the meeting. According to these accused said he had carried on business at Nos. 29 and 59b., Yokohama, and Cecil Court, Charing Cross-road, W.C. He commenced business as a clerk in 1884, and as a merchant in 1895. He had no capital in 1884. He had not been in partnership with any one; he would explain this further. He had kept no books of account, as far as he was aware, beyond those in the Official Receiver's possession; some had been lost in moving. From these books he could fully make up his accounts to date. They were posted to about April, 1898, and as to the Phoenix Saw Mills until they were sold last summer. He had no money at the date of the petition, and had delivered to the Official Receiver all property belonging to the estate and under his control. His assets were yen 72, and he was not aware of having any property in reversion or expectancy. His life was insured for £2,000; the policies were not in his possession; one was assigned to Ishii Riye for value received and the other to Adèle Leopold, debtor's mother, for value received. He had no other assets as far as he was aware beyond what he had already mentioned, unless something was recovered from Uyeda Yoshizo and Toda Gisaburo and Toda Yauakichi. He did not know the total amount of his indebtedness, but thought it was about yen 40,000. There was a judgment against him for about yen 49,000, less about yen 22,000 paid off. He had assigned the leases of No. 98 and 100 Bluff and No. 125 Settlement from A.D. 1910. He had not executed any bill of sale on his stock-in-trade, furniture, or personal effects, nor made any preferential payments to any creditors nor pledged any property in the way of pawn-broking. He had never suspended payment of his debts. He had not lodged any money or security with his solicitor for payment of costs incurred in respect to his failure. The causes of his insolvency were:—

Loss on Phoenix Saw Mills, loss of real estate, loss of building, loss of hunting vessels, loss of coal, furs and general merchandise, and losses through forced sale, by banks. He was uncertain when he first became aware of his insolvency but thought in Oct. to Dec., 1897. He had contracted debts since he became aware of his insolvency, but he had expectations of being able to pay them by the sale of his various properties and goods at reasonable profits. He had drawn accommodation bills, but only those for which he was now being punished. They were none now running. He could not say what had been his income and personal expenditure during the last three years. He had not made any marriage or post-nuptial settlement, or any other settlement, beyond that of leases and life assurance to Ishii Riye; those settlements were made for value received. He could not produce any copy of these; Ishii Riye had the originals. He had disclosed the whole of his estate and effects with the exception of property bought with his money but beyond his control, and which he was advised were no longer his. He could make no proposal to his creditors, as he had no assets under his control.

The Official Receiver, continuing—I now call the creditors' attention to the principal business of the meeting. At the first meeting they may

1. By special resolution resolve to entertain a proposal for a composition or scheme under section 18 of the Act, either with or without the intervention of a trustee.

2 By ordinary resolution resolve that the debtor be adjudged bankrupt, and in that case they may also, by ordinary resolution, if the estate exceeds £300, appoint a trustee.

3 By ordinary resolution fix the remuneration of the trustee, or resolve that the same be left to the committee of inspection.

4 By ordinary resolution appoint a committee of inspection from among the creditors qualified to vote, or the holders of general proxies or general powers of attorney for such creditors.

5 By ordinary resolution determine the remuneration to be paid to the special manager, if one has been appointed.

The debtor has promised me that he will answer any question that is put to him and will tell the whole truth. I have some notes of questions that I have put to him with reference to the cause of his failure and what has become of the money, which I will tell you if you think he has not sufficiently answered any of the questions.

Mr. Lowder—I think we had better hear them.

The Official Receiver—I have done it with the whole object of getting all the information I could for your benefit. The debtor says—"I sold the Phoenix Saw Mills to Ahrens & Co, that is retransferred the Mills to Mr. Kildoye, as per instruction of the late Mr. Keil, who was then acting for Ahrens & Co. This was done in the presence of witnesses. The total sum which I should be credited for by Ahrens & Co. is yen 45,900. In reference to the Yoshida Shinden property it was sold by my bantōs, without my consent, for an amount not covering the mortgage thereon, yen 66,000. The godowns at Sugura and also at Nakamura were purchased with my money, but I can get no particulars. I now understand Uyeda and Tada have disposed of them, but I have really no details. They were let for yen 400 a month and I value them at yen 25,000. The paper factory at Hongo I had a mortgage on for yen 4,000, which has not been repaid. In Hokkaido there has been yen 20,000 of my money expended on a coal mine. That has been, I think, in Uyeda's name. The documents referring to these properties were taken from my safe while I was in hospital. The land in Kanagawa was bought with my money and cost, one lot 1,000 yen, and another 300 or 400 yen. I think that is in Uyeda's name. I can account for the various losses in trade and on lands purchased which have been lost to me, to probably the whole amount of my liability. That is all about his property. As to his income,—he has been in Japan for fifteen years. Formerly he got 50 yen a month and two years afterwards was raised to 150 yen, and two years later to 200 yen. That it still remains, but latterly he has had a commission of 20 per cent. on all profits from the North German Lloyd, and the same on the London Assurance and on the shipping business. That, gentlemen, is all I have been able to elicit. The debtor is prepared to make a statement and will have to submit to cross-examination. I would again call your attention to what the objects of this meeting are and would suggest that the debtor should make this statement, but it is for you to say who you require it.

Mr. Lowder—I think we should all like to hear what the debtor has to say.

The Debtor—Shall I read this (his statement) over, Mr. Moss?

The Official Receiver—I think you had better make the fullest statement possible. I think it is the best way in your present position.

The Debtor—Then I will read this:—

Shortly after my troubles commenced, which I date from the receipt of telegrams from Bremen, I asked Ahrens, or rather Hoffmann, to keep matters perfectly private, otherwise I would be unable to realize my assets, and that anything said against my credit and character would depreciate my holdings, this naturally would not be in their interest. Hoffmann promised to keep the affair between us and even objected to my resigning from the firm's employ; he pressed me to realise as quickly as possible and in fact begged me to do everything in my power to clear up the difficulties, the more so as the firm had such large outstandings with the Banks. The matter was talked over with regard to shipping the furs, but on account of my sickness it was ultimately decided to send certain telegrams off to Lampson and to await their reply; all these wires, which ended by the resale being agreed upon, were sent with full consent and knowledge of Ahrens and in fact they paid for them. Hoffmann promised to assist me, and £5,000 was the amount which I asked him to remit and he did so. He also agreed to send £1,500 to my London firm in order to assist me to tide over the bills drawn for goods actually shipped to my London firm; this was, however, not done, and I was therefore left in the lurch; the bills had to be protested. Wismer called upon me in the Hospital and asked me whether I had been able to raise any money so as to make the promised remittance to Lampson, i.e. the amount which should follow remittance of £5,000. I informed him that I had not been able to do so and in fact, could manage nothing until I got out of the Hospital and went round myself. I again pressed upon the fact of keeping my affairs perfectly secret, and told them that as I had managed their financial work for the last twelve years it would be greatly to their interest to say nothing outside, the more so on their account than on mine. This matter was fully talked over with Hoffmann and I also pointed out that the nature of my securities were such that any mention of my being insolvent would only make matters worse both for them and me. The minute I arrived from the Hospital I was overruled by Wismer, who wanted money; of course I was unable to give them any. Next morning I tendered my services to the firm but Wismer asked me to leave the office, thereupon tendered my resignation for the second time, and in writing. The next morning I heard from friends regarding rumours then in circulation about me and further that these rumours were given with the authority of Ahrens and Co. and also the late Mr. Keil. I immediately taxed Wismer with this and pointed out that circulating the statements would only do harm. I told him that his action would simply prevent me doing anything with my securities and depress everything I owned. The firm insisted on even having a bill of sale on my furniture in No. 59-B, Yokohama. This certainly did not assist my credit; the amount was only $1,700. As a matter of fact this was the result, and I found it impossible to either borrow money or securities or to sell anything I owned, the parties holding mortgages on land wished for immediate payments, and it was the utmost difficulty that I was able to prevent fire with closure. I was also unable to obtain any credit to carry out outstanding paying contracts and had in some instances to settle these by payment of liquidated damages. All this was followed by the constant demands of Ahrens and the Chartered Bank for cash. The Japanese Sheriff also took charge of the godown properties at Surugachō and Nakamura, and attached them on the demands of people holding mortgages on the Yoshida land. This was done on account of the Chartered Bank having commenced action against me, through my lawyer. I begged the Chartered Bank to keep the case back for a few days so as to enable me to get the securities which I pledged to them, in other hands or transferred to them; this they refused. In the meantime the Japanese papers got full information, so that my affairs were public property, thereby entirely ruining my credit; for the present I had to sit still. Towards July I was able to get some friends to interest themselves regarding the Yoshida Shinden land and I had all the articles drawn up to form a Limited Company (Japanese) to take over this asset. This asset would therefore have been saved for Ahrens, at least my share, besides the profits which would have accrued to my position. About this time I wrote to Ahrens representative, the late Mr. Keil, saying that I should be able to pay off within a year $75,000. To this letter I received no reply, but shortly afterwards I was arrested on the charge for which I am now imprisoned. Naturally all my endeavours were again spoilt and everything stopped. Previous to this I had transferred shares and several amounts to Ahrens also transferred the Phoenix Saw Mills to them. I also paid off several sums against the judgment of the Chartered Bank. I did my best and could do no more. Ahrens all through acted without giving me a chance to get cash.

I next tried to sell the land at public auction, but the sale was frustrated though a combination from outside. From this moment I continued doing my best to sell and settle affairs privately, but without avail; nobody would have anything to do with me until the criminal proceedings were settled.

The firm would not even pay ground rents in the godowns occupied by them; the consequence was I could not keep anything and since I have been in prison all my assets, so far as I am aware, have been lost or sold at abnormally low sums.

Ahrens carried on the same style of ruining me in London, and according to information I received Moseley, their London manager, apparently spread my affairs round the City, the consequence was all my stocks there were fearfully depreciated, specially straw braid; nobody would advance on the goods, and buyers did not bid, as they expected to buy my goods as a bankrupt stock.

Such action on the part of a mercantile firm is incomprehensible, the more so as I had assigned to them all surplus of the London stock. The Chartered Bank refused my firm in London permission to draw samples of goods which had arrived; also they refused to allow my brother to take up drafts unless all presented ones were first paid off; their action made matters worse, preventing me delivering goods against contract, also to realise season goods.

Just before the trial came off I again made an offer to Ahrens, viz. to pay off within 12 months $5,000 and to continue paying $25,000 every six months until my debts were cleared off. I warned them that I feared I should be unable to control my Japanese assets if the case went to trial, no matter which way the result went. They refused this, and now I regret to say that everything is apparently lost.

I attribute my insolvency to the following causes, viz. 1. The action of H. Ahrens, Nachf's, partners Hoffmann and Wismer and their London Manager Moseley.

2. To the action of the Banks forcing sales of all my goods, this I estimate at $30,000 made up as follows: Chartered Bank about $28,000; Hongkong Bank, $12,000, vide pass books and letters.

3. Losses on Phoenix Saw Mills and on kerosene. I accepted a contract from M. Raspe & Co. through their manager Mr. E. Oth, who intimated that he would give us the preference if we accepted at the same price as Fraser Farley & Varnum, viz. 16 cents f.o.b. The cargo ex Sakurishiro, which had arrived in extremely bad condition was used up for this contract—a great loss. I was unable to obtain Japanese lumber to continue delivery at 16 cents; and I understand that Fraser Farley and Varnum would not accept under 22 cents.

4. Nagasaki Hotel. There was a large loss on the execution of this work. The people at the works were unable to calculate the cost price; it was therefore agreed that we would accept Mr. Conder's estimate for material and hand labour, the material calculated being red suugi, fies of knots and hard wood for sills. The contract was completed but it cost double. I remonstrated with Mr. Conder about the matter and showed him his original estimate. From information which I received from the works, Mr. Conder's Japanese says that the estimate which we worked upon was the original one and did not include the annex billiard room or third storey 3 kiln dries. This was destroyed by fire, also the building gutted which contained the hand saw. The kiln was at the time almost full of wood. No fire insurance. The above losses, together with starting expenses, amounted to yen 65,000 besides a debt for lumber of yen 15,000. There is also a loss on lumber bought, but still undelivered, in the meantime partly lost yen 7,000. Interest since books were closed and my portion of living expenses yen 2,000. Total yen 130,000.

5. Schooner Pointer. I owned half share in this schooner. She was totally lost at Shikotan Bay, and without insurance, yen 7,000.

6. Japanese properties. The following properties were paid for by me but I believe that they have been sold or otherwise disposed of without my consent.

	Yen.
Yoshida Shinden Estate	35,000
Kanagawa land	1,000
Godown at Surugachō	20,000
Godown at Nakamura
Unpaid rents on ditto	2,000
Yoshihama-chō godown	700
Paper factory at Hongo	5,000
Reisha Co. shares	1,800

7. Japanese house and godown loss on resale yen 1,000.

8. Nakajimaya Gosli Kaisha and loss on coal contracts and also on account of non-fulfilment of running contracts, as far as I know the losses amount to yen 35,000.

9. Japanese Consignments. Those are losses made on goods shipped and which sold for less than the advance I made against them, yen 5,000.

10. Japanese coal mine. Certain work has been done and I think the outlay will now probably also be lost, and must therefore be written off as a loss, viz. yen 20,000.

11. Furs. I experienced considerable loss on these goods owing to the excessive fluctuations of the London market. I cannot state the actual loss incurred until final accounts are received by me.

12. Goods in London. Through Ahrens & Co.'s action the goods in the hands of C. E. Leopold & Co. will also show considerable loss and I can only state amount on receipt of final accounts which are now being made up in London by chartered accountants. The losses on Nos. 11 & 12 will perhaps amount to yen 100,000, but I cannot say until accounts are closed. All the foregoing pages are to the best of my belief true. I however, made up everything from my head without any date, and there may be mistakes and discrepancies.

(Signed) C. E. LEOPOLD.

Yokohama, 20th Feb., 1899.

That is the statement, gentlemen.

Mr. Lowder—Before applying for the adjudication of the debtor a bankrupt I would state that in the proof tendered on behalf of the Chartered Bank for yen 49,000 odd, the judgment is returned there as a security and 30,000 yen has been assessed as the value of that security. Now, there may be a question as to whether the judgment is a security or not, but, dropping that question, under Rule 10 of the Bankruptcy Act of 1883, I now, on behalf of the Chartered Bank, surrender that security, if it be a security, to you, the Official Receiver, for the general benefit of the creditors, and apply to prove for the whole debt instead of the difference between the two.

Mr. Lowder read the Rule referred to, and continued—It is for this reason that I asked you not to fill in the amount just now.

The Official Receiver—Yes, Mr. Lowder.

Mr. Lowder—That is the application I have to make.

The Official Receiver—That must be granted as a matter of course. It makes things very much simpler for me.

Mr. Lowder—I apply then on behalf of the Chartered Bank, for whom I appear, and also on behalf of Athens & Co., for whom I appear also. I propose a resolution that the debtor be adjudged a bankrupt.

There being no objection taken the resolution was adopted.

The Official Receiver—Then the debtor is declared a bankrupt.

Mr. Lowder—I would appear from the statement we have just listened to that the assets do not exceed £300 and I do not propose, under these circumstances, for the moment, to offer a resolution for the appointment of a trustee. I take it that the Official Receiver will act in that capacity.

The Official Receiver—That is so until another Trustee is appointed.

Mr. Lowder—Now, it is always useful for the Official Receiver to have assistance in these matters and therefore I would propose a resolution for the appointment of a Committee of Inspection from among the creditors qualified to vote. It is the more necessary, I think, in this case, because the statement which has been made by the debtor is extremely unsatisfactory. That is to say, the official statement, and the creditors have had no opportunity whatever of inspecting the books which are now produced. I think for these two reasons, it would be advisable that a Committee of Inspection be appointed.

The Official Receiver assenting, after some discussion, the following Committee was appointed: The Accountant, or Sub-Accountant of the Chartered Bank, and Messrs. Schmiedeknecht, of Messrs. Athens & Co., and Sawada.

Mr. Lowder—In one of the Board of Trade questions put to the debtor he was asked whether he was in partnership with anybody and I took the answer to be "no," but that he wished to add an explanation.

The Official Receiver—He said that he would explain further if the creditors wished him to give further information on that point, because "no" may be misleading as it only partially answers the question and if you wish that answer extended he is prepared to do so.

Mr. Lowder—I wish all the information that he is prepared to give.

The question and answer being read to the debtor the latter said: I was in partnership with no Europeans. That was the reason of my answer "no," and I believe a partnership with Japanese is not legal. Mr. Kidoyle was my partner in the Phoenix Sawmills and we dissolved partnership in the beginning of 1898. I think that business resulted in a heavy loss. There was no partnership deed drawn up; I simply held a mortgage on all the moveables of the whole of the Phoenix Sawmills which covered all buildings, machinery and material. Uyeda Yoshizo was also in a somewhat similar position. There was no deed—there was an agreement drawn up, but not a legal one as far as I am acquainted with the law. That is all I can reply to that, sir.

The Official Receiver—Is that satisfactory, Mr. Lowder?

Mr. Lowder—Without answering that question I should like to ask another one. The debtor has referred in his statement to his London firm and I wish to know the names of the partners in that firm.

The Debtor—There is no partnership deed drawn up for that firm either. The name was C. E. Leopold & Co., and my brother acted in London, but there was no actual partnership at all existing.

Mr. Lowder—Then I understand the firm to have consisted of the debtor? Is that so?

The Debtor—I have considered myself liable as I have admitted all liability in connection with that firm.

Mr. Lowder—That is not the question I asked, Mr. Official Receiver. The question was of whom did that firm consist and who was the partner, or who were the partners of that firm in London?

The Debtor—I was proprietor but I never figured in London myself.

The Official Receiver—Could we not get some information as to how the profits were divided?

The Debtor—There was no partnership drawn up, and I considered myself liable for all the liabilities of the firm.

Mr. Lowder—And the firm then consisted of the debtor?

The Debtor—Yes, under the circumstances I presume that was so, but my brother has assumed liability and has been sued for some of the debts.

Mr. Lowder—That is an evasive answer.

The Debtor—I do not want to give an evasive answer, but that there was no partnership drawn up, and that I consider myself liable.

The Official Receiver—He says the firm in London consisted of himself only.

Mr. Lowder—That is all I want to know.

The Debtor—But the banks have sued him for some of the liabilities.

The Official Receiver—We do not want that. The Debtor—But I wish it to be put on record. The Official Receiver—Has any other creditor any question to put? (Addressing the debtor) If you like to see the answers that were given to these questions I will hand them to you.

The Debtor declined.

Mr. Lowder—As far as I am concerned I will reserve any other question for the public examination. I simply want explanations to-day.

The Official Receiver—Then as to section 121, as the assets are not likely to exceed £300.

Mr. Lowder—I think Mr. Official Receiver, perhaps if I might say so, you are hardly in a position yet to report that the property is not likely to exceed £300.

The Official Receiver—I do not say so. I am not in a position to say so.

Mr. Lowder—And I am not in a position to say whether the creditors I represent will wish to proceed under section 121 because of the exceeding scant information we have as to the value of the assets. Probably it would be premature to form any decision upon that point for the moment.

Mr. Walford—I think, moreover, it would be very inadvisable to proceed under section 121, because it would result in the abolition of the committee of inspection.

The Official Receiver—I do not think so.

Mr. Walford—It says there shall be no committee of inspection under section 121.

The Official Receiver—Does it say there shall be no committee of inspection?

Mr. Walford—Certainly, sub section 2.

The Official Receiver—But the Official Receiver at this present moment is not in a position to say whether the assets are likely to be under £300. That disposes of that question. There is nothing more before the meeting so far as I know. I think you have had it explained to you, and probably know better than I what ought to be done. I think perhaps the first meeting may be closed or adjourned sine die.

Mr. Lowder said he would hardly be prepared for the public examination by the 28th February, as it would be necessary to go through the books.

After some discussion, the debtor undertaking to make as complete a statement as possible with the books at his disposal, the proceedings terminated.

The Official Receiver then announced that the first meeting was closed and that the parties be notified in case of an extension of time being granted, for which he would apply to the Court.

In H.B.M.'s Court for Japan on Wednesday afternoon, a motion was made for adjudicating Charles Emil Leopold a bankrupt.

George Kircher proved service of a copy of the notice produced on the debtor, who said he did not think it desirable that he should be in attendance.

His Honour Judge Wilkinson—Let the order be made.

H.B.M.'S. COURT FOR JAPAN.

Before His Honour Judge WILKINSON.
TUESDAY, February 21st.

THE KOBE INSURANCE CLAIM.

ENRAMBOY PARANY v. CHINA FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY AND CHINA TRADERS' INSURANCE COMPANY.

This was the adjourned hearing of a claim by the plaintiff, a firm of Indian traders at Kobe, against the Companies for indemnity for loss by fire. Mr. H. C. Litchfield appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. J. F. Lowder for the China Fire Insurance Company; and Mr. A. B. Walford for the China Traders' Insurance Company.

The case had been adjourned to have the name of the China Traders' Insurance Company added to the cause as defendants.

Mr. Walford (to the Judge)—May I ask whether we are joined on the title of the action?

His Honour—Yes, it is quite understood that you are joined as one of the defendants.

Mr. Walford said he would like the China Traders' Company specifically added to the title of the action, as it might otherwise be highly inconvenient if the case should go to appeal.

His Honour—Let the amendment be made.

Mr. Walford—I think I ought to state now the position we intend to assume in this action. We admit that so far as the goods lost were not covered by the China Fire policy, we come under a liability to pay the loss, and that liability now continues, and before the commencement of this action we paid the plaintiff the amount which would be due from us if the China Fire were liable under their policy. I think that is all I need state.

Mr. Lowder said it would save time if he said now with reference to the purely technical defences that had been raised in paragraphs 6, 7, 8 and 9 of the answer to the petition, that these would not be relied upon as defences per se, but only in so far as the facts might be necessary to support the main defence. Of course he did this under instructions. There was another point. There was certain salvage that had been disposed of. The disposal of that salvage would not enter into the case one way or the other; it was without prejudice.

Mr. Walford—I agree as regards the salvage.

Mr. Lowder—I may also state that it will be unnecessary for the Court to go into the question of value of cotton destroyed, as the value has, I think, been agreed upon. That is to say, the value per bale has been agreed upon—at 19 yam per picul.

His Honour (to Mr. Walford)—Are you concerned in this?

Mr. Walford—I don't know anything about it; I don't think it affects us.

His Honour—Suppose you are liable—

Mr. Walford—I don't think I can say anything of that; if we are liable we consider we are liable for the value only stated in our policy. I don't think we are concerned in the market values. I don't think there is any objection to this.

His Honour—You don't think it necessary to go into questions of account?

Mr. Walford—I don't think so at all.

Mr. Litchfield said, in view of the admissions made, the question was narrowed down to firstly, whether the risk under policy 4377 attached or not; secondly, if it attached at any time was it a continuing valid policy at the time of the fire, 3rd March; and thirdly, as to the question of evidence, whether evidence would be admissible to explain or vary the terms of the policy. In connection with the third point he would refer his Honour to a case of McKenzie v. Colson bearing on the question. Mr. Litchfield read the case in extenso.

His Honour—I would like to call your attention to the case of Corie v. Patton.

Mr. Litchfield said that was a case of concealment of facts material to the issue of a marine policy, and it was decided that a slip might be looked at when the slip was the conclusion of the terms of the contract. He read the judgment at length. In the case of Corie v. Patton the terms of the slip and those of the policy coincided, and he contended in the present case the application referred to in the 4th paragraph of the answer to the petition for the transfer of the risk of the policy showed the wish of the plaintiff in having the terms of the policy changed, and the terms of transfer on the policy itself coincided with the terms of the application. Consequently as a completed contract on the policy of the 7th of February was the contract before the Court for its decision, and did not vary from the terms of the application, he submitted that what transpired between the plaintiffs and the China Fire Insurance Company in negotiating that policy was immaterial and inadmissible. Again, the defendants in their answer sought to add a restrictive clause limiting the scope of the policy.

His Honour said that the question had to be decided, but would it be convenient to decide it now?

Mr. Lowder said he was prepared to argue the question now, but would prefer to do so when a better foundation had been laid for the argument.

Mr. Walford said in making the admission he had made at the beginning of the proceedings he said the liability of his clients still continued. Of course the liability was lessened by what they had paid to the plaintiff. He would like that put on record.

His Honour assented.

Mr. Walford proceeded to say that though he should wish to adopt the argument of his learned friend and, when the proper time came, to extend it still he thought it was unnecessary to raise any argument on the question of rectification when no rectification had been claimed, and it could only be claimed by means of a counter-claim. Therefore perhaps he might defer for a moment discussing the question of rectification, for he had a great deal to say about it when the time came. The case of McKenzie v. Colson was distinguishable from this action inasmuch as those who sought rectification had a written document to support their case. When there was no document parole evidence was inadmissible.

His Honour—Evidence would be admissible on the ground of misrepresentation.

Mr. Walford—That is not claimed for.

His Honour—There is something claimed. The question is what is the claim in the fifth paragraph. What is your reading of that paragraph?

Mr. Walford—I say it is a rambling statement of facts which lead to nothing at all. It is demurrable and no evidence can be admitted in support of it, I consider that we are entitled to have the paragraph struck out as disclosing no defence whatever.

His Honour said there was no doubt whatever that it was an arguable point, and his only consideration was whether it was best in the interest of all parties that they should now decide it—in which case he might have to take time to consider it—or whether it was better to go on. He was quite prepared, having made that suggestion, to carry it out.

Mr. Walford said he considered he should be greatly prejudiced in having this point not decided, for he saw no defence whatever. There was no misrepresentation claimed, and he did not think his learned friend would suggest any misrepresentation. If any evidence were taken his friend would be using that Court as a means of collecting information on which he might mould a case for which they might be totally unprepared. It was a way of fishing out information to use in a way he (Mr. Walford) might not be prepared for.

His Honour—You apply to have it struck out.

Mr. Walford—Yes, on the ground that it shows no defence.

An application was made by Mr. Litchfield at the commencement of the proceedings, but was adjourned because Mr. Lowder was taken by surprise. Now he cannot be taken by surprise.

His Honour—There was no actual application made to me. It was mentioned, but Mr. Lowder intimated that it would be more convenient for him to argue it later.

Mr. Lowder said if it would help his learned friend he might say he should not ask for rectification.

Mr. Walford—It would help me very much if my learned friend would say what he does ask for.

Mr. Lowder—In reply to that I may say generally that Paragraph 5 ought not to be cut out, because it does disclose a defence. The whole argument resolves itself into this, whether the statements made there are admissible in evidence. I should be better prepared to argue it later.

His Honour—I think Mr. Walford is entitled to have the point decided now.

Mr. Lowder—I think he ought to convince your Honour that there is good reason for striking it out.

His Honour—I think Mr. Walford has said quite enough to call for an answer from you.

Mr. Lowder—I should have to go into the whole point now instead of doing so when I have elicited certain facts which I require for my argument.

His Honour said he thought the point should be argued now.

The Court then adjourned for tiffin.

On resuming Mr. Lowder proceeded to argue against the striking out of the paragraph. He said if it had been intended to raise this question it should have been raised by demurrer, and he thought the application from Mr. Litchfield came with a very bad grace after the withdrawal of the purely technical defences and after the admission that was elicited as to the intention of the parties, when he admitted that the intention of the parties was as stated in paragraph 5 of the answer. He might say the same of counsel for the China Traders. The China Traders' Company was in no better position than the plaintiff himself; the plaintiff's case was his case; he stood or fell by the plaintiff's case, and therefore he could be in no better position.

Mr. Lowder proceeded to argue the point. He said the facts set out in the paragraph alleged that there was a mutual understanding as to the written application of the plaintiff and of what was intended by the transfer of the policy to cover a similar risk from a godown to the open, when in the latter place there might have arisen a possibility, which might not have existed in the godown, of a competition being set up between a fire and a marine policy. The words "a similar risk" needed elucidation under the circumstances. To put it shortly, there could be two questions—what was the risk in the godown, and what was the meaning of a similar risk on the Pier Company's wharf? He submitted that it would be perfectly in order for him to ask whether in the original policy the insurers accepted a risk of possible competition with marine offices, and that if not evidence was admissible to show that in transferring their liability they did not intend to increase their risk by accepting that competition. In other words if the original policy did not include that risk the transfer was not intended to include it. Then again evidence, he submitted, was admissible to show the rate payable on the goods in the godown and whether it was the same on the Pier. Anything, in fact, to show that what was called a similar risk was not and could not be construed as the same risk. He should submit that to add to the original risk the risk of coming into competition with a marine policy involving the possibility of litigation was making the risk a much more onerous one. By "coming into competition with a marine policy," he meant a position in which the goods might incur the possibility of being regarded as under two policies—one marine and one a land policy—concurrently, involving the possibility of litigation between the two companies, as had happened in this case.

His Honour—Then I understand you want to adduce evidence that there was a mutual understanding between the insurers and the China Fire Insurance Company that the latter's policy was not to cover any goods coming under a marine policy?

Mr. Lowder—Yes. I will go so far as to say that if these goods were not covered by a marine policy we are liable. I have noted the issues to be argued by and by as follows. First, the intention of my clients and the plaintiff was to cover only such risks as were not covered by marine policies; secondly, was the risk a question covered by the marine policies? Arising out of the first question is the point whether I am to be allowed to give this evidence as to the intention of the parties.

Mr. Lowder proceeded to argue the point in detail, quoting authorities and dealing with the arguments of the other side. The whole argument, and his Honour's frequent interpellations, were of a highly technical nature, and to reproduce them would not add to readers' information.

The Court at the conclusion of Mr. Lowder's speech adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, Feb. 22nd.

The hearing of this case was continued, counsel appearing as before.

Mr. Lowder continued his argument at some length, saying that he relied on an unintentional misrepresentation on the part of the plaintiff to the China Fire Insurance Company to the effect that there were no other policies on the goods insured.

Mr. Walford, in reply, pointed out that the China Fire agent asked the agent of Pabany if there were any other policies, and he replied that perhaps there were and perhaps there were not, he could not say. If the China Fire agent had required more particular information he should have obtained it.

Mr. Lowder—That is not in evidence.

His Honour pointed out to Mr. Lowder that he thought paragraph 5 of the answer to the petition was totally inconsistent with the defence just set up. He (the learned Judge) thought the two statements would not hang together at all. One statement was that the plaintiff represented that the cargo was not covered by a marine policy against fire, and paragraph 5 of the answer to the petition stated that plaintiff represented that some was and some was not.

Mr. Lowder said if necessary he would ask to amend paragraph 5 to allow that argument, for it was certainly intended to include the whole question.

A long legal argument ensued, at the end of which Mr. Walford said he understood that all question of the China Fire having been mist as to past facts was now cleared away.

His Honour assented, remarking that he could not let that be set up in face of the statements in paragraph 5.

Mr. Walford then applied for the paragraph to be struck out.

His Honour said he had decided first to hear evidence, and he would then hear Mr. Walford's argument as to its admissibility. He would take note of Mr. Walford's objection. He would hear evidence in reference to paragraph 5 and nothing else.

Mr. Walford said he thought his Honour must be convinced that paragraph 5 did not disclose any defence, and that it was not in accordance with any rules of pleading. He therefore thought the first thing was that paragraph 5 should be struck out.

His Honour said without deciding whether the paragraph should be struck out he would hear evidence in support of it, without any prejudice.

Mr. Walford asked if the defence could be amended so as to show the allegation of a collateral agreement which was now put forward.

Mr. Lowder said he thought it was already indicated in the paragraph.

His Honour dissented.

Mr. Lowder—Then I will alter it in order to meet your Honour's suggestion.

After further discussion it was decided to amend the paragraph so as to read: "The defendant company says that it was then and there agreed by the parties that the transfer of the policy as requested by the plaintiff should be construed to protect against fire only such goods on the Pier as might not be protected against fire by a marine policy or policies or in respect of which the fire clause of the marine policy or policies might have expired."

Mr. Walford—Of course I am understood to demur to this, your Honour.

His Honour said he would now take evidence on the statements in the paragraph.

Mr. Lowder asked whether the witnesses were to be regarded as witnesses for the plaintiff or for the China Traders.

His Honour said the plaintiff was indifferent as to the result; it was no matter to him which defendant lost, since the defendants agreed that he should be indemnified in any case. He thought therefore the witness should be open to cross-examination on both sides.

Mr. Lowder said he had understood that the plaintiff's case was also the China Traders' Company's.

His Honour suggested that Mr. Walford might explain.

Mr. Walford said they contended that the China Fire policy attached to the goods, and they had a clause in their policy which, they contended, exempted them from all liability until the China Fire had discharged its liability.

Rohmtulla Vasey, agent for the plaintiff, was then called, and examined by Mr. Litchfield. On the 25th, February, 1898, witness received 500 bales of cotton ex steamer Maria Valeris. On the same day he received 500 bales from the Idzumi Maru. The whole of the former were landed before the fire, and 337 bales of the latter. He had not taken delivery at the time of the fire. After the fire he sent in a claim to the China Traders' Company, but received a letter repudiating all liability and referring him to the China Fire Company. On February 7th witness wrote to the China Fire asking them to transfer the risk on policy 4377, originally covering goods in a godown at Ono to the Pier Company's wharf at Kobe. He had then ceased to store goods at Ono.

Mr. Litchfield then put in a quantity of correspondence, which was admitted on both sides.

Witness, continuing his evidence, spoke of an interview he had with Mr. Teveson, a member of the staff of the agents of the China Fire Insurance Company. This was before the fire occurred. Mr. Teveson came to see him about transferring the risk. Teveson said he could not take the risk. Witness explained that the goods which were coming by the steamers were covered by a marine policy; he said some marine policies had no clause for fire, and others had a fire clause for a short period while the goods were remaining on the wharf. Mr. Teveson returned to his office to report the matter to the agents, and after that witness received a policy endorsed with the agents' names.

Mr. Lowder—Mr. Teveson before he returned consented to issue a policy on these terms.

Witness—No, he said he would report to the agents, and if they consented a policy would be issued.

The Court at this point adjourned.

On resuming, Mr. Lowder proceeded to cross-examine at length. Witness said he was not in the habit of insuring goods in two offices twice over. The letter produced was a press copy of one written by witness to the China Traders' Company. Mr. Lowder read the letter, which pointed out that the first and entire responsibility for the payment rested with the China Traders' Company, and whatever arrangement they might make as to the China Fire Company bearing a portion of the loss did not concern him (witness). He had corresponded with the China Fire as a matter of courtesy, but he could not continue the negotiations.

Witness said he wrote that under the impression that the China Traders' Company was liable, but he was afterwards informed that the other company was liable also. The letters produced were written to the China Fire Insurance Company at the request of the China Traders' Company. They were written by witness, from the draft of a legal gentleman. Up to the 7th March, 4 days after the fire, he had not made any claim on the China Fire Company. During that time he had sent in a claim to the China Traders' Company.

Mr. Lowder was about to put to witness a letter written on his behalf by Mr. C. N. Cross to the China Traders' Company, dated March 15th, when

Mr. Walford objected on the ground that the production of further correspondence between the parties was inadmissible.

His Honour said that every possible liberty should be given in cross-examination, and was inclined to overrule the objection, but after examining the letter he said he did not think it would be one that could be allowed to go before a jury.

Mr. Lowder said he intended to attempt to put in other correspondence, and this was a link. He called for a letter of the 13th April, to the China Traders' Company, enclosing a claim for ¥24,700 55.

Mr. Walford again objected on the ground that the correspondence was irrelevant.

The Judge, after looking at the letter, said he thought the correspondence was of very little value to the case—extremely little value. It might perhaps be taken down that Mr. Crosse applied for the whole amount of the claim.

Mr. Walford—Probably he did. Yes, he did. I admit that.

This fact only was therefore noted.

Mr. Lowder called for a letter from Mr. Garfit, agent of the China Traders, of the 15th April.

Mr. Walford said he should be pleased to let His Honour see it, but he objected to its going in.

His Honour—As it is objected to, Mr. Lowder, I must take the objection and consider it.

Mr. Lowder—I must insist upon my right of putting this letter in.

Mr. Lowder argued at length in favour of the admission of the letter, and said he only desired to put it in as leading up to the next.

His Honour—Let me see the next.

The letter was handed in.

After examining it His Honour said Mr. Lowder might put any questions he wished as a foundation for the introduction of the letter, and after that he could argue the question of admissibility.

Witness, in reply to questions, said he received the letter (produced) from Mr. Garfit and after reading it instructed Mr. Crosse to reply. He did not see Mr. Crosse's reply.

His Honour said he would reserve the question of the admissibility of the letters.

Mr. Lowder called for other letters, and the same objection was taken.

Mr. Walford—I don't see why the China Fire correspondence should be made public in this manner.

Mr. Lowder—We are not addressing the public but this Court; I don't see why you should attribute such a motive to us.

Examination continued—Between the 3rd and 7th March witness had various conversations with the China Fire agents. He made a claim for some saffron flour. That was the only claim he made up to March 7th, and he should not have brought the present claim with regard to the cotton if he had not been advised that the China Traders were not liable. It was in consequence of advice that he brought that action.

Mr. Lowder—Now I am going to ask if the China Traders, when they paid part of the witness's claim, made it a condition that the witness should bring the present action.

Mr. Walford objected, but His Honour ruled that the question might be put.

The witness said it was paid on condition that the China Traders should be exempt from any action until the liability of the China Fire Company was determined. It was also a condition that the case should go to appeal if judgment were given adversely to the China Traders. He was also to be refunded taxed costs, and interest on the balance of the claim.

By Mr. Walford—He thought the position as to the insurance was that the China Traders must pay him, and then they must claim from the China Fire. Witness meant to leave all that to the China Traders. Before the arrangement was made by the China Traders witness had intended to sue both companies.

Mr. Litchfield—That closes the plaintiff's case. His Honour—Out of respect for the memory of the late President of the French Republic, I propose to adjourn over to-morrow, when the memorial service will be held, and will sit again on Friday morning. I am prepared to go on now.

Mr. Lowder then called Mr. Teverson, in the employ of the agents for the China Fire Insurance Company. He said he remembered application being made for policy 4377. He went to see the last witness, and told him he was afraid he could not make the transfer requested. If it was for one or two nights only witness might possibly oblige him. He replied that he wished the policy transferred to cover goods that were coming forward, or that might be coming forward. Witness enquired if his marine insurance policy did not cover these goods. Mr. Vasey replied "In most cases, but not all." Witness further enquired if there was not a stamped clause on the marine policy covering the risk of fire at the Haikuba. Mr. Vasey replied "Yes, in some cases, but not all; I can show you." Witness asked him not to trouble. He enquired if Mr. Vasey wished the policy transferred to cover goods which had not this clause stamped on or printed on, or if the allotted time allowed by the Marine Insurance policy had expired. Mr. Vasey replied "Yes." Witness then returned to the office and consulted his senior, after which the endorsement was made and the policy returned to Mr. Vasey. On the morning of the fire Mr. Vasey said he did not think he had any claim against the China Fire, but he was not quite sure. Witness called again in the afternoon, and Vasey said he would have a small claim to make for saffron flour. He said that his other goods were covered by marine policies. The witness was cross-examined by Mr. Walford, but nothing of much importance was elicited.

William Duran Stuart Edwards, in the employ of the agents of the China Fire Insurance Company, was next called, and only asked a few formal questions by Mr. Lowder.

In answer to Mr. Walford he said it would not be usual in insurance business to cover goods from places as far apart as Bombay and Kobe with one policy. Witness remembered having interviews with Mr. Crosse, but very little was said as to the details of the case, witness only telling him that he had referred the matter to Hongkong.

By Mr. Lowder—Witness remembered seeing Mr. Vasey after the fire, and he said he thought the cotton was covered by marine policies. He also brought a marine insurance policy issued by the North China Insurance Company to verify his claim for some saffron flour as showing that the fire risk at the wharf was not covered under that policy. Witness suggested that Mr. Teverson should go to the Wharf to inspect the saffron flour. He promised he should do all in his power to settle a claim very might have.

Mr. Lowder—That is the case for the defence, my lord.

The Court then rose.

DEATH OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE FRENCH REPUBLIC.

(SPECIAL TELEGRAMS RECEIVED AT THE LEGATION OF FRANCE IN TOKYO.)

Paris, 17th & 18th Feb.

M. Félix Faure, President of the French Republic, died suddenly on the evening of the 16th of February from a stroke of apoplexy. His Excellency was working in his study at 6 p.m. when he felt some symptoms of indisposition, and summoned assistance. M. Le Gall, Chief of his Private Cabinet, at once gave all possible succour, and physicians were speedily summoned. But in spite of all medical efforts the President became unconscious at about 8 o'clock, and expired two hours later, surrounded by his family and the Ministers of the Cabinet.

Profound emotion has been caused throughout the country by this sad event. Perfect quiet reigns, however, in Paris and the Provinces. Numerous telegrams of condolence are arriving from all foreign countries and sovereigns, notably from His Majesty the Emperor of Germany.

The State funeral will take place on the 23rd instant.

A Congress for the election of M. Faure's successor will be summoned at Versailles on the 19th instant.

NEW PRESIDENT OF THE FRENCH.

Saigon, Feb. 19th, 1899.

M. Emile Loubet, President of the Senate, was elected, yesterday, President of the French Republic on the first ballot, the Congress sitting in Versailles, by 481 votes to 270 for M. Meline, who had declined to be a candidate.

The sitting of the Congress was without incident.

DEMONSTRATIONS AGAINST THE PRESIDENT.

Saigon, Feb. 21.

Hostile demonstrations took place again yesterday evening in Paris, but were not of a very serious character. About 100 arrests were made. Everything is quiet to-day.

CONDOLENCES.

Telegrams of condolence have been received from all Sovereigns and Chiefs of States.

Mr. Balfour and Lord Salisbury in the English Parliament, and Prince Hohenlohe in the German, delivered eulogies on M. Felix Faure and expressed sympathy with France.

The Italian Chamber suspended their sitting in token of respect.

MOURNING.

The Cabinet has decided that French officials shall observe mourning for 30 days from the 17th February.

M. LOUBET'S CAREER.

M. Emile Loubet—born 1838. Doctor of Law. Maire of the city of Montelimar. Elected deputy 1876; reelected, 1877 and 1881. Senator 1885.

Minister of Public Works in the Tirard Cabinet, 1887.

Prime Minister and Minister of Interior, 1892.

President of the Senate from 1895; which office he has held up to the present time.

Elected President of the Republic 19th Feb., 1899.

THE INAUGURAL MESSAGE.

Saigon, Feb. 22.

The Message of President Loubet, read to the Chambers, says that the regularity with which power was transferred proves the fidelity of France to the Republican form of Government. At a moment when some thoughtless persons seek to disturb the confidence of the country in its institutions, the Message insists upon the necessary of sobriety and union on the part of the citizens, and on the necessity of respecting the essential organs of society, namely, Parliament, the Magistracy, the Government, and the National Army. The Message concludes by recalling the work of the Republic, which has secured liberty and peace; which has founded a great colonial empire, and which has attained for France an alliance and precious friendships. (The Message was received with applause.)

EUROPEAN DELEGATES TO M. FAURE'S FUNERAL.

Saigon, Feb. 23.

The Delegates of all the Sovereigns and Governments of Europe, to attend the obsequies of the late M. Faure, have arrived at Paris.

M. Loubet, the new President, will also attend the funeral rites.

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE AND THE PRESS.

The majority of the press is satisfied with the President's Message to the National Congress.

CONDOLENCE FROM JAPAN.

H.I.M. the Emperor of Japan sent a telegram of condolence to the French Government on Monday.

The following appears in Men of the Time:—Faure, François Felix, President of the French Republic, was of Protestant descent, although personally he was a Catholic, and was born in Paris on January 30th, 1841. He was a self-made man, and began life as a journeyman tanner in Touraine, but eventually became a shipowner in Havre, where for some time he was President of the local Chamber of Commerce. During the Franco-German War he was at the head of a detachment of volunteers, and brought supplies from Havre to Paris in aid of those burnt out by the Commune. At the election of August 2nd, 1881, he presented himself as a parliamentary candidate in the third circonscription of Havre, and was elected as a Republican by 5,876 votes as against 5,675 polled by M. Le Vaillant du Douët, his Monarchist opponent. In the cabinet formed by Gambetta on Nov. 14th, 1881, Felix Faure was Under Secretary of State to the new Ministry of Commerce and the Colonies. He went out of office with the other members of the Government in January, 1882, but was recalled to the same post in M. Jules Ferry's last cabinet, formed in September, 1883. He retired with his colleagues in March, 1885. Subsequently, as one of the chiefs of the group of the Republican Union, he often spoke on colonial questions, and was understood to be an authority on the Chinese, Japanese, and kindred questions. At the election of October, 1885, M. Felix Faure was returned as a Republican for the Seine-Inférieure, and for the third time occupied his old post at the Colonial Ministry in the Tirard Cabinet (January 5th, 1888, to the following February). At the elections of September, 1889, he was returned for the second division of Havre, beating his Monarchist opponent, M. Anselme, by a large majority. In the Deputy government he was Minister of Marine, and in this capacity showed a reforming spirit. On January 17th, 1895, he was elected, on a second ballot to the Presidency of the French Republic, rendered vacant by the sudden retirement of M. Casimir-Perier. At the first ballot M. Brisson was returned by an insufficient majority, and, when this was announced, M. Waldeck-Rousseau, another candidate for the Presidency, retired in favour of his fellow-moderate, M. Faure, who was elected by 430 votes, as against 361 given to M. Brisson. M. Faure was a Government, or moderate, republican of M. Perier's point of view, and he filled a difficult position with a great deal of tact.

Notes by Mr. Hoffer.

(a) Lasker, in "Common Sense in Chess," says to this move—White has, to a certain extent, compromised himself with the advance of the K B P. Why does he advance it then himself? It should also be mentioned that White has a better variation at his disposal earlier with 10—R to K sq, as played by Pillsbury against Tarrach in the second game of the tie-match in Vienna.

(b) Black does not follow "Common Sense" any further, because 13—B to Kt 3 is given as correct.

(c) The utmost that Black can hope for now is a draw. Consequently, he might have played at once 14—P takes P, 15—P takes P, B to K3, leaving White an isolated Pawn to compensate somewhat for his own inferior Pawn position.

(d) Here, again, he could have simplified matters with 17—Q takes P; 18—Q takes Q, P takes Q; 19—R to K sq. B to Q 2; 20—R takes P, R to Q sq, &c.

(e) Even now there is not much harm done. He might play 22—B to B sq, and wait events.

(f) A strong move, the Rook being all powerful against the isolated Pawns on the Queen's side. The ending, beginning with the next move, is pretty and instructive.

Notes (abridged) by Emil Kemeny.

(a) The usual play is B to K2, and if White moves Q to K2 then Kt to Q3. In recent contests, however, the text move is given preference.

(b) B takes Kt, followed by P takes P and Q takes Q ch, is perhaps the best continuation.

(c) The text move is a novelty. If Black answers B takes K P then P takes Kt, and eventually Kt to Q4 and P to KB4 R to K-q, etc., may follow, White obtaining a promising attack.

(d) P to Q B3 might have been played first, so as to prevent White from Kt to Q5. This, however, would have weakened Black's Q P.

(e) He could not otherwise guard against the threatening Kt takes P ch, winning the exchange.

(f) He could not play P takes P, for R takes P and eventually Q to K B sq follow, White threatening R to B7 ch, with a winning position. Nor could he move P to Q B3; White answers Kt to Kt 6 ch or P takes P and R to B7 ch. The latter play would have followed if Black had moved P to K R3. The text move was evidently Black's best play. His KB is now in no danger, since he may play B to Q5 ch.

(g) Better perhaps was P to Q R4 at once. The Rook was better placed at R-q than at Kt-q.

(h) More aggressive, perhaps, was P to R5.

(i) He could not play P to B5 on account of R to R8 ch, R takes R and R takes P ch.

(k) K to Kt2 was not any better. The move selected makes the Q R P quite dangerous. White, however, enforces a draw by a neat sacrifice of a Pawn.

(l) To prevent Black from playing K to Kt sq and K to R sq.

(m) He could not escape the perpetual check.

NOTES.

A Roman edict of 125 B. C. condemning games of chance exempted chess. Chess is mentioned in Homer's Odyssey—

At chess they vie to captivate the Queen.

Here is a verse from the ancient poet, Iun ul Mutaz:—

"O thou, whose cynic sneers express
The censure of our favourite chess
Know that its skill is science self,
Its play distraction from distress;
It soothes the anxious lover's care;
It weans the drunkards from excess
It counsels warriors in their art,
When dangers threat and perils press:
And yields us, when we need them most,
Companions in our loneliness."

Mr. Bird, in his "Chess History and Reminiscences," gives a diagram showing the position of placing the pieces in Chiaranga 3,000 B.C. This is taken from an old manuscript, written about 2,000 years before the period of Alexander the Great, which states that King Pandu's eldest son asked a wise counsellor of his father's to explain to him the game "that is played on the eight times eight square board." Vyasa, the counsellor, then explained to him the game and the position of the pieces; from which Mr. Bird has made his diagram.

The question of the standard number of moves for a perfect Chess Problem, notwithstanding the popularity of the three-mover, is still an open one, and the four-move tourney instituted by the British Chess Magazine will be watched with interest by all lovers of problems of the deeper kind. Lloyd, the well-known American composer, looks upon three moves as the standard, and says he has seldom seen a theme which could not be expressed better in three than in more moves. There are many, however, who consider that a first-rate four-mover approximates more closely to perfection, whilst it is scarcely open to doubt that a whole bookful of problems in that number of moves could be compiled, anyone of which would be utterly spoiled by the amputation of a move. In still longer stratagems the difficulty of achieving striking excellence on the basis of a genuine theme is very great and, if effected, is likely to cost too much time and labour both in composition and solution.

To show how far reaching is chessic fame:—Buckle once, on a visit in Italy, went to a café, where chess was played, and was immediately challenged to a game. "For a lira?" asked the Italian. "As you like," responded Buckle. "For two, three, or you might prefer five?" insisted the other. "Oh, a hundred, if you like," was Buckle's reply. Then, after a pause, his antagonist asked, "Please, what is your name?" The answer came "Buckle," to which the Italian exclaimed, "You are Signor Buckle? In that case I will not play you at all."

Chess Tactics.—If at the end of a game you have a slight inferiority of force, such as Knight, Bishop, and two Pawns, against Rook, Bishop, and two Pawns, you have generally, said the late George Walker, "a better chance of drawing by exchanging as much as possible than by the contrary mode of play, remembering to keep, however, one piece to sacrifice for Pawn or Pawns. The more pieces there are on the board the greater chance of winning is there for him who has the superior force. Therefore, when left with a surplus Pawn, or some other trifling advantage, do not be too eager to change off the pieces."

YOKOHAMA: SATURDAY, FEB. 18TH, 1899.

BIRTH.

On December 17th, at Clifton-street, Cliftonville, Brooks Barr, Manchester, the wife of L. T. CORKE, E. Q., of a daughter.

DEATH.

At 5.30 p.m. on Monday, the 13th February, at Kobe, ANNIE, the wife of Capt. H. J. Carrow, of Kobe, aged 46 years.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

PRESIDENT McKINLEY has signed the Treaty of Peace.

A MAN was killed by a landslide at Nakamura, Yokohama, on Monday.

YOKOHAMA won the Interport football match by seven goals to two.

THE Dreyfus bill has been handed over to a Committee of the French Senate.

THE Diet has had a very busy but quiet week, several new legislative acts being placed on the statute book.

THE house of the Second Secretary of the Russian Legation, Tokyo, was entirely destroyed by fire on Saturday.

At the general meeting of the Nippon Ginko on the 18th a dividend of 12 per cent. per annum will be declared.

THE funeral of Mr. Hara Zenshiro, a wealthy banker of Yokohama, took place in a blinding snow storm on Thursday.

AT 10 a.m. on Sunday fire broke out at Sogamachi, Chiba-gori, Chiba Prefecture, resulting in the burning of 55 houses, and the partial destruction of eight. In the afternoon of the same day, a fire occurred in the Kyoto Post Office, Sanjo, the whole building being reduced to ashes. The mail matter was saved. Telephonic communication between Kyoto and Osaka has been interrupted.

THE projectors of the Sôul Fusan Railway are in negotiation with foreign capitalists as to the provision of funds for the construction of the line. The latter have proposed to provide 15,000,000 yen at 4.5 per cent. interest for a term of ten years, the work to be finished in three years. The Japanese projectors are said to regard such an arrangement with favour. Experts of the Communications Department are to be despatched to make a survey of the line.

THE FOREIGN LOAN.

February 14.

It is asserted in all quarters that the preliminary arrangements for a foreign loan have been completed. The negotiations were opened by Count Inouye and had nearly been carried to maturity when he went out of office. If the story told by the vernacular press be correct, Mr. Alexander A. Shand, formerly adviser to the Finance Department, has been chiefly instrumental in placing the loan, and has worked in concert with Mr. Kato, the Japanese Representative in London. We can not speak with certainty on the subject, but the persistence of this rumour suggests that it is not entirely baseless. The rate of interest is said to be 3½ or 4, the selling price of the bonds 98, and the amount of the loan, 100 million yen.

February 16.

An official contradiction is published of the statement that negotiations for a loan of 100 million yen have been concluded with London capitalists. The vernacular press maintains, however, that the difference between the original rumour and the Finance Department's version is one of degree only and that the negotiations are really within sight of completion. We imagine, for our own part, that our vernacular contemporaries lose sight of an important point, namely, the distinction between working through a bank like Parr's and going direct to the Bank of England. What the Finance Department desires to deny, doubtless, is not the fact that a loan is on the tapis, but the idea that recourse has been had to any secondary channel instead of making direct application to the fountain-head. It is generally agreed that Japan injured her credit greatly by the plan she pursued last spring with regard to a loan of four millions sterling. Of course, people familiar with the exact circumstances know that the Finance Department's intention was to provide a channel for the sale of Japanese bonds in London. What Count Matsukata had in mind was not a loan, in the ordinary acceptance of the term, but merely the opening of the London market to Japanese public securities. When the project came to be realized, however, it proved impossible to induce foreign capitalists to buy the bonds without a special agreement providing for the payment of the interest and principal in gold, and the introduction of such a condition changed the character of the transaction radically. Indeed, so far from opening the London market to Japanese bonds, the procedure of the Tokyo financiers tended to close it, for they established a precedent which could not be followed by ordinary folk and was not likely to be dispensed with by future lenders. To the eyes of the general public Japan presented the spectacle of a State so impecunious as to need foreign accommodation to the extent of a trifling sum of four millions sterling, and moving in such an outside sphere of financial credit that she had to work through comparatively insignificant agencies. It is important that she should not repeat that mistake. The time has not come for placing her bonds on the London market side by side with British securities. Her best plan is come forward frankly as a borrower, and to work through the Bank of England. Recognising those facts, the Finance Department has doubtless considered it wise to contradict the rumours about Parr's Bank. As to the origin of the rumours, it may be traced, we presume, to the circumstance that Mr. A. A. Shand, now Manager of that institution and formerly adviser to the Finance Department in Tokyo, had communications with Mr. Kato, Japanese Representative in London, after the placing of the four millions' loan last spring, and subsequently addressed himself to official circles in Tokyo for information. Japanese journals have connected the British Legation with the negotiations for the loan which is now on the tapis, and have even gone so far as to say that Her Majesty's Minister employed his good offices to recommend the services of Parr's Bank. It should not be necessary to point out that British Representatives never meddle in such matters, nor ever stand sponsor for private firms. Any part taken by Her Majesty's Legation in this affair must have been strictly limited to furnishing information, when applied for, in the ordinary routine of official duties.

SALARIES OF MEMBERS OF THE DIET.

There are some subtle distinctions in Japan, and occasionally they appear to be due to accidents of nomenclature. For example, the charge levied by the Postal Authorities for transmitting a letter is essentially in the nature of compensation for services rendered, and ought therefore, according to the Constitution, to be fixed by the Government without reference to the Diet. Some of our readers probably remember a keen dispute which occurred between the Cabinet and the House of Representatives six years ago about the levying of fees for shooting licenses. The Cabinet claimed that these fees were compensation for administrative services (tesuriyo), not a tax, and the House asserted that they were a tax. Whatever may have been the rights and wrongs of that discussion, it clearly established the fact that money levied in consideration of administrative services is determinable by the Government without the Diet's consent. Postal rates ought seemingly to belong to that category, if any payments do. But long before any Constitutional power of granting or withholding administrative supplies was rested in the people, postal charges received the name of yubin-sei, and since sei is the official term for tax, we find the Cabinet carefully consulting the Diet before venturing to meddle with postal charges. So, again, the right to fix the salaries of officials is explicitly reserved to the Sovereign by the Constitution, and at first sight it seems that the pay of members of the Diet should belong to the category of official salaries and consequently be under His Majesty's independent control. But that is not the Government's view. The remuneration of the members of the Diet is called saihi, whereas the pay of officials is known as kuryo, and the law recognises a practical distinction. For whereas only a portion of an official's salary can be impounded for debt, the whole of a Parliamentary member's remuneration is liable. The rule as to an official's pay is that his creditors may not impound more than one half of the difference between his whole annual salary and 300 yen. Thus, up to 300 yen his stipend is absolutely secure, and he is further safe with regard to one half of the excess over that sum. But a member of the Diet is, in that respect, entirely at the mercy of those to whom he owes money. Hence the Government does not regard the members as officials, or attempt to change their remuneration without recourse to the regular process of a Bill. Tokyo newspapers are unanimous in asserting that the present Cabinet had decided to increase the saihi from 800 yen to 2,500 for each member, and from 2,000 and 4,000 in the case of the Vice-President and President, respectively, to 4,000 and 6,000. The Liberals, however, have stipulated that the figure for the members shall not exceed 1,500 and the figures for the President and Vice-President 5,000 and 3,000, respectively. There is a good deal of amusement at the notion that the Cabinet's generous intentions are restricted by the moderation of the members. Critics are inclined to attribute the initiative in this "reform" to the men who will benefit by it, and to detect a mere "face-saving" arrangement in the coyness that the latter display. At all events, it is alleged that a Bill embodying the proposed changes will be submitted in a few days. We shall believe it when we see it. The measure would involve an additional expenditure of nearly three quarters of a million yen—supposing that the new Law of Election passes—, and there is no surplus revenue to cover such an outlay. Besides, other considerations seem to render the step very unlikely.

COUNT OKUMA.

In one of our Tokyo contemporaries we read that the Emperor of Austria-Hungary has conferred the Order of Leopold upon Count Okuma, in connexion with the conclusion of the Revised Treaty, and that the Austro-Hungarian Chargé d'Affaires proceeded to Waseda on the 13th instant, for the purpose of presenting the decoration to the Count. In another journal (the Asahi) we find a report of an interview with the ex-Prime Minister. Count Okuma spoke with his usual frankness. Discussing first the new project of Election Law, he strongly approved the change in the method of voting, and the increased representation that will be secured to the urban population. The Count is a firm believer in the industrial future of Japan. She will become, by-and-by, a manufacturing country, he thinks, and in this context he alluded to the success achieved by Japanese watch-makers, and to the fact—of which we were not aware—that Japanese bicycles are beginning to find a market abroad. Thence the recognition given to the urban population by the framers of the revised Law of Election is wise and proper. Passing on to speak of the general condition of the country, the Count affirmed that the talk now heard about commercial, manufacturing, and general depression emanated chiefly from speculators in shares. For such folk the time is very unfavourable, but the great bulk of the people are pursuing their business industriously and successfully, and the condition of the nation as a whole is eminently prosperous. Count Okuma's enemies will find here a text for a sermon against him. Why, they will ask with some show of justice, why did he base his opposition to the Land Tax on the supposed inability of the people to bear a heavier burthen if he thinks that they are so well-to-do?

In connexion with foreign politics the Count spoke without any diplomatic reserve. Since the war with China, he said, Japan has been regarded by some nations as a dangerous rival, as a disturber of the peace, as a foe to Christianity, and as a possible enemy to Europe. The best way to correct such an injurious view is to cement an alliance with a Western Power—an Anglo-Japanese alliance, or an Anglo-American-Japanese alliance, or an Anglo-American-German-Japanese alliance. Any one of these combinations would do, but some one of them ought to be effected as soon as possible. The Count also condemned the action of the Diet in excising the appropriations for a Consulate at Odessa.

THE RULE OF THE ROAD.

Any one passing through the Sakurada Gates in Tokyo will observe that policemen are stationed in each gate and also in the avenue leading to it, and that they devote their time to assiduously directing the streams of foot-passengers and vehicles to the left side of the street. Notice boards are also erected, and it is evident that the police have very explicit orders to enforce the rule of the road. The same precautions are now adopted at various other important points in the city, and doubtless after a time the educatory effects of the measure will become generally perceptible. It is noticeable, however, that the police pay not the slightest attention to passing foreigners. They allow them to take whichever side of the street they please. They understand evidently what we have often remarked—that they have no power to enforce the rule of the road where foreigners are concerned, and that they had better not make the attempt. As a matter of fact it does not occur to foreigners when walking along a street (without a foot-path) that they ought to keep to the left side. In London, on great festive occasions when the crowds of foot-passengers flow over the trottoirs and occupy the streets, the police do take care to divide them into two currents, each keeping to its own left of the road. The same precaution is evidently useful in Tokyo as a general rule, for there are no side-walks except in Ginza.

Speaking of the police we may mention that the idea of increasing the number of the force in Tokyo from next July is suggested, not by any anticipation of the advent of lawless foreigners, but by a desire to provide more efficacious means of protection to strangers visiting the city. Whether the Chief of Police expects any large advent of foreigners under the new system, or whether he simply deems it his duty to be prepared for all possible contingencies, we do not know, but it is as well that the motive of his procedure should not be misinterpreted.

THE RAILWAY SCHEME.

The Representation for nationalizing the private railways receives no journalistic support. It is regarded as a kind of comedy, planned by speculators in shares who, for some time, have been busily going in and out among the members of the Constitutional Party. Of course, the holders of shares would benefit substantially were the measure carried. Readers who have taken note of Mr. Kuribara's speech in the House of Representatives, know that, according to the most moderate estimate suggested by him as a basis of negotiation with the companies, they would receive Government bonds of a total face value of 140 million yen for property on which they have expended only 98 millions. If, again, we calculate the value of a fifty-yen share of each line at the market rates now ruling, and place the results side by side with Mr. Kuribara's figures under the scheme of State purchase, we have these results:—

	Present market price of 50 yen share.	Price of a 50 yen share under the scheme of State purchase.
Japan Railway Company...	70.30	84
Sanyo R.	63.00	93
Kanshin R.	68.00	83
Kobe R.	107.25	123

It would evidently be a sweet transaction for the shareholders and for speculators in shares, if such figures were adopted. Critics say that the project is born entirely of the general depression which marks the time. In 1891 and 1892, the commercial and industrial horizon was similarly over-clouded, and people talked a great deal about the theoretical advantages of State ownership. Then in the sunshine of prosperity immediately after the war with China, nothing was heard but demonstrations of the superiority of private ownership. Now, the shadow of adversity having again crept over the face of the land, everybody has gone back to the doctrine of State ownership. By and by, when the light breaks out once more, the creed of private ownership will be revived. Such is the forecast of journals like the Fuji Shimpō. We ourselves find it impossible to regard the matter seriously. As a means of obtaining money from abroad and thus releasing some of the capital that has been fixed in such large quantities during the past 20 years, State purchase might be a good step, but, in the form advocated by the Representation, no special advantages are discernible. At all events, the fortnight that remains of the Diet's session can not possibly suffice for framing a Bill and passing it through both Houses. The introducers of the Representation must be well aware of that fact.

THE PROGRESSIVISTS.

It is stated in well-informed circles that the real motive of the agitation recently fomented in the ranks of the Progressivists is to get rid of the General Business Committee, who are not regarded as men of sufficient light and leading. Unwilling to give offence to these gentlemen, the agitators inscribed an independent legend on their banner, intending to manoeuvre for their genuine purpose when the inevitable hour of compromise came. Viscount Miura, of Korean celebrity, is believed to have stepped into the breach, and effected an arrangement by which the control of the Party affairs and the moulding of its policy will be undertaken by Count Okuma in person, having associated with him a Vice-President whom he will nominate or the Party will elect. We do not know how much truth there may be in that account of the situation, but it appears scarcely credible that the revolt can have been chiefly against the Committee on the ground of ineptitude, for the Committee includes some of the very cleverest men possessed by the Party.

THE WAR IN THE PHILIPPINES.

A few telegrams have reached Tokyo with regard to the progress of events in Manila. It is pretty evident that the Filipinos lost patience, and made a concerted attack upon the city, imagining that their immensely superior numbers and their exceptionally good equipment would ensure a victory. They altogether mistook the quality of the men they had to face. The source of the city's water supply, which the Filipinos are said to have destroyed, is about 8 miles from Manila. When the news of the outbreak of hostilities first reached us, we interpreted the forward move of the Americans as having for its object the securing of the water supply. Apparently, however, they were too late to prevent its partial destruction. Malolos, the seat of the Filipino Government, is some 25 miles from Manila. The two places are joined by railway, but the American forces, in the attack upon Malolos which they are said to have undertaken, were probably unable to use the line, or at any rate could not use more than the first section of it: the remote section would certainly be broken by the Filipinos. Of course the resolute measures adopted by General Otis in this emergency were virtually unavoidable. He could not sit quietly in Manila and suffer the Filipinos to mature fresh plans of assault or harassment at their leisure. But he will probably be content with the capture of Malolos and perhaps also of Iloilo. There is not the remotest chance, we imagine, that America will undertake a campaign having for its object the complete subjection of the Filipinos to her rule. They will get a lesson sufficiently drastic to render them amenable to reason, and they will then be granted a modified form of the autonomy they desire.

The Nippon publishes the following telegram, said to have been despatched from Hongkong at 6 p.m. on the 12th instant:—"The American troops unexpectedly attacked the Filipino quarter of Manila, slaughtered men and women, old people and children without discrimination. Their violence was so extreme that the Filipinos have resolved to fight to the death." Our contemporary says that this intelligence comes from a thoroughly trustworthy source, and proceeds to infer that the 1,800 Filipinos whom the Americans are reported to have slain, probably include the women, children, and old folks mentioned in the telegram. The ex-correspondent of the World has not yet reached Manila, otherwise we should be justified in dismissing the above as a "Creelman." But at all events it emanates from a Filipino source, and we are astonished at the credulity displayed by the Nippon. As for the Filipinos, they will merely injure themselves and alienate all sympathy by spreading such monstrous and clumsy falsehoods. No ordinary intelligent person can attach the slightest credence to stories of the kind now, will they tend to improve the terms ultimately granted by America.

A telegram received in Tokyo from official sources confirms a private message to the effect that Iloilo has been taken by the United States forces. No particulars are given, but it will be remembered that the Government in Washington was reported to have determined on the capture of Iloilo, and the presumption is that, immediately on receipt of a cablegram in that sense from the State Department, General Otis organized an expedition against the place. These operations were, of course, independent of the advance against Malolos. It is somewhat surprising that we have not yet heard anything of the fate of the latter place.

Private telegrams received in Yokohama state that the Filipinos, true to their threats, set fire to Iloilo and the British, American, and German Consulates were burnt down.

DESTRUCTIVE FIRE IN TOKYO.

A fire, which might have had serious consequences, took place in Tokyo on the afternoon of the 11th. Mr. Andrieff, Second Secretary of the Russian Legation, had invited a large number of young people to spend the afternoon. Private theatricals took place downstairs, and were to have been followed by dancing in the second storey. Just after the conclusion of the theatricals, and happily before the ladies and children had gone up-stairs, a kerosene lamp exploded, and the burning oil poured down upon the screens and hangings at one side of the stage. Of course a fierce flame leaped up instantly, and in an incredibly short space of time the staircase was so badly involved that escape from the upper storey would have been a matter of the greatest difficulty had the whole party, of about twenty little children and nearly as many ladies, been above stairs when the fire broke out. Indeed, it is not apparent that a terrible catastrophe could have been averted under such circumstances. But at the first alarm the little ones were quietly and speedily placed in carriages and fin-rikisha and sent to their homes. Scarcely anything could be saved. The fact is that Mr. Andrieff, though his furniture was not insured, seemed to take no thought whatever for his own losses but to be solicitous solely for the safety and comfort of his guests. The adjoining building is the residence of the Portuguese Minister and Madame de Freitas. At first it did not seem possible that their house could escape, and indeed at one moment a part of it was actually in flames. The firemen succeeded, however, in arresting the conflagration at that stage. Meanwhile, all the furniture and effects had been carried out by zealous hands, to the considerable detriment of chairs, carpets, and so forth. Happily the contents of the house were of comparatively small value. Still the loss from breakages and damage must be annoying, for there was no insurance. It is stated, also, that the Legation archives were more or less injured. The burned house belonged to Mr. Okura, and was doubtless insured.

CONSTITUTION DAY IN TOKYO.

The Emperor received the Foreign Representatives, the Ministers of State, and the Presidents of the two Houses of the Diet in the Home-den of the Palace on the 11th instant (Kigen-setsu) at 11.40 a.m. His Majesty addressed a few words to the guests, expressing the pleasure that their presence gave him, and Baron d'Anethan replied on behalf of the Foreign Corps Diplomatique, His Excellency Marquis Yamagata performing the same function on behalf of the Ministers of State. The Emperor withdrew at noon, and refreshments were then served. At 3 o'clock in the afternoon the nobles and high officials proceeded to the Palace and were entertained, His Majesty, however, not making his appearance. There was a function also in each House of the Diet, whither luncheon for the members was sent from the Palace, and lusty cheers, led by the Vice-Presidents, were given for the Emperor. In the evening Marquis Ito gave a large dinner at the Imperial Hotel to celebrate the tenth anniversary of the promulgation of the Constitution, and the Minister of State for Foreign Affairs and Viscountess Aoki marked the occasion in a similar manner in the official residence at the Foreign Office.

KOBE'S PROGRESS.

Kobe is getting on, materially and morally. Its tradal record promises to top the list of figures for Japan's open ports, and it may already be congratulated on possessing the "boss" journalistic quibbler of the Far East. What lends special brilliancy to the nimbus of prevarication which encircles the head of Kobe's quibbler is that he is perpetually accusing others of stealing his thunder. In his eyes no one is truthful, no one is straightforward, no one sticks to the point. He lays down some wonderful proposition and supports it by some even more wonderful statement, and when the statement is shown to be monstrous, he cries out that the ground has been shifted since the proposition, not the statement, was in question. Speaking on the authority of information supplied to us by Japanese Judges and officials, we asserted, some time ago, that failure to take advantage of the privilege of bail in Japan is often due to the ignorance of the accused. To that the Kobe Quibbler replied that "according to the Japanese Code of Criminal Procedure there is no necessity whatever for an application for bail from the prisoner or his advocate, it being the duty of the judge to grant bail of his own initiative, if satisfied that the accused is entitled to have this privilege extended to him." Exception was of course taken to that ridiculous assertion, whereupon the Kobe Quibbler calmly announced that "the Code of Criminal Procedure of course presumes that application for bail will, in the first place, come from the prisoner." That is tolerably good twisting, is it not? First we are told that "according to the Japanese Code there is no necessity whatever for an application for bail from the prisoner, it being the duty of the judge to grant bail of his own initiative," and then we are told that the same Code "presumes of course that application for bail will, in the first place, come from the prisoner." "Oh, what a tangled web we weave, when first we practice to deceive." The Kobe Quibbler seemed to have tied himself up pretty tightly in his criminal-procedure web before he had spun many threads of it, but his subsequent entanglement was even more pitiful. For the next twist he took was to support his original proposition about "there being no necessity whatever," by quoting an article of the Code which does not refer to bail at all but to releasing a prisoner under a process called sekiyu. The whole procedure with regard to bail (hoshaku) is laid down in one part of the Code, and then in another part is found this arrangement called "entrusting," where no monetary sureties are required and neither the accused person nor his friends forfeit anything if he fails to appear when subsequently summoned. That one special case, which can not properly be called "bail" and is carefully distinguished from "bail" by the framers of the Code, that one special case is quoted by the Kobe Quibbler as proving that "there is no necessity whatever for an application for bail from the prisoner or his advocate, it being the duty of the judge to grant bail of his own initiative." Again the ridiculous extravagance of such an argument is exposed, and now what happens? The poor Quibbler, writhing in his web, spins his last tenuous thread and cries out that there has been a volte face, inasmuch as "the argument was not as to the procedure in applications for bail, but as to where the responsibility lay for refusals or omissions to grant bail." In other words, the Kobe Quibbler begins by denying that the responsibility of failing to be released on bail can ever be with the prisoner, since the procedure as to bail is quite independent of the prisoner's initiative, and then, when the procedure is shown to be nothing of the kind, spins round and cries that there was no talk about the procedure but only about the responsibility. We think that Kobe is to be congratulated. Its Quibbler "takes the cake." We have not in Yokohama any article that can be warranted to squirm and twist so nimbly.

SPINNING INDUSTRY IN JAPAN.

From recently published statistics, we learn that the number of cotton-spinning mills in Japan last November was 77, and the number of spindles 919,074. The quantity of raw cotton worked up during the year totalled 3,302,321 kwamme, and the output of yarn was 2,834,198 kwamme. Full returns of the various companies' profits and losses during the second half of the year are not yet available, but a few figures are to hand. We set them down, and for the sake of a comparison we add the corresponding figures for the second half of 1897:—

Name of Company.	Dividend second half of 1897.	Dividend first half of 1898.	Dividend second half of 1898.
Otsuka	15	7	4
Settsu	20	20	20
Hirano	40	30	20
Senshu	15	7	0
Fukushima	0	Loss	0
Kishiwada	20	20	15
Sakai	18	5	5
Meiji	8	0	0
Nippon	3	8	8
Kanegafuchi	12	10	0
Tokyo	16	10	5
Owari	16	10	8
Tsushima	14	8.5	0
Miye	20	0	12
Kiwana	0	0	4
Fukuyama	20	8	8
Matsuyama	15	10	7
Shimotsuke	10	7	10
Averages.....	15.4	8.5	6.6

This is a very poor record; only three out of the 18 companies show an improvement as compared with the first half of the year 1898, and only two have maintained or bettered the dividends paid by them in the second half of 1897. Moreover, eight out of the eighteen, or 44 per cent., paid no dividend at all. It must be rather a miserable reflection for the shareholders that, if they had their money in Government bonds, it would be giving them a return of 5.37 per cent. at present market rates, and that if they had it deposited in the banks it would be producing 7 per cent., whereas in the case of 8 mills it gives no return at all, and in 4 produces only 5 per cent. or less. It is interesting to note that the adoption of gold monometallism is frankly blamed for these bad results. The Fiji says that the step was taken without due reflection and that the eyes of the nation are now becoming opened. China, which is the chief customer for Japan's yarns, has become a constantly falling market, from the point of view of a gold-using nation, and it is for that reason that the mill-owners are so anxious to see a China-Japan bank established, working on a silver basis. We must confess that such an analysis of the situation seems very partial. Assuredly exporters of goods from a gold-monometallic country have considerable difficulties to contend against when their markets are among silver-using peoples, so long as the appreciation of gold continues. There never was the least uncertainty on that head among foreign observers of Japan's currency arrangements. In these columns, for example, the fact was strongly emphasized when the gold-standard question came upon the tapis in 1897. Since Japan became gold monometallic, however, there have been no fluctuations of exchange at all comparable in severity to those of past years, yet British manufacturers managed to find their account in supplying silver-using nations throughout the whole period of the sharpest appreciation of gold. How can it be pretended that the same obstacle in a greatly reduced form is responsible for the recent failure of Japanese mills, especially when Japan's home market is of far more importance to her cotton-spinners than the Chinese market, the latter taking what may be called her surplus produce only? The cause is to be sought in some conditions independent of exchange. Defective organization, unskillful methods in laying in raw material, increased cost of labour, and want of cheap working capital—these are the reasons assigned by foreign critics who should be competent to give an intelligent opinion.

THE HOUSE TAX WITHDRAWN.

In announcing the withdrawal of the Bill for imposing a tax on houses, Count Matsukata informed the Special Committee that other means of obtaining revenue had been found. The deficiency resulting from the House's reduction of the proposed rate of Land Tax was 7,400,000 yen, in round numbers. On the other hand, the House cut down the Budgetary expenditures by 1,600,000 yen, so that the sum to be provided became 5,800,000 yen only. The Government's original idea was to obtain that amount by a tax on houses, and by increasing the tax on soy as well as the postal rates. The House Tax would have yielded 2,600,000 yen. But when the Representatives came to consider the proposed amendments of the Tobacco Monopoly, they made certain changes in the sense of a more rigid system and of levying a license tax from dealers in manufactured tobacco. These changes give an additional revenue of 2 million yen, and, by postponing the abolition of export duties until July, a further sum of 600,000 yen will be obtained, so that the House Tax ceases to be required.

EDUCATIONAL EFFORT BY JAPAN ESE IN SOUL.

Some two years have passed, we believe, since a prominent Christian of Sendai, Mr. Oshikawa Masayoshi, who appears to be a second Nishima, began to interest himself actively in the question of education for the Koreans. He and several others formed a society for the purpose of establishing educational institutions in foreign lands. They started one school in Seoul, which is now in a tolerably flourishing condition, and they now think of extending the work to other parts of the peninsula, with which object a meeting was held in the Imperial Hotel, Tokyo, on the 13th instant, under the auspices of Marquis Ito, Count Okuma, Mr. Shibusawa, and Mr. Oshikawa. Among those present were Count Itagaki, Mr. Kioura, Minister of Justice, Viscount Aoki, Baron Mitsui, Mr. Asano, and others, to the number of some sixty-four. Marquis Ito delivered an address, in which, warmly applauding the work, he remarked that Korean students of the Japanese language were not entirely free from the reproach of having disturbed the peace of their country, and that it would be well to include in their course of study some means of educating a more law-abiding spirit. Count Okuma also spoke, confining himself to the commercial aspect of the question, and showing that the study of Japanese by the Koreans tends to promote trade between the two empires. This meeting has a special interest as showing that while men like Counts Okuma and Itagaki stand strongly opposed to each other in the political field, they can join hands to promote a humanitarian object.

A NEW BOOK ON JAPAN.

We are promised a new book on Japan. It is to be called "Japan in Transition." The writer is Mr. J. Stafford Ransome, who has been a great traveller during the past twenty years. Mr. Ransome recently spent a considerable time in Japan, having been sent here by The Engineer and the Morning Post to study the political, social, and industrial progress of the country. He will therefore write from the specialist's point of view. The subjects dealt with in his work are to be "Popular Misconceptions of Japan; The Standing of the Foreigner; the Effect of the War; Present Day Education; Relations with Foreign Powers; Strategic Geography of Japan; Modern Industrial Japan; The Commercial Integrity of the Japanese; Japan as a Colonising Power; The Position and Prospects of Christianity; Politics in the Past and Present; A Forecast of the Working of the New Treaties; Japan as an Ally, etc., etc."

He tells us in a prospectus that "in drawing his comparisons between the Japanese of to-day and the people of other nations, the author has endeavoured to contrast them, not with an impossible ideal containing all that is theoretically good, noble, and high-minded in the western character, which has been the line too often adopted by the anti-Japanese writers on the subject; but with the average man with whom one meets in real life in other countries. Nor has he assumed that, in all cases where the Japanese differ in their methods from western people, such difference must of necessity be a defect in their character."

"WOODCOCK'S LITTLE GAME."

The Tokyo Dramatic and Musical Society gave its second performance for this season on the 14th instant in the Hall of Shoreikai, the proceeds being, as usual, devoted to charity. The piece chosen was Maddison Morton's amusing farce "Woodcock's Little Game," a play capitally suited to amateurs, as it abounds in amusing situations, and is full of action throughout. Most of our readers are probably familiar with the plot of "Woodcock's Little Game," for the comedy made its theatrical début 35 years ago. There are two "Woodcock" brothers, one a mild, innocent youth; the other a tired roué. There is also a "Mrs. Colonel Carver," a widow. This lady's husband, whom she married hoping to lead a gay life, had sown such a large crop of wild oats before he led her to the altar, that he devoted himself thenceforth to reaping weary reminiscences, and died after 20 years, leaving a widow who still longed to plunge into the social vortex from which his ennui had held her back. The widow "Carver" plans to enjoy, through the medium of a son-in-law, the gaieties that were denied to her as a wife. She therefore seeks for her child a husband innocent of fast life and ready to give himself up to it. But she hits upon the wrong "Woodcock," the worn-out rake instead of the gentle innocent. That is the whole scheme of the farce. "Woodcock" marries to vegetate quietly in the country; his mother-in-law is resolved that he shall "do" London in the most thorough manner. "Mrs. Colonel Carver" and "Mr. Woodcock" are the principal characters. They are en evidence from first to last, with little intermission. Miss Hayes made her début in the former role and played it excellently. Maddison Morton's conception of "Mrs. Colonel Carver" was probably different from the interpretation given to the character by Miss Hayes. Doubtless to him "Mrs. Carver" presented herself as a dame of primary colours, flaring easily into wrath and asserting her tastes with some stridency of determination. But the "Mrs. Carver" of the Shoreikai was limned with subdued tints which scarcely made a picture of womanhood calculated to terrorize a roué of twenty years' hardening. This rendering had the merit, however, of being natural and pretty, as well as of forming a good background for "Woodcock's" strong outlines. Mr. Pattison, as the retired rake, must be unequivocally applauded. He passed far beyond any standard suggested by his previous acting, and showed a versatility of mood and a play of feature such as are not often seen on an amateur stage. Miss Nishigawa's "Mrs. Larkings" was a gem at the outset, but lost something of its quality in the second act. Maddison Morton neglected all the congruities when he assigned such a part to a bride of twenty-two. No woman who has not herself seen life at pretty close range, could make comedy and capital out of the union of a grizzled roué with an innocent young girl still in her teens, and could then play the heart-broken ingenue over her own husband's escapades. It is not comfortable to be asked to do violence to one's imagination so far as to conceive an impossibility of that kind, nor could the character be acted with entire success.

Miss Nishigawa made the most of it, and certainly showed that she has even greater capacity than her first performance suggested. The other roles are essentially subordinate. We know something already of Miss Aoki's ability, but as "Mrs. Woodcock" she had nothing to do except to look charming and behave sweetly, achievements which came very easily to her. Mr. Gardiner, as "Mr. Adolphus Swansdown," needed to display only two moods, sleepiness and fury, and was good in both. If we dismiss Mr. Polianovsky's "Mr. Christopher Larkings" with an equally curt notice, the play-wright is responsible, not the acting. Concerning Mr. Van der Polder as "David," we have already had occasion to express the opinion that a servant's role does not suit him. He can not act down to it. There is an error of values in the picture, and an object which ought to remain in the background is forced into the front plane. A Tokyo audience always wants to see Mr. Van der Polder on the stage, but not as a "David" or a "Thomas." Miss Hall very kindly took a "walking on" part as Susan, and Miss D. Shaw and Miss H. Gardiner made delightful little bridesmaids. A marked feature of the performance was the staging, for which—as well as for the greater part of the arrangements in general—Baroness Sannomiya has to be thanked. The second scene—an entrance hall decorated for a dance,—was a very beautiful monochromatic study which must have cost great thought and trouble. The thankless and difficult, but, on this occasion, thoroughly well performed duty of stage management fell to Mr. Pattison, and much assistance in many ways was rendered by Mrs. Bonsted. Madame la Viscomtesse de Bondy had promised to sing, but unfortunately indisposition prevented her, and the only vocal music was a song by Monsieur Andrée, the accompaniment played by Miss Von Fallot. This was vociferously encored. The Imperial Band played between the acts, and Viscount and Viscountess Tanaka entertained the actors and actresses at supper after the performance.

THE IMPORT TARIFF.

The changes made in the Statutory Tariff at the instance of the Government have now been published in the Official Gazette, the Bill embodying them having passed the Diet. The date for making them operative will be fixed by Imperial Ordinance. These changes are:—

No.	Old Rate.	New Rate.
65—Alcohol.....	0.096 yen per catty	100 do
370—Cigars.....	0.772 do	100 do
380—Cigarettes.....	2.153 yen per 1,000	100 do
381—Opium.....	40 per cent. ad valorem	100 do
382—Cut Tobacco.....	0.444 yen per catty	100 do
384—Other prepared tobacco.....	40 per cent. ad valorem	100 do
385—Chinese Alcoholic liquor, distilled.....	40 do	100 do
—Chinese Alcoholic liquor, brewed.....	40 do	80 do
389—Sake, resembling the home brewage.....	40 do	80 do
398—Spirits or distilled liquors of all other kinds.....	40 do	100 do
395—Sheet Zinc (except No. 2).....	1.903 yen per 100 catt. etc.	10 do

No. 129, 135, 136, 345 (1), 348 (1), 358 (2), 358 (3), 358 (4), 365 (No. 2 plates)—all these duties are recinded.

According to the Treaties, Japan has to give six months notice before making any of the above changes operative. The effect of that provision will be to flood the country with a two or three years' supply of alcohol, cigars, cigarettes, and tobacco, to say nothing of Chinese samshu, before a sen of the new rates can be levied.

The Japanese negotiators of the Revised Treaties could not be expected to be omniscient, but they might at least have inserted a saving clause to the effect that where the protection of revenue was in question, the six months' notice could be dispensed with.

A NEW LONDON JOURNAL.

A new journal is about to appear. It is to be called The London Letter; the editor is Mr. Algeron Locker, formerly editor of the Globe and the Morning Post, and the Assistant Editor will be Mr. J. Stafford Ransome, whose acquaintance many of our readers made when he visited Japan a year ago as a Special Correspondent for the Far East. The London Letter will be a weekly, costing sixpence. Its conception seems excellent. It is to summarize all events that concern the British empire, without imparting to the account the slightest tinge of party politics, bias, or fad of any kind, and to make the summary not only sufficiently short to command readers among the busiest men, but also sufficiently exhaustive to afford full information on every important topic, and thus correct the habit of limited reading into which people are now-a-days apt to drift owing to the impossibility of wading through the masses of detail furnished by the great dailies and periodicals. We do not see any reason why The London Letter should not prove a marked success. The idea of its projectors is certainly excellent.

MARQUIS ITO ON THE PROGRESS OF CONSTITUTIONAL GOVERNMENT IN JAPAN.

Marquis Ito, as we have already reported, entertained a distinguished company at dinner in the Imperial Hotel on the 11th instant, to celebrate the tenth anniversary of the promulgation of the constitution. We take from the Japan Times the following résumé of the speech made by the Marquis:—

After expressing his extreme gratification at having the honor of the presence of Prince Arima and of celebrating the occasion conjointly with all the distinguished personages who had the closest connexion with the advent of the Constitution, His Excellency proceeded to state that it was Marquis Yamagata who undertook the office of the Premiership after the promulgation of the Constitution, and when the first session of the Imperial Diet was summoned. Some animated discussions arose between the Legislature and the Executive, but ultimately amicable compromises were effected. By a strange coincidence the Marquis again occupied the same exalted position at this tenth anniversary, and to carry the parallel a little further, the two departments of the State were again involved in a similar animated discussion but once more they succeeded in arriving at an amicable conclusion.

The period intervening between the beginning of the Restoration and the 10th year of the era was one of completing of the grand work of the Restoration, and may fitly be regarded as a decade of political rearrangement. Everything was enveloped in darkness and uncertainty, and the nation was solely occupied in discovering materials available for remodelling its domestic and foreign affairs. It was in pursuance of this great aim that to the 4th year (1877) the late Prince Iwakura, Kido, Okuma, with the host of the evening and others, were despatched abroad charged with the mission of investigating the institutions and state affairs in the constitutional countries in the Occident, with the ultimate purpose of adopting in Japan the national policy of progress and enlightenment. On the occasion of dispatching that memorable embassy the Emperor had especially issued an Imperial Rescript intimating that the step had been prompted by the farsighted policy, the host said, of His Majesty of ultimately introducing a constitutional regime in the Imperial realm, and specifying about twenty-six points to be inquired into with especial attention. The trip concluded and the Embassy returned home, and the late respected Kido confidentially stated his opinion to the host as to the necessity of adopting a constitutional form of Government in Japan, and this opinion which was shared by the equally respected and lamented Okuma. The letters from the two distinguished statesmen bearing on the subject were carefully preserved by the host, and they supply indelible evidence how all the statesmen playing conspicuous part in the affairs of the State were earnest advocates for the advent of a constitutional regime in Japan.

The next twelve years, extending from the 10th (1877) and the 22nd year (1889), may be regarded as a period of preliminary arrangement for the ushering in of a constitutional government. For instance, the institutions of the Occidental countries having received thorough investigation from the late Prince Iwakura and others since the Embassy's return in 1873, further inquiries into the same field were deemed advisable, and in 1881 others were again dispatched abroad on a similar mission.

After this the Committee returned home in 1883 the work of enacting an Imperial Constitution advanced apace and a draft was placed before the Privy Council for deliberation. What ought to be gratefully remembered by the nation in this context was that, while the Privy Council was deliberating over the draft the Emperor personally attended it without absenting himself a single day during more than six months.

The decade that has elapsed since 1889 may be considered as an experimental period of the operation of the Constitution and it admitted of no doubt that data for testing the practical efficiency of the Constitution were sufficiently forthcoming. Indeed, on the whole, the results were so far satisfactory. The mere fact that the administrative expenses that formerly stood at between 70 and 80 million yen have subsequently expanded with the consent of the people to above 200 million yen, must primarily be attributed to a result of working of the Constitution. The future may be regarded as the time for completing the development of the Constitutional Government and as one when the fruits of this system should be more fully reaped. To attain this desirable consummation the Legislative and Executive Departments should be pushed to greater improvement, as also the Diet and political parties. The Legislature can be worked by the system of majorities, but this method cannot be followed by the Executive. The improvement and better working of the latter must be attained through the agency of able men of integrity. At the same time the Diet must be warned against neglecting to take in consideration the great aim and mission of the country and against blindly striving for the retrenchment of administrative expenses. An expansion of national resources is invariably followed by an expansion of expenses. Again, the House of the Diet ought to be reminded of the importance of appointing men of ability and experience on Committees, irrespective of party consideration. Nor was the improvement less needed in the party system. The speaker doubted the existence of a political party competent to undertake the task of forming a cabinet. Under such circumstances, it would not be advisable for political parties merely to aim at securing administrative power.

SALT MONOPOLY IN FORMOSA.

It appears to be certain that the Government will inaugurate a salt monopoly in Formosa. A Bureau of Salt Business (Yemmu Kyoku) will be organized, with twenty offices throughout the island. The Fiji Shimpō gives this news, which may therefore be relied on.

Actions for libel are really undertaken on the most trivial of grounds. At Edinburgh, two individuals, who had been charged with house breaking, but had been acquitted, sued a Glasgow paper for libel on the ground that in its report of the trial the language of the paragraph proceeded on the assumption of the guilt of the prisoners, and gave the impression that they were guilty of the charge of which they were acquitted. The jury at once found for the defendants.

ENGLAND AND JAPAN.

MANY views are entertained in Japan about the much-talked-of Anglo-Japanese alliance. Among them not the least interesting and carefully reasoned out are those of Mr. TAKENOKOSHI YOSABURO, expressed in the Sekai-no-Nippon for this month. The Sekai-no-Nippon, we may observe en passant, has just made its re-appearance. It suffered, as our readers doubtless remember, a temporary eclipse in connexion with the celebrated OZAKI affair. Assuming that Mr. OZAKI's resignation of the Educational portfolio had been directly due to Palace interference, the Tokyo periodical published a powerful and singularly outspoken essay about Court intrigues and Imperial meddling in politics. We have nothing to do now with the wisdom or unwisdom, justice or injustice, of Mr. TAKENOKOSHI'S utterances on that occasion. That they involved him in trouble with the Authorities, that he suspended the publication of his magazine, and that it has now again made its appearance, are the only points we have to notice, and very glad we are to see the Sekai-no-Nippon again, for we look upon its talented editor as one of the most brilliant publicists and cleverest essayists in Japan. The subject which it treats in the fore-front of its re-born pages is the Anglo-Saxon alliance. Broadly speaking, Mr. TAKENOKOSHI welcomes the idea of such an alliance. He is not Oriental but cosmopolitan. The frequently advocated union of the yellow races does not appeal to him at all, and, if alliances become the order of the day, he wishes for nothing better than an Anglo-Japanese alliance. But he thinks that the time is not ripe. Lord CHARLES BRESFORD came here and "bedewed the heads of the Japanese with a rain of praise," carrying his hobby of a quadruple alliance almost into the sphere of practical politics, and, at any rate, so focussing public attention on it that many people began to regard it as the problem of the hour. The members of the Kyoto Chamber of Commerce were foolish enough to memorialize the Government on the subject, just as if there was question of a new project of law. It will be understood, of course, that we are epitomizing Mr. TAKENOKOSHI'S utterances, not expressing our own views. We do not agree with him at all about the "foolishness" of the Kyoto Chamber. On the contrary we think that if the merchants of Japan took a leaf out of the book of the merchants of England, and busied themselves more actively in politics, it would be a very good thing for their country. However, the editor of the Sekai-no-Nippon appears to be of a different mind, though we are not clear whether his objection is to commercial interference generally, or whether he is influenced merely by the special conclusion that the present period should be one of conferences not alliances. He believes that the order in which England views her over-sea interests is, first Africa, second India, third China, and fourth, Japan and Korea. The "open door" is a very pretty programme, but the goal of England's policy in China is the Yangtze Valley, and when it comes to her seating herself in that fine district, she will be found to be in collusion, not collision, with Russia. In short, Mr. TAKENOKOSHI doesn't believe that England and Russia will fight about China. They will agree to divide it according to their taste, and where will Japan find her account in such an arrangement? As for the notion of including Germany in the union, Mr. TAKENOKOSHI derides it. He says some bitter things about Germany; repeats, in effect, the accusation preferred against her by an Austrian publicist, that she is altogether untrustworthy, being equally ready to raise her hand against the friend of yesterday or to extend it to the enemy of to-day. In this criticism no note is taken of the extraordinarily difficult position that Germany occupies in the middle of Europe, or of the fact that she has shown herself a staunch and valiant ally when her interests—the sole motive power with all nations—are concerned. The editor of the Sekai-no-Nippon is satisfied that she has no business to a place in the arena of Far-Eastern politics, and that she ought to be left out of the account, an additional reason being furnished by her extraordinary action in seizing Kiaochow, which action is primarily responsible for all the present trouble, as it was the proximate cause of Russia's appropriation of Liaotung. Turning then to England, the question arises, is she a desirable ally at present; in other words, would an alliance with her make for Japan's interests? England's attitude in the East is influenced by African considerations. It is largely because she finds France and Russia in her way in Africa that she shows in the Far East activity calculated to divert their attention. She evinces no disposition whatever to espouse Japan's cause in the beginning of the latter's war with China, but she now sees in Japan a Power whose co-operation may be of use to her directly in China and indirectly in Africa and India. It is certain that if Japan definitely entered the British camp, Russia would not face the alliance, but would make terms with England, and the terms would be most unlikely to include anything for Japan. Thus Mr. TAKENOKOSHI concludes that Japan's wisest plan is to stand aloof from alliances, and to establish an entente with England on the subject of China, and with Russia on the subject of Korea. Concerning America no mention is made in the essay.

We shall not pause to discuss here this policy of dalliance, but we desire to say a word about a theory which seems to have found support in some quarters and was recently enunciated in so many words by a Japanese-English contemporary, the theory that England could not hold her own in China without an ally. Have any of the propounders of that theory attempted to clothe it in the language of facts? It used to be an article of universal faith that for the purposes of a campaign in a distant land Great Britain was incomparably the best equipped country in the world. In what respect have things changed since men held that belief? The question is not one of fighting against China but of fighting against some European Power in China. In a contest of that nature the prime basis of supply would be in Europe, and the line of communications would be maritime. Such a line could not be maintained for an instant in the presence of the English fleet. In fact, it might be cut forthwith at Suez. What European State could send troops to China and support them there with Great Britain for an enemy? Russia, will perhaps be the reply. But Russia's potentialities in that respect are still quite immature. She certainly could not make Liaotung a basis of operations, because, until it is connected by rail with Europe, she would have to carry supplies and reinforcements thither by sea, an impossible task with England at Wei-hai-wei. In the course of seven or eight years, if Russia has finished her trans-Asian road; established large depots along the route; massed a strong force in Southern Manchuria and organized a powerful Tartar army, she might strike a mighty blow at Chih-li and Peking without depending on over-sea communications. But that time is not yet, and no one knows it better than Russia. Of the value of Japan's fine army for preserving the integrity of the Chinese Empire or beating back any invader of the neighbouring Continent, there can be no doubt. But any Japanese publicist is vastly mistaken who imagines that an alliance with his country is necessary to England for the purpose of holding her own in the Far East to-day. England was never stronger than she is now, and it will be many a year before she goes, cap in hand, to court a foreign alliance.

THE SNOW STORM.

The fall in Yokohama on Thursday was one of the heaviest for many years. The biting wind made matters most uncomfortable, and the cowardly male who tried to evade the elements in a jinrikisha was in worse case, if anything, than those who adopted the heroic method of crunching boldly through the snow. No reports of serious damage directly due to the snow are to hand, but a landslide occurred about noon at the Hachiman Yato cliff, Nakamura, killing one man and resulting in injuries to five others.

The snowfall in Tokyo was very heavy, the storm raging the whole day, while a full gale blew. Nearly a foot of snow fell altogether, and the telegraph wires between Tokyo and the west were blocked.

Owing to the gale and snow since Wednesday telegraph lines in the Western Provinces sustained some damage and communication has been suspended.

MONTHLY SUMMARY OF THE RELIGIOUS PRESS.

As already stated in these columns, Dr. Katō Hiroyuki, who represents Occidental advanced scientific and philosophic thought, and Dr. Inoue Yenyō, who is a conscientious defender of Oriental religion and philosophy and an earnest Buddhist propagandist, have been crossing swords on the subject of materialism in Japan. Some time ago Dr. Inoue published a little pamphlet entitled Hai-butsumon, "The Refutation of Materialism," in which Dr. Katō and Mr. Fukuzawa were specially named as having been responsible for the spread of materialism and, in Dr. Inoue's view, the many evils consequent thereon. In No. 13 of the Tetsugaku Zasshi is published Dr. Katō's reply to his opponent. The controversy will prove interesting to the readers of this summary in so far as it tends only as showing the trend of current thought in Japan on religion and its many opposing influences. It is not as the utterances of individual thinkers that the two essays are to be regarded, but as representative of two antagonistic schools of thought. As such we think a few of the chief arguments of the two champions worth stating in an epitomised form. Dr. Katō quotes Dr. Inoue's ipsissima verba on the various points at issue and then replies to them. In this form we reproduce a short part of the discussion as a specimen of the whole.

DR. INOUE.—The malodorous wind of materialistic thought has blown across the ocean and has entered the nostrils of our leading men even, and as a consequence the influence of Shintō, Confucianism, and Buddhism has steadily declined and the destiny of a State second to none on the face of the earth has become clouded with uncertainty.

DR. KATŌ.—This statement is most illogical. The systems referred to are either systems of philosophy or they are religions. They surely stand on their own merits, and, if founded on truth, cannot possibly be affected by materialism. If Buddhism and Confucianism are erroneous and defective, it makes little matter who points this out. If it should happen that a materialistic philosopher does so, it is illogical to say that such a philosopher is the cause of the decline of faith in these systems. Dr. Inoue seems to think that because Buddhism, Shintō, and Confucianism are Oriental they should be defended against all attacks. This surely is most unscientific.

DR. INOUE.—Though I say, for the sake of brevity, that materialism is the chief enemy of Buddhism, Confucianism, and Shintō, I include in this term a number of elements; such as evolution, experimentation, the theory of consciousness, egoism, and the like, and also money-worship, carnal lusts, and superstition, which are all in the employ of materialism. All these influences have come from the West and are used by the pro-foreign section of the nation to the injury of our minds. Materialism may be called the General of these hostile forces and the other things named his soldiers.

DR. KATŌ.—What more unscientific can be imagined than this statement? What connection have money worship and carnal lusts with materialistic philosophy? Mr. Fukuzawa and myself are denounced as leaders in the materialistic movement. It is said that Mr.

Fukuzawa champions money-worship, a charge that is incapable of proof, and that he and I work together to undermine the influence of Oriental religion and philosophy. In reality there is no connection whatever between us.

DR. INOUE.—If there is one belief that more than any other gives peace of mind and removes the fear of death it is that of the immortality of the soul. Thanks to our three Oriental creeds, this belief has been implanted in the Japanese mind. But Occidental materialism destroys this belief and teaches that the mind is the slave of the body, and that they are both destroyed together. As a consequence of this, even when the State is in danger, all that men think of is their own personal safety.

DR. KATŌ.—This argument is most un-scholarly. The immortality of the soul believed in by Dr. Inoue rests on a priori grounds. There is no attempt to prove it scientifically. It is founded on imagination and dissatisfaction with the present life, and to say that it is a belief capable of being destroyed by materialism is to acknowledge the weakness of its foundation. Dr. Inoue's use of the doctrine of the immortality of the soul ranks with the references to hell's cauldron or the cutting out of the tongues of liars by the devil, with which many priests terrify their followers. No attempt is made to prove the doctrine of the immortality of the soul, but, whether true or false, it must, according to Dr. Inoue, be retained, for the sake of its effect on the minds of men.

A small, but useful little work entitled Risō no Seinen, "The Adolescence of Thought," has been published by L'Abbé Francois Ligneul. The Fukui Shimpō reviews the book favourably, and says that M. Ligneul does not write like an ordinary foreigner, but reveals minute knowledge of the Japanese character. The Risō no Seinen condemns the flippancy and general want of balance displayed by so many young writers and speakers in Japan, and applauds modesty and deference to the opinions of others as graces which need to be more cultivated in this country.

Mr. Hirai Kinzō is the author of a book called Shūkyō to Seiji, "Religion and Government," which is published by the Kendō Shoin, Abura Kōji, Kyōto, and sells at 22 sen per copy. Mr. Hirai was present at the Chicago Religious Fair and took a prominent part in some of the discussions held there. The tone of the Shūkyō to Seiji is very earnest, and the whole question of the extent to which it is desirable that priests and Ministers should endeavour to influence the Government is discussed. Mr. Hirai in some parts of the work advocates more interference with politics than would be approved of in the West. He condemns the Buddhist priests for their laxity in the public discussion of political questions, and thinks they should be better informed on such topics than ordinary citizens. This view the Fukui Shimpō traverses, contending that less, and not more, meddling with politics is the desideratum in Buddhist circles.

We read in the Fukui Shimpō that Mr. Fukuchi Genichirō has published for private circulation an essay entitled 孔夫子 Kōfūshi (Concerning Confucius), in which the author gives the impressions which he has received from a study of the sayings of the great Chinese sage and the characteristics of the age in which he lived. Mr. Fukuchi comes to the conclusion that Confucius' intellect developed very slowly. He was 60 years of age before he reached the superior state of intelligence called 大悟, daigo. Mr. Fukuchi compares the teaching of Confucius with that of other Oriental and Occidental philosophers, ancient and report to suit foreign taste must involve an enormous amount of compromise and trimming on the part of Japanese who wish to be faithful to their own country and institutions. The Japanese Christian supported by foreign money is in a false position. But the compromising has been going on for a series of years until at last things have come to a head in the Dōshisha affair. For a very long time what that institution aimed at doing was to please the foreign supporters and to please Japanese supporters at the same time. A system of double reporting was adopted, and thus for a while both parties remained satisfied. But naturally this state of things could not last for ever. The incongruous elements were bound to reveal themselves, and a split was inevitable. This has come about. President Yokoi agreed to remove the name of "Christian" from the institution and make it wholly national. The foreigners then threatened legal steps to maintain their rights, and in the face of this Mr. Yokoi and his fellow-trustees have all resigned in a body and have left Mr. Kozaki and his fellow-thinkers to patch up the affair as best they can. The help of the Board will again be asked, and, as a result of the restoration of the rules to which the Mombushō objected, the Department may refuse to allow Dōshisha students to be exempt from conscription. One result of the episode, says the Nippon, has been to teach foreigners that Japanese are not to be trusted to use mission money and to superintend without interference evangelistic work.

We think it important to give a short epitome of opinions expressed in two other organs on the rupture between the native and foreign supporters of the Dōshisha. The Kirisuto kyō Shimbun rejoices over the resignation of the trustees in a body, and thinks that their action has rendered a final satisfactory settlement possible. Mr. Matsumura Kaiseki published an article in the Rikugō Zasshi in December, which was translated by the Japan Times; and called forth a long letter from Mr. Davis, in which he maintained that no one now contends that the Dōshisha is a proselytising institution. This chapter of the history of the controversy is referred to at some length by the Kirisuto-kyō Shimbun. The Taiyō argues that the disturbance was caused by the American Board treating the Japanese too much after the fashion of semi-civilized nations. The missionaries insist on establishing their Western customs and forms here, says the Taiyō. They are slaves to the letter of the Bible and allow Japanese converts little liberty of thought. The early teaching in the Dōshisha was of this type, and sooner or later it was bound to come into conflict with Japanese sentiment. The Taiyō has a great deal more in the same strain, which it is not necessary to quote, as the same thing has often been said before. The Taiyō concludes by observing that the whole Dōshisha dispute is only one phase of a great question, namely the right of foreign missionaries to dictate to Japanese in matters of belief. The conflict between orthodoxy and heterodoxy is going on all over Japan, and upon the issue of the dispute will depend the form which Japanese Christianity will take in the future.

The latest number of the Rikugō Zasshi to hand discusses "The Essence of Unitarianism;" "The real source of the Dōshisha problem;" "A Curious Social phenomenon in Tōkyō," "Tolstoi's Views on Art;" "Prophecies Concerning the Second Coming of Christ;" and several other subjects.

We read in the Shinri that the German Evangelical Protestant Missionary Society, which in a former summary we inadvertently referred to as a Lutheran Society, though Mr. Peery contends it has no right to be so named, has strengthened its Japan Mission by the despatch of two new missionaries, one lady and one gentleman, both of whom are said to be very highly educated. They reached Japan, it seems, in November last.

* * *
The Shinseiki, under the title of Kirisuto Kyōka Daimondai, discusses the attitude of certain Kumiai and Nihon Kirisuto-Kyōkai Churches to foreign Missionaries. It seems that the movement to which we referred in a former summary in favour of native evangelists working quite separately from foreign missionaries has gained strength, and that there are numerous cases in which there is actual estrangement between fellow-Christians of different nationalities. This, the Shinseiki points out, is a most unbecoming state of things. This organ recommends native pastors, while maintaining their independence, to keep in touch with the foreign missionaries, to meet them as often as possible, and to consult them about evangelistic work. The isolation of the native churches, which is advocated in some quarters, is narrow-minded bigotry of the worst kind, says the Shinseiki. Nothing could be more unfortunate than a division of Christians based on race prejudices. Divisions among Christians there always have been, and they will still continue. But to split up on small issues would be culpable folly. Let the pro-gospel and the anti-gospel parties confront each other and contend for power, but as for perpetuating any of those doctrinal differences even which have separated and kept separate from each other the various sects of Western Christendom, nothing could be more undesirable. The state of Christianity in Japan to-day is sad enough without placing more obstacles in the way of progress. Divinity schools are very poorly attended (ima isure no Shingakko mo sukoburu sabi-shi), and it is a serious question as to where the requisite number of pastors and evangelists are to be found. In order to increase the number of Divinity students it is necessary that evangelists and pastors should receive better treatment than they now enjoy. They ought to find adequate support and be respected and honoured as they are in other countries, modern. According to the Fukun Shimpō, Mr. Fukuchi's monologue is quite an exceptional production, displaying rare insight into the real character and peculiarities of the philosopher and tracing with great minuteness the changes which his mind underwent at different parts of his life. His political morality is shown to be of a very high order, and the Fukun Shimpō thinks that modern Japanese politicians would derive much benefit from a study of Mr. Fukuchi's treatise.

The following note taken from the Koye, the Roman Catholic organ, will be of considerable interest to many readers. The note is headed "The Conversion of Three Noted Men." "Joy shall be in Heaven over one sinner that repenteth more than over ninety and nine just persons which need no repentance." We have an illustration of this in the recent conversion of three well known men—Mr. R. W. Irwin, Ex-Hawaiian Minister and Consul-General, Professor B. H. Chamberlain, and Professor Nagai Nagayoshi (of the Imperial University). Mr. Irwin was publicly received into the Church in Tsukiji Cathedral on December 4th last. Professors Chamberlain and Nagai formally confessed their new faith on Christmas Day.

The Koye has an article on "Christianity and the Japanese State," the gist of which is that Protestant Christianity may come into conflict with the State, because it is not true Christianity. Under the name of Christianity Protestants preach total abstinence and forbid tobacco, says the Koye. This is craft and deceit. The real doctrines of Christianity are put away on a shelf. It is because they seek to introduce into Japan European and American customs that they stir up opposition in the Japanese mind and give the impression that Christianity is hostile to State interests. The Protestants are lacking in reverence for men and for things. They encourage disrespect to monarchs. They represent the holy rule of the Pope to be despotism. They distort the order of society and prepare the way for the spread of socialism and other evils. In true Christianity (that is Roman Catholic Christianity) there is none of this. It encourages Japanese patriotism and loyalty, and so on.

Under the heading of "Japan as Seen by Foreign Eyes," the Yomiuri Shimbun, at the commencement of the year, published some interesting facts. We extract a few that bear on religion. Dr. Revon, Professor of Law at the Imperial University, writing on religion in Japan, says that in the ancient civilisation of Japan the lack of the influence of religion was certainly a defect. Shintō was not religion, and the success of Buddhism in Japan was very limited. Although the Buddhists are fond of explaining what charity is, how much real charity was there in ancient Japan? asks Dr. Revon. From whatever point of view regarded, the influence of religion in Japan is in no way worthy of comparison with the influence of Christianity in the West. There was no department of life but felt the influence of Christianity in the middle ages. Christianity had its charitable institutions by the hundred. It raised the rank of women. The godliness that it taught was the centre of all domestic morality. At no time in the history of Buddhism can it be said that it exercised such a powerful control over the hearts of men as did Christianity in Europe. But nevertheless, proceeds Dr. Revon, I am not in favour of forcing Christianity on Japan. Christianity consists of two elements: one doctrinal and dogmatic, the other moral. Even in the West it is not the dogma that exercises much influence, but the moral part of Christianity. Belief is not a thing that can be pressed on people, and no attempt should be made to force the Japanese to accept Christian doctrines. But the superiority of the ethical side of Christianity should be explained to the Japanese. An appeal to them on this subject would be very likely to meet with a response.

Speaking of Japanese family life, Dr. Revon says there is a tendency to undermine Japanese traditional ideas in reference to the love and respect with which the old should be treated by the introduction of Western civilisation, but this is most undesirable. Though Shintō is not a religion, to it belongs the credit of having kept alive the worship of ancestors, which worship has been of decided benefit to the nation.

A correspondent, signing himself "Ai Shinshi," maintains that Dr. Revon is led astray by his ignorance of Japanese history. The prose and poetry of the Nara and Heian eras, says this writer, are full of ideas that were derived from Buddhism. The view of nature and the world expressed by the writers of those days was distinctively Buddhist. When we come to the Kamakura age, this was still more the case, continues "Aishinshi." Are not the work and success of Nichiren and Shinran sufficient proof of the influence of the creed? At the commencement of the Tokugawa era reliance was placed on Buddhism as the only power in the country capable of withstanding Christianity. In order to enable it to fulfil this function, the Tokugawa Shōguns made it a state religion, with a rich endowment. The worldly prosperity that the priests of that time enjoyed corrupted their hearts. The popularity of Confucianism, the study of foreign science, the revival of Shintō, all combined to neutralise the influence that Buddhism had wielded in former days, just as the revival of learning in Europe undermined the power of the Pope and the Church of Rome, where it did not destroy faith altogether. Dr. Revon refers, says "Aishinshi," in a triumphant manner to the influence of Christianity over the minds of men in the middle ages, but he says nothing about the thralldom, superstition, and servility that were involved in subjection to the Christianity of that time. Who is there that thinks that the state of Christian Society in Europe in the middle ages was an ideal state? Dr. Revon draws a distinction between Christian ethics and Christian dogma. Does any such distinction actually exist? What morality can any religion claim as its own that is not derived from its doctrines? Is there any such thing as the teaching of Christian ethics by persons who reject its dogmas? Dr. Revon, says the correspondent we are quoting, entirely disregards history in his observations on religion. His assertions are arbitrary and savour of that narrow-minded Christian bigotry which leads Occidentals to brand all other religions as false. It is hard to believe that a writer who considers himself the Buckle of the East should be unable to rid himself of prejudice when discoursing on religion. (Misukara Tōyō no Buckle nari to shite oru Revon shi ni arite, kono hempeki wo manukare atawasanu wa, jitsu ni imuka-shiki koto nari.)

Mr. Tokutomi Ichiirō, whose name as a writer is known all over Japan, has published in the Kokumin Shinbun, of which he is, we believe, still editor, his reasons for resigning the Trusteeship of the Dōshisha. The following is the gist of what Mr. Tokutomi has to say on his own personal belief and on the Dōshisha question:—My original connection with the Dōshisha ceased in 1881. I was appointed trustee in 1890. The position I have occupied in reference to Christianity has not changed during 20 years. In 1881 I told Mr. Nijima that I was unable to accept certain articles of the Christian Creed and asked him to strike my name off the roll of members of the church. My belief had not altered in 1890 when I was asked to become a trustee of the Dōshisha. This fact was known to Mr. Nijima. (Kono koto wa Nijima akiraka ni shireru ni hahawarazu, &c.) After Mr. Nijima's death I was in favour of developing the school as much as possible and advocated its removal to Tōkyō or at any rate the starting of a branch in the capital. But my advice was not acted on, and from that time onward my influence on the destinies of the institution was very slight. Last June, on my return from Europe, I found that, as a consequence of the policy of rendering the Institution independent of foreigners, inaugurated by Mr. Kosaki prior to his resignation, the situation was very grave. Offended by the action of the Trustees, the Board missionaries, who had hitherto given their services to the institution free of charge, withdrew, and it was decided that the annual grants of money made by the Board must cease. Thinking it to be most important that the Japanese connected with the Dōshisha should show a united front, I succeeded in getting a meeting called, which was attended by Messrs. Kosaki, Yokoi, Yuasa, Yebina, and others, but nothing came of it. Situated as we then were, two courses only were open to us. Either we had to satisfy the demands of the American Board and go on receiving their support as heretofore, or we had to make the institution more distinctively national in character, and thus ensure the sympathy and support of the Japanese people as a whole. The latter course was chosen, and in adopting this line we felt that we were carrying out the wishes of the late Mr. Nijima, who never intended the institution to be a Divinity School for training evangelists, but a means of developing the intelligence and the moral faculties of the Japanese people. It was quite clear to us that the Christian influence of the Dōshisha Schools must be of a thoroughly Japanese type and that there must be no such thing as the shadow of a disagreement between the underlying principles of these schools and the principles of the Imperial Rescript on education; in a word the Dōshisha must work hand and glove with the Department of Education, in order to remove all doubts as to its loyalty from the minds of the people at large. Hence it came about that an institution which previously had been a "wandering star" began to revolve around one centre—the Mombushō—and form a part of the national solar system. Even during Mr. Nijima's time various fruitless attempts were made to obtain from the Mombushō the privilege of exemption from conscription for the Dōshisha pupils. But even a Minister so liberal-minded as Viscount Mori refused to grant it. The alteration of the Association so as to satisfy the requirements of the Departments of Education was a measure of which I approved, and on which there is much that I could say, but it is not called for on this occasion. At the meeting held in January I stated that, as the affairs of the Association had been placed on a permanent footing, I purposed to resign my membership on the Committee of Trustees. Opinion was so divided in the committee that agreement seemed hopeless. My resignation did not actually take place till December 26th. The reason of this delay was simply my desire to give what assistance I could to Mr. Yokoi, who has in a most generous way undertaken a responsibility which he might easily have shelved on to other shoulders. It seemed to me that it would be mean of me to leave him unsupported, and so I stayed on till, as is known to the public, the trustees resigned in a body. Now Mr. Yokoi alone remains, and he only holds office temporarily, till his successor is appointed.

We are not surprised to find that the whole of the Dōshisha episode has been watched very closely by a large number of outsiders, who see in the turn that events have taken clear indications of the attitude of the national mind to the forms of Christianity taught by foreign missionaries. In an article that appeared in the Nippon Shinbun a short time ago the following comments occur: There are two kinds of Christians in Japan. There are those who show their colours on every occasion, and there are those who conceal their real convictions in the hopes of gaining greater popularity thereby. Both parties aim at spreading Christianity. They differ only as to the best way of doing it. Where they are at one is in their dependence on foreign support. There are some who advocate entire independence of foreigners, but this is mere idle talk. How many Churches are there in Japan that are receiving no foreign money whatever? We hear a good deal about Christianity of a Japanese type. But it amounts to this, Christianity which has been altered to suit Japanese notions is not Christianity at all, and the Nipponism that finds no insurmountable obstacles in Christianity is not the real article. Missions that are in receipt of foreign money are naturally obliged to report results to foreign Missionary Societies, and these reports must represent things to suit Western ideas. There must be no dragging in Japanese customs and according to them the authority of the original imported forms. It is quite sure that the preparation of a While there are so many serious issues at stake, it is no time for disunion based on race differences. Christians of the same mind should unite in a common cause, argues the Shinseiki.

In the columns of the Fiji Shimpō Dr. Inoue Enryō writes in a very outspoken manner in reference to the prospects of Buddhism and its present state. Religion, says Dr. Inoue, is only concerned with the morality of the lower orders. The upper classes need no instruction, and all sects alike seem to have agreed to let them alone. Coming to the class which practises religion, how is it that persons of this class appear so different from ordinary men and women of the world? They are twenty or thirty years behind the age.* Whereas the mass of the Japanese people began to move in the direction of reform and progress at the beginning of the Meiji era, religious devotees are only just opening their eyes now. In education the Buddhists are for the most part quite behind the times. There is little attempt among the priests to impart to their adherents a general education. The want of energy and enterprise in Buddhist priests generally is to be traced back to the amount of patronage they received in the Tokugawa era. The most advanced sect of the present day, the Shinshū, owes its superiority to the fact that it was not in favour with the Tokugawa Shōguns and hence was solely dependent on its own efforts. Dr. Inoue proposes three methods of reform, which we give below:—

I.—The Government should decide that in order to raise the character of the priesthood only graduates of duly authorised schools shall be allowed to take charge of temples. For the smaller temples (Matsufi) graduates of the Ordinary Middle Schools should be eligible, for what are called 中本山, Chū-honsan, (Head Temples of the Middle Class), graduates of one of the Higher Schools; and for the 大本山, Dai-honsan, graduates of the University alone should be eligible. In the matter of faith and religious earnestness, the sects would not be interfered with according to this plan. All that would be insisted on would be a certain standard of education. II.—Another method of reform which might be adopted would be for the parishioners to take the lead in securing for the temples they attend priests of education and enlightenment, who are qualified to mix in society generally and exercise a beneficial influence. There is no reason whatever why parishioners should not have a voice in the choice of priests. III.—A third way of securing a better class of priests which may be said to be practicable is the amalgamation of several branch temples (末寺, Matsufi) into one; thus insuring a sufficient stipend for a well-educated priest. The poverty of many of the small temples makes it impossible for them to provide anything like an adequate salary for the priest in charge.

As for dressing priests in foreign clothes or building churches in imitation of Christians, these Dr. Inoue thinks quite unnecessary. But there is, says Dr. Inoue, one other question of importance to be considered in connection with the reform proposed, and that is, should the system of hereditary priesthood be continued or should vacancies be filled by election? Both methods have been abused. Idle, ignorant, and wicked men have inherited charges as they might inherit land, and have only cared for the proceeds derived therefrom. On the other hand, men that have been placed in charge of temples have not scrupled to take advantage of their temporary power to sell heirlooms, and in other ways to rob the parishioners of their property. If the plans I have sketched above could be made to work together, concludes Dr. Inoue, all the abuses that have grown out of the systems hitherto in vogue would become impossible.

The thief who entered the office of Messrs. Herb & Co., No. 76, Yokohama, on the 30th ult., stole a collection of samples, and left a letter signed "Shinko-Kozo," was arrested on the 13th at Nishinohashi-Dori, where he was riding in a jinrikisha. His name is Yano Gichi, and his age 22. An accomplice, named Noguchi Bunkichi (27), has been arrested at Katsuyama Awa province.

IMPERIAL DIET.

THURSDAY, 9TH FEBRUARY.

HOUSE OF PEERS.

The House of Peers did not meet.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WITHDRAWING THE HOUSE TAX BILL.

The House met at 1.17 p.m., and the President announced that the Government had withdrawn the House Tax Bill.

RAILWAYS.

Mr. Fukuda Hismatsu presented a Question seeking information as to the Government's policy about railways. Official views had changed repeatedly, and the public did not know what opinion was really entertained. It had been abundantly proved in the War with China that the Government's management of the railways was very bad, and the important point seemed to be better organization and improvement of the lines, especially by changing the gauge, a problem which had been repeatedly mooted without ever receiving definite treatment at the hands of the Cabinet.

The Special Committee reported favourably upon Supplementary Budget No. 5 for the year 1899-00. This Budget provides that the sums originally estimated for the construction of certain railways be increased from 6,825,044 yen to 9,312,874 yen; that bonds be issued for the amount, and that it be included in the general account for next fiscal year. The railways in question are the following:—

- 1.—Fukuoka to Awamori.
- 2.—Tanruga to Toyama.
- 3.—Hachioji to Nagoya.
- 4.—Shimonoseki to Shinjiri.
- 5.—Yatsushiro to Kagoshima.

The Committee approved the project in the case of the first three lines, but recommended that the period for the last two be extended, and the House voted in that sense.

FORMOSA AFFAIRS.

Supplementary Budget No. 6 for 1899-00, was then passed as submitted by the Government. It provides that the Treasury shall lend two millions to the Bank of Formosa, and further shall purchase one million yen worth of the Bank's shares, agreeing not to receive any dividend on them for 5 years. The first instalment of the purchase money, namely, 250,000 yen, is to be paid in 1899-00.

The Bill authorizing the Bank of Formosa to issue notes of 1-yen denomination instead of the 5 yen sight bills now issued, was passed without debate.

FERTILIZERS.

The Special Committee's report on the private Bill for establishing stations to investigate sources of super-phosphate manure supplies was then presented. The Committee did not think it necessary to establish special stations, since the necessary researches could be undertaken by the Government Geological Investigation Bureau, and the Bill had consequently been amended in the sense of merely making an annual allowance of 19,984 yen for 5 years to cover the expenses incurred by the Bureau. It was explained that super-phosphates for fertilizing purposes were of the greatest importance to Japan, but that they had to be imported at heavy cost. The Government's calculation was that if a full supply were obtained from abroad, it would cost 10 million yen annually. Fortunately good sources of home production had been found in Miyazaki, Yamagata, and Akita Prefectures, and there was reason to think that 10 other prefectures also would furnish supplies. The effect of this fertilizer was estimated to be an addition of 20 per cent. to the productive power of the soil. But, even assuming that its use gave an additional crop of only 2 to per tan, that would mean an increase of 10 million koku of rice for the whole country (12½ million acres), or a money value of about 100 million yen. It was evidently worth while to spend a sum of a hundred thousand yen upon investigations which might assist in bringing about such a result.

The House passed the Bill thus amended.

OKINAWA.

A Government Bill was then read for the first time, providing that steps be taken to survey and assess the land in Okinawa prefecture so as to bring it under the same fiscal system as the rest of the empire. The method of taxation now practised was fixed nearly 300 years ago, and the taxes are paid partly in money, partly in rice, and partly in other commodities. The Bill was handed to a Special Committee.

THE STATE OWNERSHIP OF RAILWAYS.

A Representation urging the advisability of State ownership of the principal private railways was then read. It was a brief statement of the view that all the main vehicles of communications should be nationalized, and it called upon the Government to devise and present for the Diet's approval a suitable scheme for applying that principle to the chief private railways.

Mr. Otsu Junichiro expressed surprise that the Ministers of State were not in their places when such an important measure came before the House, seeing that some definite expression of their views was desirable. The promoters and the opponents of the Representation would be equally anxious to ascertain the Cabinet's attitude towards it, yet the only Minister present was the Minister of Agriculture and Commerce, even the Chief of the Communications Department, within whose direct province the measure lay, not deeming it worth while to put in an appearance. It was to be hoped, at all events, that the one Minister in attendance would make a clear statement of the Government's opinions.

Several members objected that as the Representation was not a Government measure, there was no reason to expect the attendance of Ministers, nor had the House any right to seek an ex post official view before its own attitude towards the measure was declared. The speech of Mr. Otsu consequently produced no result.

Mr. Kuribara Ryoichi then ascended the rostrum and introduced the Representation in a speech lasting an hour and a half. He commenced by deprecating the notion that the advocates of the measure suggested in the Representation were actuated by any opportunist motive. There was no idea of simply imparting new vigour to the financial market or relieving the present commercial and industrial depression. The project was based on a firm conviction that all the principal machinery of communications should be in the hands of the State, not merely for the sake of uniformity of system, but also because instruments essential to the material progress of the nation at large must not be left in the hands of private speculators. Another strong argument in favour of the proposal was derived from strategical considerations. Japan was now devoting much of her strength to the expansion of her armaments and the organization of a powerful army, but it was obvious to the most ordinary intelligence that without means of transportation an army is practically useless. The first consideration presenting itself in this context was that every part of the empire must be brought within the net work of railways. It was true that railway construction already attracted a good deal of capital and constituted a favourite field of enterprise, but naturally private companies did not take any account of strategical questions. They thought only of pecuniary profit, and the inevitable result was that all lines likely to give large returns were quickly built by private enterprise, and it fell to the lot of the State to construct the roads which, though strategically necessary, were economically unprofitable. The result of that unequal division of advantages was that the public were taxed for the maintenance of the lines left in the hands of the State, while the gains realized on the other roads went into the pockets of private individuals. The second consideration with regard to the employment of railways for military purposes was that no reliance could be placed on the arrangements provided by private lines, or on the certainty of being able to command them at a moment's notice. It was possible, of course, to issue official requisitions, but it was not possible to reckon on the result of such a proceeding. In Occidental countries 48 trains a day were run on most of the principal lines; in Japan the number was only 12. Now, in order to transport an Army Division, 96 trains were required, which meant that whereas in the West, where strategical preparations were under official control, a corps d'armée could be moved by rail in two days, the time required for the same operation in Japan would be 8 days. The war with China had clearly illustrated these defects. As patriotic people, the Japanese railway-owners had placed every available facility at the service of the Authorities, but the result had nevertheless been far from satisfactory. It was, in fact, quite hopeless to expect that private railways should be equipped in such a manner as to fully meet the requirements of a national emergency. That fact had been fully recognised in the Occident, and it was significant that with the exception of England and America—to which countries special considerations applied—all the States of the Occident had adopted the principle of public ownership. Some people argued, indeed, that private ownership offered a kind of guarantee. In the event of a hostile invasion, they said, railways belonging to the State would be at once seized by the enemy, whereas railways belonging to private persons would be respected as, in a certain sense, neutral property. An argument of that kind seemed scarcely worth considering. Invading armies were not accustomed to make such nice distinctions. Turning now to the economical side of the problem, it was to be noted that many persons doubted the capacity of officialdom to manage any great business concern, and argued that waste and incompetence always disfigured any attempts of the kind. The easiest way to meet that objection was to refer to actual experience. Here, for example, was a table showing the comparative working expenses of State-owned and privately-owned lines in Europe:—

WORKING EXPENSES.
	State Railways.	Private Railways.
Germany	94	131
Austria	65	847
Belgium	505	1013
Italy	649	876
Russia	927	1371
France	1616	958

It would be seen from these figures that France was the only country where official management did not contrast favourably with private, and in her case special circumstances were chiefly responsible for the difference. With regard to Japan, the following were the statistics:—

WORKING EXPENSES.
	1895.	1896.	1897.
Government Lines	369	461	492
Japan Railway Company	4004	418	447
Kobe Railway Company	366	383	429
Sanyo Railway Company	416	341	402
Kinshu Railway Company	344	358	426

It was unnecessary to take the minor lines into account as these four private companies were amply illustrative. The table showed that the advantage rested with the private lines, but several points had to be considered before arriving at that final conclusion. One patent fact was that the working expenses of the Government lines included the cost of the Railway Bureau, which might justly be called an Administrative outlay, and that they also included the expense of superintending the affairs of the private railways. Other points would present themselves by-and-by. Meanwhile, it must be quite evident as a result of ordinarily intelligent reflection, that the running expenses of a number of separate concerns could not fail to be reduced by amalgamating them all into one large firm. Reductions of staff, improvements of organization and saving of labour would ensue from their combination. If the profits derived from passenger traffic were compared, it appeared that the Sanyo Railway headed the list, but, for the rest, the figures for the State lines and the private were about the same. Here, again, was a table showing the gross earnings and working expenses per mile.

	Gross Earnings per mile. Yen.	Working Expenses per mile. Yen.
Government Lines.....	1.81	0.89
Japan R. Company	1.35	0.60
Sanyo R. Company	1.23	0.44
Kinshiu R. Company.....	1.06	0.64

Referring again to the fact that the working expenses on the State lines were comparatively large, it was necessary to observe that the Government kept its lines in an exceptionally high state of repair, and spent correspondingly large sums for that purpose. Then the returns for 1897 were:—

	OUTLAY AN ACCOUNT OF REPAIRS PER MILE. Sen.
Government Lines.....	44
Japan R. Company	25
Kinshiu R. Company	14

The experience gained by Japan during the past few years, and, indeed, the experience furnished by all countries was that the union of small companies into one large concern conferred great economic advantages, and the fact had special force in the case of railways, for it was only proper that the gains derived from profitable roads should go to meet the losses on unprofitable. Otherwise they were confronted with the anomaly that because a district was not yet sufficiently developed to support a railway of its own, it must remain without one of the greatest factors of development. Passing now to the question of capital, it appeared that the capital actually paid out of the Treasury for State Railways, when all necessary deductions were made, totalled 61,271,827 yen, to which had to be added a sum of 4,332,165 yen taken from the earnings of the lines and used as capital. Thus the total funds involved were 65,603,992 yen. Of that amount, the sum now actually earning a return was 48,567,417 yen, and the sum not yet profitably employed, 17,036,575 yen. Since the State had commenced railway operations, the total profits derived from the lines and paid into the Treasury had been 36,765,423 yen. They might say, therefore, that the capital paid out had been reduced by that amount, and that the sum still sunk in the lines was only 24,506,403 yen. Again, the average dividend on the whole capital since the beginning of the enterprise had been 5.4 per cent., or 7 per cent. of the capital actually earning a return; and that too in spite of the fact that the first road, namely the Yokohama-Tokyo, had been built with money obtained abroad at 6 per cent., and that the original Industrial Bonds floated for railway purposes had carried 6 per cent. interest. Observing that the profits paid into the Treasury for the year 1898 totalled 5,860,000 yen in round figures, and noting that nearly 37 millions had been paid in the past, it was evident that these railways—and the same might be said of the lines which the Government was now building—would soon have paid for themselves, and would be a valuable asset of the country, enriching it not merely by their actual profits, but also by the benefits they conferred upon commerce, industry, and agriculture. Some publicists, while admitting the general advantages of state-owned lines, were disposed to hold that the time had not arrived for carrying out the project suggested by the Representation. The speaker considered, on the contrary, that everything pointed to the present as the right time. It was essential to the successful conduct of such a negotiation that the sellers should not occupy too commanding a position. A few years hence, the shareholders of the principal lines would assuredly be much more difficult to deal with than they were likely to show themselves now. In England or America, for example, it would be scarcely possible to induce the shareholders to part with the lines on reasonable terms, though they would have been sufficiently amenable 40 or 50 years ago. Then there was the question of mixed residence. From July next the country would be thrown completely open to foreigners. Now they were ready to welcome foreigners heartily. They would be glad to see them engage in commerce and manufactures, and specially glad to see them employ their capital and experience for the development of Japan's resources. But what would be the effect upon this particular question of State ownership if foreigners invested largely in railway shares? Would they be content with terms such as Japanese shareholders might accept? It must not be forgotten that these railways of which he was speaking were the very vertebrae and marrow of the country's system of communications. Their control constituted a vital problem. Already it was reported currently that large purchases of shares in a certain well-known railway had been made by foreigners. Let that go on a little longer and such representations as that now before the House would be idle. They had the experience of other countries to guide them. When France set about nationalizing her railways, she found that most of them were in the possession of English capitalists, and she was obliged to pay off one-third of the price, and make over the profits of the roads for 90 years. Austria, in the same way, had found French capitalists in possession, and had been obliged to pay three times the cost price of the lines. With such precedents to warn them, would it be wise to deter the settlement of this question indefinitely? As a matter of fact, the railway system of Japan was established on a basis of State ownership, for the Railway Law contained a provision to the effect that, after the lapse of 25 years, the Government should have the right to buy up the lines at a price assessed with reference to the average market value of their shares during the preceding five years. It was, then, simply a question whether to put this principle into operation now or to wait until the expiration of the period indicated by law. That brought the speaker to the last phase of his subject, namely, the manner of effecting the purchase. He had shown that the acquisition of the lines by the State would be desirable from an economical and a strategical point of view, and that the longer the matter was deferred the more difficult it would be to accomplish. He had now to consider a point which many persons found the most perplexing of all, namely, the method to be followed in carrying out the scheme. The law, as he had said, indicated the average market price of the shares as a basis of value, but it did not appear that such a manner of assessment would work well in practice. The share market could easily be influenced by speculators. The House probably knew that since this project of State purchase had come upon the tapis, the quotation for the shares of the Tanko Railway had gone up from 18 to 30. A little well-organized "bulling" might make a difference of many millions in the purchase price of a railway if the market quotation of the shares were taken as a basis of assessment. A much better method seemed to be that adopted in Europe, namely, to take the net average profit of the line for three years as a unit of value and to multiply it by some fixed number, say 20 or 25. Of course such a rule could not be applied in the case of lines which were in course of construction, or which paid no dividend. They belonged to a special category, and would have to be assessed with regard to the capital actually sunk in them. For example, suppose that a railway whose shares were 50 yen face value was making a net profit of 10 per cent. Then, if 20 were the constant multiplier, the purchase price of the shares would be 100 yen; if 25 were the multiplier, the price would be 125 yen. It was difficult to determine exactly the proper multiplier, but some figure between the limits of 20 and 25 seemed suitable. He did not pretend to lay down any hard and fast rule, but only to furnish some indications of a theory such as might be applicable to the circumstances. With regard, now, to the method of payment, some people talked of a foreign loan, and predicted that the sudden influx of so large an amount of capital would greatly disturb economic affairs. But it did not appear that there would be any occasion for a transaction of that nature. His view was that the State should merely change places with the present shareholders, and that public bonds should be given for the shares. There was no apparent reason to apprehend serious economic disturbance as the consequence of that procedure. To come down to arithmetic. The average net earnings of the four principal railways in the second half of 1897 to the first half of 1898, had been:—

Japan R. Company.....	8.491 per cent.
Kinshiu R. "	9.148 " "
Sanyo R. "	8.281 " "
Kobu R. "	10.200 " "

There were other lines, of course, that must be included in the scheme, but for the purposes of the argument these four only need be considered. Their capitals and net profits for the three years under consideration, had been:—

	Capital. Yen.	Average net Profits. Yen.
Japan R. Company	42,000,200	3,596,787
Sanyo R. "	35,840,000	1,331,868
Kinshiu R. "	21,128,132	1,932,801
Kobu R. "	1,710,000	211,988
Total	98,678,332	7,053,444

If the multiplier were taken as 20, in other words, if the rate of interest were 5 per cent., the purchase price would be 140 million yen in round numbers; if the multiplier were 25, or interest at 4 per cent., the price would be 176 millions, and if the multiplier were calculated on a basis of 3½ per cent., the price would be 185 millions. The multiplier of 20, supposing the face value of the shares to be 50 yen, would give the following purchase prices for the shares:—

Kobu R. "	123

There was nothing extravagant in these figures, nor should there be any serious difficulty in coming to an understanding with the shareholders on such a basis. As to the effect that the transaction might exercise on the market for bonds, it was to be noted that under any circumstances additional bonds, to the extent of from 200 to 300 million yen, would have to be issued for the purposes of the post bellum programme and for railway construction, so that an addition of 140 or 150 millions ought not to create any great apprehensions. Besides, the transaction could not properly be called an inflation of the volume of securities. It would only be an exchange of one kind of securities for another; a substitution of public bonds for railway shares. The element of hard cash would not enter into the transaction to any appreciable extent. Possibly the shareholders might desire some part of the purchase price in money. If so, there could be no difficulty in obtaining what was necessary from foreign capitalists, the railways being unimpeachable security. The War Bonds were now quoted at a premium in the London market, though they stood at a considerable discount in Japan. With proper management, there could not be much difficulty in selling whatever quantity was desired to British capitalists. A hundred million or two hundred million yen worth of bonds would be a mere drop in the ocean of London finance, and as for the payment of the interest, which operation was regarded by some people with apprehension and considered likely to deplete the country of specie, there should not be much anxiety on that point in view of the rapid development shown by the country's foreign commerce. At all events, the amount of bonds added to the country's floating capital would not suffice to cause appreciation of commodities or other economic disturbance.

Mr. Takagi Maotoshi did not think that the method of comparison adopted by the introducer of the Representation was fair. As a matter of fact, the Government lines traversed the very best routes in Japan. They joined the two capitals and passed through highly populated, prosperous districts. It was misleading to set up any contrast between the earnings of such railways and the earnings of private railways en bloc. He had the utmost respect for Mr. Kuribara's judgment as well as for his financial ability, but he could not see that the conclusions just submitted to the House were reconcilable with actual facts. Such a valuable property were the State roads considered that during several years the business men had agitated to obtain possession of them by purchase. Another incomprehensible point made by Mr. Kuribara was that only 12 trains a day could be run on Japanese private lines. How was such a limit fixed? He failed to follow Mr. Kuribara's reasoning, especially where the transport of troops was concerned. Besides, the Government's profits were swelled by the high prices that it charged for tolling stock hired to the private lines, while, at the same time, the salaries of the chief officials were not charged to the railway accounts; only the pay of the people actually engaged in the traffic business appeared.

Mr. Ozaki Yukio was not a thorough-paced opponent of the principle of State ownership of railways. Under some circumstances such a system might be most desirable. But he had listened with considerable astonishment to the speech of Mr. Kuribara, because in one important respect it seemed to be vitiated by a serious misapprehension. Mr. Kuribara had proceeded on the assumption that the method of State ownership was practically endorsed by Occidental countries, and that, with the exceptions of England and America, all Western nations had converted their railways into public property. But, in point of fact, that statement applied to only two countries, Egypt and Nicaragua. These petty States excepted—and one of them, as they knew, could not properly be included in the account at all—these two excepted, the practice of the whole Western world was directly at variance with Mr. Kuribara's assertion. In truth there was not one single Great Power in the Occident which had carried out the system advocated by Mr. Kuribara. Some of them had tried the experiment and gone back to private control as the better method. In Italy, for example, the Government owned the lines but they were worked by private companies. The system of mixed ownership that existed in Japan might be said to prevail everywhere. Stating the matter arithmetically, there were 17 countries with the same system as that of Japan, and 9 where the lines were wholly in the possession of private companies. In Germany State ownership had been originally tried; then the private system was adopted, and then, 30 years ago, some important strategical routes had been brought under official control. In France, the Government held only a fraction of the lines. Then, as a rule, all State-owned railways showed bad financial records. That was the case even in Belgium, and as for Russia, the routes worked by the State invariably showed losses. The truth was that in the matter of nationalization of the railways Japan's case was exceptional, not because the State held a small proportion of lines, but because it held a very large one. As a point of general theory monster organizations of all kinds were to be deprecated. They offered great facilities for abuses and they wielded a power that could not safely be trusted to any body of individuals. It was not pleasant to call attention to Japan's political record, but there could be no denial that her Cabinets' tenure of office was most unstable. If the railways were entirely the property of the State, every change of Ministry might be the occasion for changes in their management and in the personnel of their principal officials. It was necessary also to consider the topography of a country when discussing a question of this kind. Countries like Germany, France, Austria, and Russia might be said to without any means of transport except their railways. But Japan consisted of a series of islands stretched out in a long narrow line. Access to almost every part of her territory might be obtained by sea. To apply to her case a system which suited Germany or France was like using a boot for a hat. Nature had conferred on her an immense advantage; a blessing which seemed to escape the attention of the advocates of State ownership of railways, who argued as if the troops must be carried by land and by land only. In very truth, the railways, apart from their function in carrying an army to a port of embarkation, would never be required for purposes of military transport in Japan unless the fleet had been exterminated.

Mr. Kuribara and his fellow-thinkers appeared to be uniformly basing their forecasts on the assumption that the fleet would be driven from the seas. They proposed to provide for the contingency of defeat only. If the public had to consider the state of affairs following the destruction of the fleet, the question whether the railways happened to be in the possession of the State or of private persons would not receive much attention, or have any practical value: every mile of road would then be at the Government's absolute disposal. If even in France, where a strong purpose of military action animates the nation, and where the railways are absolutely necessary for military transport, nationalization of the lines had been only very partially effected, and if in Germany, where constant precautions have to be adopted against attack, the empire did not own any lines, but left them in the hands of the various States or of private persons, how could it be reasonably contended that the system of nationalization was necessary in Japan, where an assault by land need never be apprehended until after the destruction of the fleet, and where an offensive movement of concentration might be made at any chosen point? As to the economic aspect of the proposition, they were told that the addition of 140 or 150 million yen worth of bonds to the volume in circulation would not produce any disturbance of value. Surely such a proposition could not be maintained for an instant in the face of recent experience. Last year, the withdrawal of 40 millions by the Bank of Japan's purchases had exercised a very perceptible effect on the market value of public securities, pushing them up from 93 to 96. Could it be doubted that if 150 millions were thrown suddenly on the market great disturbance would arise? The raising of a foreign loan was talked of as a probable means of reducing the volume of bonds at home. No doubt a foreign loan could be raised, but what about the payment of the interest? With regard to that they were vaguely directed to remember the growth of the country's foreign commerce, but he suggested that they should also remember that at present the country's foreign commerce did not serve to bring specie into the country but rather to drive it out. It was not reassuring to hear this airy talk, this light expression of hope that everything would be sure to come right somehow or other, when they were dealing with a financial problem of large dimensions. The House had better consider, too, whether the Government's success hitherto as a railway manager justified the nation in placing all the lines under official control. It was notorious that the business capacities of officials proved everywhere defective in practice, and certainly the history of Japanese officialdom did not suggest that it could be expected to upset the rule. Had the Japanese samurai been a man of affairs at any time in his history? Had the shogun of to-day inherited any commercial or industrial faculties from their ancestors? Was it not true, on the contrary, that in this very matter of railways the Government's management was notoriously defective, and that in the war of 1894-5 the private lines had been found much more efficient than the official?

At this point the closure was put, and carried by a small majority (138 to 133), the method of voting being by roll call; but Dr. Hatoyama having challenged the President's count, an unsigned ballot was taken, when 143 voted for the closure, and 130 against. The President then announced that an unsigned ballot would be taken to decide the fate of the Representation. Dr. Hatoyama moved that the ballot be signed. Mr. Hoshi Toru said that the responsibility of delaying the proceedings rested on the Progressists, whereupon Dr. Hatoyama withdrew his motion, and an unsigned ballot was taken, when 145 cast their votes for the Representation, 127 opposing it.

THE NEW TAX ON SOY.

Mr. Kuribara, in his capacity as Chairman of Special Committee, inquired whether the Report of the Committee on the Bills for increasing the Tax on Soy and the Postal Rates had been circulated among the members, and, being answered in the affirmative, asked permission to present the Report at once as a matter of urgency. This proposal evoked numerous protests, several members contending that such procedure was precipitate and unjust, the Report of the Committee having only just come into their hands, and no time having been available for its consideration. Mr. Kudo Kokan insisted that no precedent existed for such unseemly haste, and Mr. Shimada Saburo pointed out that the copies of the Report which had been circulated were not even printed, but only impressions taken from the original; that they were difficult to decipher, and that they did not bear any name.

An unsigned ballot being taken, 138 voted for the urgency motion and 133 against it.

AN INTERESTING DEBATE.

Mr. Kuribara then presented his Report. The deficit of revenue which the Bills were intended to cover aggregated 5,950,000 yen. Of that amount, the increased tax on soy was estimated to yield 1,420,000 yen, but as the change could not become operative until March, namely, a month later than the original intention, the yield would be only 1,260,000 yen. The augmented postal rates were expected to yield 1,980,000 yen, but the Committee had decided that the changes proposed in the case of periodicals were not advisable. This involved a reduction of the estimated revenue by 310,000 yen, the final result being that the two Bills would bring to the Treasury an income of 2,930,000 yen. The Government had also introduced a Bill for taxing houses, which would have given a revenue of 2,600,000 yen, but in consideration of the fact that amendments of the Tobacco Monopoly system and the institution of a license fee for dealers in manufactured tobacco, would produce additional revenue to the extent of over two millions, the House Tax Bill had been withdrawn. The Government had further decided to obtain 600,000 yen by postponing the abolition of export duties until July 1st. The Committee had further amended the Soy Tax Bill so as to permit the manufacture of tsu of soy for domestic use, free of tax. Mr. Kuribara finally explained that, in view of the shortness of the Report and the simplicity of the subject, it had not been thought necessary to distribute printed copies.

Mr. Momma opposed the Bill for increasing the Tax on Soy. He contended that the poorest classes, to whom soy was almost a necessary of life, were not in a position to manufacture the article at home, but had to buy it from time to time in small quantities, whereas the middle and upper classes resorted to domestic manufacture. Thus the practical result of the Bill would be to levy an impost from the poorest among the people in respect of an article of daily use.

Mr. Shimada Saburo vehemently denounced the method of procedure adopted with regard to this measure. It was undoubtedly a Bill of great importance, yet the majority, relying on the force of numbers, were rushing it through the House in a manner which virtually reduced the discussion to a farce. After the regular hour for closing the session had come, a half-illegible copy of a Special Committee's report had been distributed among the members. It was not even a printed document, and it bore no signature. The invariable practice previously had been to circulate printed copies signed by the President, and to allow an interval of two days before inviting the House to the discussion report. But they were now asked to make this illegible, unsigned document the basis of immediate discussion, and their protests against such precipitancy were silenced by the voice of an arbitrary majority. It was impossible not to feel poignant regret that the House should thus belittle itself and establish a pernicious precedent. Passing to the Tax itself, he condemned it as opposed to the elementary principles of taxation, since it was imposed on an article of necessary consumption; since its burden would fall almost entirely on the poorest classes, and since its collection would involve vexatious scrutiny into the domestic affairs of the people.

Mr. Inouye Kakugoro replied. He traversed Mr. Shimada's criticism as vague, and pointed out that while the Sake Tax had been increased from 4 yen per koku to 12, the tax upon soy was raised from 1 yen to 2 yen only.

After some further debate, the closure was applied, and, an unsigned ballot being taken, 150 voted for the measure and 125 against it. The Third Reading was dispensed with, and the Bill was passed at once.

INCREASING POSTAL RATES.

The House then proceeded to discuss the Bill for increasing the Postal Rates.

Mr. Minoura Katsudo (formerly Vice-Minister of State for Communications) declared that the measure was uncivilized and calculated to check national progress. It would greatly impair the reputation of the Government, and, if the House of Representatives passed it, the nation also would be discredited. Japan's postage rates were certainly cheap. But this was not a mere question of yen and sen. It was a question of wide economical import. One of the first aims of a progressive people should be to provide themselves with the most complete machinery for communications, yet they were now asked to deliberately injure the facilities of postal communication for the sake of obtaining a petty fraction of revenue. It was beyond doubt that the effect of raising the rates would be to reduce the bulk of the correspondence, which meant simply that progress would be checked. From another point of view the Bill was utterly to be condemned. It was in direct contradiction of the principles avowed by the Cabinet. They had been assured again and again that the Government's purpose in increasing the taxes was to place the national finances on a sound footing. But the inference inevitably suggested by this measure was that the country had fallen into extreme financial straits and did not know whither to turn for sources of revenue. That was the conclusion at which the foreign public would certainly arrive. Instead of contributing to financial soundness, the imposition of this tax would effectually injure the national credit. There might be some excuse for the measure if the proceeds of the tax were to be applied to improving the postal service, which certainly stood in need of improvement. But there was no suggestion of any such purpose. The revenue accruing from the increased rates was to go into the Treasury and be used for several purposes. Already the Treasury was obtaining 2½ million yen from the posts. Not a sen of that ought to be employed for defraying the general expenditures of the State until all just causes of complaint against the postal service had been removed. The measure would disgrace the nation if it became law, and he conjured the House to interfere in the best interests of civilized progress.

Mr. Ooka Ikuzo did not propose to occupy the attention of the House by any lengthy speech. But there were a few points calling for comment. They must remember that the present postal rates had been fixed seventeen years ago, when the purchasing power of the yen and its sterling value had been very different from what they are now. The adoption of the single gold standard in 1897 permanently fixed the sterling value of the yen at one half of its original figure. Yet the postal rates had remained all the while unchanged. They had been told by the last speaker that this measure would be a disgrace to the country. Were they to conclude that all the nations belonging to the International Union were disgraced because they took care to fix their rates in gold irrespective of the apparent increase thus entailed on silver-using countries, and because they exacted payment in gold for services mutually rendered, so that the nominal cost of such services increased constantly in terms of silver tokens of exchange? What really disgraced a country was that its postal service should be badly managed, slow, and imperfect. This talk about the duties imposed by civilized progress, and the obligation of an enlightened Government not to charge an additional sen for work which had become more and more expensive, and for which the rate of remuneration originally fixed had ceased to have its original purchasing power, was the indiscriminating platitudes of school primers. For his part, he thought that the Government showed a great want of courage in not raising the charge at once to 4 sen, so as to make it consistent with the new currency system. As to the argument that the revenue thus obtained was not to be applied to improving the service, it rested on a palpable misconception. The particular yen and sen derived from the post office work might not be so applied, but if they looked at the appropriations for the Department of Communications, they would see an item of some twelve million yen under the heading of "outlays for the improvement of posts and telegraphs." That was one of the special expenditures which contributed to disturb the equilibrium between the outgoings and the incomings in the Budget, and, since the increase of postal rates was one of the means of restoring equilibrium, it might fairly be regarded as revenue raised for works of improvement. They had been explicitly informed that the Government appreciated the necessity of greatly bettering the postal service, but for that purpose funds were absolutely necessary. The want of funds had obstructed progress, and produced a state of affairs which constituted a real disgrace. Cheapness should not be the first aim of legislators and administrators. What they had to strive for was excellence.

Mr. Tannematsu moved the closure, and it was voted without division.

Mr. Taguchi Ukichi wished to ask a question. The Treasury had bought in about 50 million yen worth of Bonds during the current year. He could not trace the interest on these Bonds in the accounts and he desired information on the subject.

The President, having consulted the Minister of State for Finance, informed Mr. Taguchi that His Excellency declined to answer at the moment, as the question was foreign to the matter under discussion.

An unsigned ball showed 148 for the second Reading of the Bill and 124 against. On the motion of Mr. Tannematsu, the Second Reading was taken at once, and the Bill was passed as amended by the Special Committee.

The House rose at 8.55 p.m.

FRIDAY, FEB. 10TH.

HOUSE OF PEERS:

The House met at 10.10 a.m.

EDUCATION.

Mr. Iwawa called attention to the fact that although the House had passed a Representation, more than a year ago, urging the advisability of appropriating a portion of the Indemnity to educational purposes, and although Questions had subsequently been asked on the subject, no reply was yet forthcoming. He begged the President to press for an answer.

THE BUDGET.

Viscount Tani, on behalf of the Budget Committee, reported, in a few words, that the Committee had decided in favour of the Budget as amended by the Lower House, and added that the Heads of Sections would furnish information, if required, on the subjects which had fallen within their respective spheres.

Viscount Soga asked for an explanation as to the methods resorted to for making up the deficiency of Revenue resulting from the reduction of the proposed rate of Land Tax, and received from Mr. Sakatani, Government Delegate, the following statement:—

Deficiency of Revenue caused by reducing the proposed rate of Land Tax	Yen. 7,450,000
Reductions made by the Lower House in the general Expenditures	1,500,000
Net deficiency of Revenue ..	5,950,000
Yield of increased Tax on Soy	1,420,000
Yield of increased Postal Rates	1,980,000
Increased Revenue resulting from changes in the Tobacco Monopoly ..

System	1,950,000
Revenue derived by postponing for 3 months the abolition of Export Duties ..	600,000

Total

In reply to a further question, Mr. Sakatani said that, although it was not yet possible for him to speak with absolute accuracy, the total increased taxation next year would be 34 million yen in round numbers.

Viscount Soga introduced an urgency motion that the discussion of the Budget be deferred until the whole of the Government's scheme was before the House, and until the members had had more leisure to examine the Committee's Report.

The House rejected the motion.

THE POST-BELLUM PROGRAMME.

Viscount Soga said that a certain post-bellum programme had been elaborated, and endorsed by the Diet in its 9th session, ever since which time Cabinet after Cabinet had succumbed to the difficulty of finding means to carry out the programme. The perpetual sequel to the elaboration of that programme had been increased taxation. Each Cabinet had appeared to consider it a sacred duty to abide by the programme, and no Cabinet had succeeded. They were now asked to vote a further increase of taxation on the ground that the programme had to be put through; had to be completed. It was time that they should ask what was this thing to which the country was pledged; what did the programme mean; what were its real dimensions. At the outset, certain definite figures had been set forth and the Diet had voted them. Then, in the following session, it was asked to vote an increase of 10,670,000 yen for converting four protected cruisers into armoured cruisers, and then a further sum of 27,800,000 yen for the building of two additional cruisers. Here was a departure from the so-called "programme" to the extent of 37,950,050 yen. Next they were asked to vote another additional sum of from 14 to 15 millions on account of military equipment and fortifications. Could it be asserted that finally had now been reached? All the above additions had been in the section of Extraordinary Expenditures. The case was little better when they turned to the Ordinary Expenditures. The cost of maintaining the Army and Navy had been put at 39,000 yen, in the original estimate for 1899-00. But in the estimates now before them the figure for that same year stood at 43,930,000 yen. He did not wish to be interpreted as attacking the principle of military expansion. That was not his purpose. The purpose of his remarks was to ascertain whether the nation had not plunged into a kind of bottomless pit of expenditures, and whether they could discover any limit within range of reasonable calculation. It was one thing to talk of carrying out or completing a programme. It was another thing to add to it and supplement it. Were he building a house, he should consider that to provide mats and doors belonged to the category of "completing" or carrying out the architect's plan, but he should not regard the erection of out-houses and stables in the same light, and it appeared to him that the Government's so called "mats and doors" were really a new expansion of the original scheme of expansion. In the next place they had to consider whether some additional outlays must not be anticipated. When the post bellum programme was first enunciated, he had pointed out that a fifth Admiralty station would probably be required; that the Seventh Division of the Army would surely have to be organized at considerable outlay, and that other naval ports would be among the needs of the near future. His forecast had proved correct with reference to the Seventh Division, and he desired to know whether the Government did not now expect to have to provide for the other matters also. In Formosa, again, it seemed inevitable that large expenditures would be incurred. The troops were now quartered, he understood, in buildings which had formerly served as shrines for the Deity of War and in hired houses. It would surely be necessary to build barracks for them sooner or later.

Again, he did not, for his own part, entertain any doubt that they would be asked, by-and-by, to vote further supplies for purchasing improved weapons, and for other objects which, although they presented themselves plainly enough to his conception, he should refrain from enumerating. Finally he wanted to know what sources of additional revenue the Government had in sight. The expenditures were visible enough. Where were the funds to cover them? Was the Ministry's policy summed up in the familiar refuge of improvidence "Oh, things will come right somehow," or did they see clearly ahead?

The Minister of State for the Navy said that he was prepared to answer Viscount Sogō's questions so far as they referred to the Department under his charge, but he wished to give his replies in secret session.

SECRET SESSION.

The House went into secret session at 11.36 a.m., and resumed its sitting with open doors at 1.14 p.m.

RENEWED DEBATE.

Mr. Kato Hiroyuki condemned the reductions made by the Lower House in the section of Education. If the Peers endorsed such reductions, they would be stultifying themselves, since they had just unanimously adopted a Representation in favour of a fuller measure of State aid for education.

Viscount Tani opposed the Budget generally. He failed to discover any elasticity of revenue such as would justify the strain put upon it. Six years hence the increased rate of Land Tax would cease to be operative. Was it imaginable that the expenditures of the State six years hence would be less than they are now? The experience of the past few years did not warrant such a supposition. There was no evidence that the nation's resources were growing in proportion to the growth of the outlays to which its statesmen were committing it. It appeared to him that they were behaving as one who should put armour on a skeleton. By-and-by, when they had completed their grand schemes of armament, there would be no strength to utilize them. He concluded by denouncing the action of the Lower House in passing the Bills for increased Taxation and making no radical amendments in the Budget.

Mr. Kato Hiroyuki moved that the discussion be postponed, but the House voted against the motion.

The sections of the Home Department, the Foreign Department, and the Department of Justice were then passed as amended by the Lower House.

On coming to the Department of War, Mr. Takashima denied that the scheme of military expansion was excessive, and insisted that smaller measures would be inconsistent with the position the empire had acquired.

Viscount Tani asked what he thought of sending an army into the field without provisions; to which Mr. Takashima replied that he had no ears to listen to Viscount Tani. Mr. Izawa invited him to withdraw the expression as wanting in courtesy, but he declined to do so.

Viscount Tani moved that the outlays on account of the Army be reduced by two million yen.

The President pointed out the impossibility of putting such a motion to the House. They were considering the Budget clause by clause, and it would be necessary for Viscount Tani to indicate clearly the reductions he contemplated.

Viscount Tani replied that he wished to take the sense of the House, after which he would make explicit indications. But he did not press the matter to a division.

The Sections of War and the Navy were passed as sent up from the Representatives, and the House rose at 4.06 p.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House met at 1.30 p.m.

PUBLIC PARKS.

Mr. Tannematsu presented a Question as to the Government's policy with regard to public parks in Tokyo. He considered that the condition of Tokyo, as the capital of Japan, was very unworthy. The progress of a nation might be judged from the state of its chief cities. There were only two parks in Tokyo at present, Ueno and Shiba; and they had been made by the Tokugawa rulers. These parks were now the city's great lions. Everyone visited them on coming to Japan. But in Tokugawa days they had been incomparably better cared for than they are to-day. The mausolea and shrines they contained had been preserved with infinite solicitude, whereas now these grand examples of Japanese art were falling to decay. Stated briefly, the policy of the present Government seemed to be that some small measure of State aid should be given to the relics of remote antiquity, objects dating from the Nara and Heian epochs, but the treasures bequeathed from the Kamakura and Tokugawa eras were quite uncared for. If a more liberal policy in general were beyond the Treasury's financial strength, Tokyo at least should receive some attention.

NATIONALIZATION.

Mr. Abe Iwane presented the Report of the Special Committee on the Nationalization Bill. The only change recommended was that the office of Minister Plenipotentiary should be added to the list of posts, in Art. 16, for which aliens naturalized in Japan would not be eligible.

Professor Hozumi, Government Delegate, strongly opposed the Committee's amendment. This very question had been fully considered by the Committee for Revising the Codes, and after careful research and debate they had unanimously decided against imposing such a restriction. Moreover, the House of Peers had endorsed the view of the Codes Committee. An intimate knowledge of foreign countries was among the most valuable qualifications of a diplomatic officer, and when it was supplemented by sufficient knowledge of the country he served, his competence might be considered exceptional. It would be unwise to deprive the public service of the advantage of possessing such members. The only State in the world which imposed this restriction was Venezuela. The principle adopted by the drafters of the Nationalization Law had been that naturalized foreigners should be declared ineligible for all offices whose occupants were competent to take independent action. That principle at once indicated Ministers of State, the President and members of the Privy Council, judicial officials, and members of the Diet. The list given in the Bill contained also Chokunin officers of the Household Department and General officers of the Army and Navy. It was true that these two last classes could not take independent action: they were all under the control of superiors. But special considerations applied to them. Diplomatic officers, however, were always under the orders of the Foreign Department, and when plenary power was vested in them for the purpose of concluding a treaty or convention, their work had to be endorsed by ratification. There was no reasonable argument for closing these posts to naturalized aliens. He desired, also, to call the attention of the House to the fact that the term "Minister Plenipotentiary" did not include "Minister Resident" or "Chargé d'Affaires." Was there any consistency in excluding the first from a category which included the two last? Further, "Minister Plenipotentiary" did not include the much higher and more important post of "Ambassador." Apparently the Special Committee thought that a naturalized foreigner might safely be appointed Ambassador, but could not be trusted as a Minister Plenipotentiary. The fact was that already this Nationalization Bill contained a list of restrictions much longer than those usually imposed by Occidental countries. The latter limited to two or three the offices which they closed to naturalized aliens, but the project of law now before the House contained a list of no less than ten. This Nationalization Law would be closely scrutinized by foreign nations, and would be taken as furnishing a clear index of Japan's mood towards strangers.

The House voted for the Second Reading of the Bill, but postponed the discussion.

NEW BILLS, ETC.

The private Bill for amending the Statutory Tariff in the sense of abolishing the import duty on salt fish coming from Saghalien, was then passed.

The following Bills, &c., were handed to special Committees:—

Government Bill relating to Patents (sent down from Upper House).

Government Bill relating to Trade-marks (sent down from Upper House).

Government Bill relating to Designs (sent down from Upper House).

Government Bill (sent down from Peers) for amending the Registration Law so as to bring it into harmony with the new Laws of Patents, Trade-marks and Designs.

Government Bills relating to local boundaries in Okayama, Kagawa, and Oita Prefectures.

Representation for establishing stations for investigating and studying questions relating to marine products, and giving training in fishery, &c.

REPRESENTATION FOR GRANTING SUCCEUR TO THE INVENTORS OF THE JINRIKISHA.

According to this Representation, the idea of the jinrikisha occurred to Izumi Yosuke in 1868, and he was assisted to carry it out by Takayama Kosuke and Suzuki Tokujiro, the actual work of construction being done by a carpenter named Nishida Torajiro. Had it been possible for these men to obtain a patent, they would have made large profits. But there were no patents in those days. Kosuke and Torajiro are both dead. Each has left a son who is now barely able to eke out a painful existence. Suzuki Tokujiro is a vagrant, without assured shelter or food, and Izumi Yosuke is living with some relatives in a state of extreme penury. The fact that State aid was given to Minamoto no Tsunanori, who adopted stenography to the Japanese language, is cited as a precedent by the framers of the Representation.

PERMANENT PARLIAMENT HOUSE.

Representation for appointing a Parliamentary Committee to investigate the question of constructing permanent buildings for the Diet, the present structure, which was only intended for temporary purposes, being quite inadequate.

MONDAY, 13TH FEBRUARY.

HOUSE OF PEERS.

The House met at 10.15 a.m.

BUDGETS.

Two Supplementary Budgets for 1899-00, Nos. 5 and 6, were handed to a Special Committee, with instructions to report on them within a week, and the discussion of the General Budget and correlated Budgets for 1899-00 was then resumed. A resolute effort was made by Professor Toyama, Dr. Kato, Viscount Tani, Mr. Izawa, and Mr. Kubota to induce the House to restore the appropriations rejected by the Representatives, namely, those for a Committee of Scientists (Gakushi-in), a Meteorological Committee (Sokuchi gaku-in), and a National Language Investigation Society (Kokugo Chosakai). These members contended that the House would stultify itself, on the very morrow of passing a Representation in favour of extended State aid to education, if it endorsed the reductions made by the Representatives in the appropriations for the Department of Education. Several questions were addressed to Count Kabayama, Minister of State for Education, and Mr. Izawa charged the Minister with inconsistency because he declared, in one breath, that the Government was resolutely bent upon advancing the cause of education, and, in the next, announced the Cabinet's consent to the reductions made by the Lower House. The Minister replied that, while the Cabinet was willing to accept the verdict of the two Houses of the Diet, it reserved to itself the resource of bringing in a supplementary budget to cover any expenditures which might seem absolutely essential to the progress of education.

The House, by a vote of 118 to 48, refused to restore the items expunged by the Representatives, and passed all the Budgets as amended by the Lower House.

NEW BILLS.

The following Bills were then read for the first time and handed to Special Committees:—

Stamp Tax Law (sent up from Lower House).

With reference to this Bill, the Government Delegate, replying to a question, explained that applications for insurance did not fall under the category of agreements and would not require a stamp.

Bill for amending the Business Tax Law (sent up from Lower House).

Bill for amending the Agricultural and Industrial Banks Law (sent up from Lower House).

Bill for amending the Formosa Bank Law (sent up from Lower House).

Bill for amending the Soy Tax Law (sent up from Lower House).

Bill for amending the Postal Regulations (sent up from Lower House).

Bill for rendering assistance in arresting and detaining members of the crews of Foreign men-of-war (Gaikoku Awansen norikumi-in no taiho riuchi ni kwanansuru yonjo-ho-an). This Bill was introduced in accordance with the provisions of the Revised Treaties.

The House rose at 4 p.m.

TUESDAY, FEB. 14TH.

HOUSE OF PEERS.

The House met at 10.15 a.m., and passed the following Bills:—

Government Bill (sent up from the Representatives) for amending the Leaf Tobacco Monopoly Law in the sense of extending its provisions to imported tobacco.

Government Bill for the regulation of Strategic Zones at Fortified Places. A slight discussion took place with reference to this bill. Viscount Soga, presenting the Special Committee's Report, stated that the Committee, with the assent of the Government Delegate, recommended an amendment of the 9th Article, namely, the substitution of senpaku (vessel) for kwanan (ship), as the latter term would include foreign men-of-war. The Government Delegate, Capt. Saito, I.N., denied that he had given any such assent, upon which Viscount Soga became greatly excited, and asked whether Captain Saito intended to charge him with untruth. The House finally rejected the Committee's amendment of this Article, but adopted its other suggestions.

Government Bill (sent up from the Representatives) empowering the Treasury to have recourse to the foreign market, if convenient, for funds which, according to the Law now in operation, should be obtained by a domestic loan.

Government Bill (sent up from the Representatives) for the better protection of the aborigines of Hokkaido.

Government Bill for dispensing with the use of stamps (natsuin) by foreigners in civil cases, and for extending succour to foreign litigants.

Government Bill (sent up from the Representatives) for amending the Law of Registration of Immoveables.

Private Bill (sent up from the Representatives) for changing local boundaries in Ehime Prefecture.

The following Bills were handed to Special Committees:—

Private Bill (sent up from the Representatives) providing that lands on which the increased rate of national tax is levied shall be exempt, during the six-years' period of the levy, from communal taxation.

Private Bill for granting state aid to Urban and Prefectural Agricultural Experimental Stations. With regard to this Bill the Government Delegate said that, although its principle was not disapproved, the state of the finances forbade its operation until the fiscal year 1900-1.

The House rose at 1 p.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House met at 1 p.m.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM.

Mr. Hayakawa Rinsuke presented a Question on the subject of the control of religions. He spoke for half an hour, and his speech was evidently dictated by a conviction that, after the inauguration of mixed residence next July, some official machinery for the regulation of religious affairs will be necessary, as the attitude of Christianity towards the state is not in harmony with the principles of Japanese nationalism. What he desired to ascertain was the Government's practical interpretation of the limits set by the Constitution to freedom of conscience, namely, that its exercise must not be opposed to the discharge of a Japanese subject's duties or to the maintenance of peace and order.

THE POWERS OF THE POLICE.

A Question was also presented by Mr. Kagami Tsurumatsu with reference to the powers of the police. The title of the Question was "abuse of power by the police and trampling upon the rights of the people," and the incident on which he founded his query was that he had been summoned by the Fukagawa Police to attend at the station on the 10th instant, carrying with him a photograph of one Kikusawa, he himself being in the position of a third party in the case under examination, and being required only to give evidence. He desired to know whether such action fell within the legitimate competence of the police.

ELECTION CONTROL.

The House then received the Special Committee's Report on the Government's application for post facto approval of the Imperial Urgency Ordinance issued last year for the better control of elections. The Committee recommended that approval be withheld, not because the Ordinance was unnecessary at the time of its promulgation, but because its continued operation would be superfluous after the passage of the new Election Law now before the House. The Government Delegate opposed the Committee's decision, but the House endorsed it.

NATIONALIZATION.

The Second Reading of the Nationalization Law was then taken. Mr. Mochizuki moved that the 5th Article be amended, in the sense of eliding the provision which entitles a foreigner to obtain Japanese nationality by marriage with a woman registered as the head of a house. No such rule existed in any foreign country, and, in his opinion, its operation might lead to abuses. There was no obstacle to setting up an independent household in Japan. Parents need only to make a declaration that a daughter had left the paternal family and established a house of her own. Registration then made her a Koshu (head of a house), and in that capacity she could take to herself a foreigner as husband who would forthwith obtain Japanese nationality. An arrangement of that kind could always be effected in the interests of a foreigner provided that he were willing to pay for it, and the speaker judged that nationality thus obtained would not always be justified by the qualifications usually considered necessary. The better plan would be to provide that, as a general rule, the wife followed the husband's nationality, but, since special conditions existed in Japan, he suggested that a clause be added to Art. 18, empowering the wife to retain her family name and nationality if she so pleased. Under no circumstances, however, should the mere fact of marrying a Japanese woman entitle a foreigner to obtain Japanese nationality.

The Government Delegate opposed this amendment on the ground that it was a violation of the immemorial custom which attached special importance to the family in Japan. The absence of corresponding sanction in the laws of foreign countries meant simply that their customs were different.

The House nevertheless adopted the amendment, and also endorsed the recommendation of the Special Committee that the office of Minister Plenipotentiary be closed to foreigners who have obtained Japanese nationality.

COPYRIGHT.

The Government Bill (sent down from the Peers) embodying a project of Copyright Law, was then read and handed to a Special Committee, as was also a Government Bill providing for a Formosa Public Undertakings Loan of 40 million yen, for the building of railways, the improvement of harbours, the erection of offices, and the making of water-works.

DISCARDING THE RIN.

The House next passed the private Bill providing that, in making up taxation accounts, all fractions of a sen be omitted, any fraction equal to or greater than 5 rin being entered as 1 sen, and any fraction less than 5 rin being discarded. This rule is not to apply, however, to cases where the total payment is less than 5 rin, since, in such instances, to discard the amount altogether would be to deprive the tax-payer of his public rights.

PRIVATE BILLS.

The following two Bills were read and handed to Special Committees:—A private Bill for amending the Statutory Tariff in the sense of abolishing the duties on superphosphates for fertilizing purposes; and a private Bill for amending the Law of Technical Education in the sense of extending its provisions to marine products.

AN ANCIENT SHRINE.

A Representation was then adopted urging that State aid be given to the Aikiu Association in connexion with the Shrine of Take in Hiroshima. The Emperor Jimmu had his headquarters in the Aki District of Hiroshima for a space of seven years, while carrying on military operations against the eastern regions, and the shrine of Take, though dedicated to him, is only a prefectural, not a national, shrine. The Representation suggests that it be placed on the list of National Shrines.

The House rose at 3.45 p.m.

WEDNESDAY, FEB. 15TH.

HOUSE OF PEERS.

The House of Peers did not meet.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House of Representatives met at 1.15 p.m.

KOREAN TROUBLES.

Mr. Tominaga Hayata presented a Question with reference to the murder of 15 Japanese fishermen and the wounding of 8 others on the north-east coast of Korea in March, 1896. He described the incident, showing that the assassination had been deliberately planned by the Koreans, and that they had afterwards attempted to destroy the evidence of their deed by pouring kerosene over the corpses and burning them. The families of some of the sufferers had been left in a state of destitution. What steps had the Government taken to obtain redress or to succour the wives and children of the murdered men?

BUDGETARY MATTERS.

Two Supplementary Budgets for the fiscal year 1898-9; four budgets of expenditures already incurred in 1896-7, and four similar budgets for 1897-8, were then approved. The first of these measures contained an item of 300,000 yen for the suppression of bandits in Formosa, and Mr. Takagi Masatoshi animadverted in strong terms on the failure of the Government to establish order in the new dominion. He thought that the granting of the appropriation ought to be accompanied by some expression of the House's dissatisfaction, but his proposal found no support. Some discussion was also provoked in connexion with one of the extra budgets for 1897-8. It appeared that when the Government invited tenders for the construction of militia barracks in Hokkaido, no offers had been made, and the contractor to whom the work had been entrusted absconded without completing it, so that the War Department had to take it in hand and finish it without the aid of contract labour. A member moved the rejection of the budget on the ground that there must have been gross mismanagement, but the House rejected the motion.

HOKKAIDO ABORIGINES.

At the instance of Mr. Hoshi Toru, the House gave its consent to the amendments made by the Peers in the Bill for the better protection of the aborigines of Hokkaido, and then proceeded with the second Reading of the Amended Registration Law, which was passed with some changes suggested by Mr. Hoshi Toru.

PRIVATE BILLS AND OTHER MATTERS.

The following two (private) Bills were then passed:—

Bill for officially recognising Agricultural Associations, and granting an annual sum of 150,000 yen to aid them.

Bill for amending the Deep-sea Fishing Encouragement Law, in the sense of reducing the tonnage limit of vessels eligible for aid and increasing the scale of allowances.

The Special Committee reported favourably on the Representation for dispensing with students' fees in the case of Primary Schools, the Treasury to disburse the sum deducted from the income of the Schools.

Mr. Kudo Kokan, while approving of the Representation, pointed out that the amount involved was over 3 million yen, and that no source to provide the money was immediately available. He moved, therefore, that the Representation be amended so as to suggest, not the immediate, but the gradual, adoption of the desired step.

The House rejected the motion by a vote of 111 to 60, and adopted the Representation.

SERICULTURE.

A Representation was then read, and adopted, for establishing Sericultural Stations. Mr. Furuhata Momotaro introduced it in a speech the gist of which was that despite the leading place held by silk in the list of Japanese exports, the methods of sericulture left so much to be desired that the silk of France and Italy was far ahead of the Japanese article, and even China seemed likely to distance Japan. The plain truth was that American and French manufacturers now turned to Japanese silk as a pis-aller only. It was therefore of vital importance that resolute steps should be taken to effect some improvement of methods.

FERTILIZERS.

The following two Bills were then handed to Special Committee:—Bill providing for the Regulation of Fertilizers, which, owing to their greatly increased price, had become liable to adulteration, so that some system of inspection was necessary.

Bill for amending the Law relating to Stud Horses.

The House rose at 3.30 p.m.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 16TH.

THE HOUSE OF PEERS.

The House of Peers met at 10.15 a.m., but a quorum was not obtained until 10.45.

The following measures were passed:—

Two Government Bills (sent up from the Lower House) for granting State Aid to the Bank of Formosa, and allowing it to issue 1-yen notes.

Government Bill (sent up from the Lower House) for the regulation of Arms and Explosives. This Bill was passed as amended by the Representatives.

Government Bill (sent up from the Lower House) for amending the Business Tax Law, in the sense of dividing the capital of companies doing business abroad as well as in Japan, and imposing the tax on the capital involved in the Japan business only.

Private Bill (sent up from the Lower House) for abolishing the import duty on salt fish brought from Saghalien.

Private Bill (sent up from the Lower House) relating to responsibility for damage caused by conflagration.

These Bills having been passed, the Report of the Petitions Committee should have been considered, but the House was counted out at 12.15 p.m.

The House of Representatives did not meet.

CORRESPONDENCE.

A NEW WAY TO PAY HUMANITY'S OLD DEBTS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

SIR,—In the country where I was born at a time when the government was still administered as that of a republic, the march of progress is so rapid that the lessons of its past history are forgotten in a day. To the present generation the Civil War of forty years ago is scarcely more than a dream. That the stupendous conflict resulted in the enfranchisement of millions of slaves, and their investiture with the rights of citizenship, is a fact unheeded by the community which complacently tolerates the lawless barbarities now inflicted upon the race to which the boon of freedom was ostentatiously granted. The earlier war of independence has become so remote a tradition that a brief reference to what actually happened, and what might have happened, in the latter part of the last century, may perhaps supply wholesome food for reflection.

Inspired by generous sympathy with a noble principle, a few enthusiastic Frenchmen threw themselves, body and soul, into the American struggle for liberty. The Government of France also rendered substantial service from motives of practical policy,—recognizing that to support the rebellious colonists was to strike heavily at the enemy against whom it had long contended. A French naval armament was sent across the ocean, by whose co-operation the English were defeated and expelled, and the insurgents enabled to establish themselves as a self-ruling nation. That is what actually happened.

What might have happened is this. After contributing to the overthrow of the British arms, the Government of France might have composed its quarrel with England, and, impelled by lust and greed, enacted a treaty securing the cession of King George's nominal authority over the American territories to His Majesty Louis XVI. Then, repudiating every obligation of justice and honour, France might have dispatched forces too powerful for the enfeebled colonists to resist, and acquired, at least temporarily, a fine province in the Western hemisphere, together with a heritage of infamy that would have endured to all eternity.

If history had really taken this turn, it may be believed that the Americans, though stunned and bewildered by the unexpected blow, would have girded themselves anew for battle, and fought to the death for the liberty of which they had been robbed. And the heart of many an honest Frenchman would have gone out to them, charged with pity for their misfortune, and hopeful that the conscience of France might be aroused in time to save that country from irretrievable disgrace and shame.

E. H. HOUSE.

Tokio, February 11th, 1899.

MR. PFOUNDEN'S PROTESTS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

SIR,—I beg leave to claim space to protest against the statements in a paragraph, appearing in your issue of the 26th ultimo referring to me, and my efforts to organize a fitting reception for a gallant and distinguished visitor.

I have only just returned from a trip to the South Island on important urgent business; and my attention was called to the matter to-day.

I have already written to you, more than once, sending copies of extracts of correspondence with the noble officer, showing that I was merely assisting the Japanese, prior to the reception, &c., being taken up officially.

I most decidedly resent the repetition of the misrepresentation of yourself and your contemporaries, for I in no way presumed to act on behalf of any other foreign residents, nor have I represented myself as a "leader" amongst the alien community.

I was asked to serve on the Committee appointed at the public meeting of foreign residents convened by the Chamber of Commerce here, to arrange for the visit of His Imperial Majesty the Emperor of Japan; and I at first was diffident, but consented, when urged to assist with my experience, also acting as one of the special Sub-committees to draft the address to the Mikado. I was active, and prominent, especially in certain episodes connected therewith; and subsequently, when the Japanese wished to testify their spontaneous appreciation of the courtesy and enthusiasm of the foreign community, I had occasion to confer with many of the leading Japanese.

My action in Kobe, Osaka, and Kyoto, had no connection whatever with the foreigners, after I discovered, upon canvassing for support, that I would meet with opposition, in my attempt to have a wider circle interested in the gallant statesman's reception.

My letters already printed in your contemporaries, and the expresses I issued—copies of which I sent you—fully explain my position.

Your gratuitous and unsolicited advice needs no reply. I have been before the American and European higher class public ever since I contributed to your paper a quarter of century ago, lecturing, writing, &c., and it is not for you or your contemporaries to dictate to me in any way.

I am, &c.,

C. PFOUNDEN.

Kobe, February 9th, 1899.

THE POLICE AT THE GATES.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

SIR,—Referring to your editorial on "The Rule of the Road" the policeman made an exception with me, as, when entering the gate, though I was in the centre, he pointed for me to go to the left. I was on a bicycle and hence perhaps his extra care where I was concerned.

The rule is certainly an excellent one, as it is a wonder many serious accidents have not occurred there before.

Yours truly,

BICYCLE.

N.B.—The notice boards seen by me were only in Japanese.

Tokyo, Feb. 14th.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

In the Yokohama Chibo Saibansho, on Tuesday, Ah Poy, employed by Mr. A. Weston, was sentenced to two months' rigorous imprisonment on a charge of embezzlement.

Over 30 employees of the gas works, Shiba Tokyo, have a struck work for an increase of wages in view of the increased cost of living. Their proposals have been rejected.

A rice dealer named Matsura Matsusaburo (19), living at Sonexaki, Osaka, was arrested on the 15th charged with violating and afterwards murdering a girl named Fusa (12), living in the same street. He is now under examination at the Court.

In the Yokohama Chibo Saibansho on Wednesday morning, Sekiya Chojiro, an interpreter, was sentenced to two years' rigorous imprisonment and 6 months' police surveillance on a charge of forging a promissory note and attempting to obtain money on false pretences.

On Tuesday, at 4 p.m., a man named Daigo Yoneki (38), living at Iizabashi, attempted to murder his wife Tokuo (19), inflicting serious wounds on her head and face with a knife. The offender escaped, but was arrested the same night. The victim was quite unconscious when found, but has been restored under medical treatment. The cause of the crime appears to be jealousy.

At a certain bookbinding exhibition in London, two prizes were awarded to work sent in by a Miss Matthews. It was not for several weeks that it transpired that the prize winner really was the Princess Victoria of Wales, the fact having been carefully kept secret, not only from the judges at the exhibition, but also from the family of the prize-winner herself.

About 3 p.m. on the 15th, a thief stole a pair of gis from a house in Fukutomonicho Ichikawa, Yokohama, and was seen leaving by a man Tokutaro who happened to be passing. Tokutaro, pursued the thief, missed him, but a short time after met him again. He attempted to seize the man when the latter stabbed him with a dagger, and made good his escape. The victim was taken to the Isazakicho Police Station, and thence to the Yokohama Hospital. His injuries were very serious. The thief was brought to book the same night.

The Nagasaki Press says that the retrial of the prisoner Kelly for the murder of Gannon in Nagasaki, last year, has resulted in a verdict of manslaughter being returned, and the prisoner has been sentenced to seven years' imprisonment. At the original trial a verdict of wilful murder was given, the prisoner being sentenced to imprisonment for life.

Correspondents in a German newspaper have been discussing the meaning of the word "Chit." The consensus of opinion seemed to be that a chit in English was first used for children, a chit book was, therefore, a child's book. One correspondent differed, and the Editor seemed inclined to favour his views. They were that chit came from the Hindustani chitree—a letter—and that, therefore, a chit book was a letter book—that is, a book in which to copy letters.

The Daily Telegraph quotes a few examples of odd composition which reached the editor of a Vienna newspaper during 1893. The following sentences will show what that editor suffered:—

"Death trod with rough hand this tender blossom."

"The laurel wreath upon the head of Mr. Reimers has hit the right nail upon the head."

"The happy moment is not always seized to grasp the wheel of Time by the forelock."

"Grünenthal was born at Schladen in 1833, and up to this time had been unknown to the police."

The following appears in a Canadian paper:—There is a rumour that the Canadian Pacific Railway is to have opposition on the Coast; that another line of steamers is to be placed on the route between Vancouver and China, Japan, and Australia. The Peninsula and Oriental Steamship Company is named as the Company to compete with the Canadian Pacific for Pacific business. That Company, it is said, will place boats on within a year. It has already steamers running to China, Japan, and Australia, but not Pacific Coast points. The officials of the Canadian Pacific in Toronto have heard nothing of any such intention. Nor have the agencies out East.

A correspondent of the Daily News gives a diverting account of a visit he has just paid to Commandant Esterhazy in a small Dutch hotel. He spends most of the day smoking a pipe which the Dreyfusards have rendered historical, while under his window gathers a crowd of angry Hollanders hurling insulting epithets at the placid smoker. His seclusion is relieved by abusive letters and postcards which reach him from people who do not appreciate his services to the cause of Truth, and which he quoted to his interviewer with infinite gusto. Apparently he is undisturbed by threats of his foes, and continues to assert that the Jews are the greatest enemies of European progress.

The U.S. Naval Board of promotion is reported to have decided on a partial list of officers to be rewarded for their work during the war. Ensigns H. H. Ward and W. W. Buck, who served as spies, are to be favoured, as are the following officers of Admiral Dewey's fleet: Lieut.-Com. C. P. Rees and Chief Engineer James Entwistle of the Olympia; Lieutenant W. P. Elliot and Chief Engineer J. D. Ford of the Baltimore; Lieutenant-Commander J. A. Norris and Chief Engineer Richard Luch of the Boston; Lieutenant-Commander G. P. Colvocaresse and Chief Engineer G. B. Ransom of the Concord; Lieutenant E. M. Hughes and Passed Assistant Engineer R. T. Hall of the Petrel; Lieutenant-Commander Frederic Singer and Chief Engineer F. H. Bailey of the Raleigh.

THE BOOKSHELF.

A Fleet in Being, by RUDYARD KIPLING; London, Macmillan & Co.; Yokohama, Messrs. Kelly & Walsh.

Every Britisher who has any interest in the Fleet—and who among the residents in the Far East has not?—will be grateful to Messrs. Macmillan for reprinting in a cheap and handy form the articles contributed by Mr. Rudyard Kipling to the Morning Post in the autumn of 1898. In a few masterly pen pictures Kipling brings vividly home to his readers how life is spent on board one of Her Majesty's ships of war. Dwellers in these lands afar have many opportunities of seeing and visiting the British China and Japan Squadron and many can recall pleasant nights and days spent aboard as honoured guests of the wardroom, and eke the gun-room, of these serviceable craft. To them, therefore, even more than to the greater public at home, will the fidelity of the writing appeal. What can be truer to life than the following story, which is headed DISCONTENTED AND IMPENITENT THIEVES.

Our cruiser was about to visit some Dockyard or other in a few days, and I gathered that it would be no fault of the Captain, the Wardroom, or the Warrant Officers if she did not arrive with a list of alterations and improvements as long as her mainmast. So it is with every new ship.

She never gets more than half what she wants, and so is careful to apply for thrice her needs.

To her first and picturesque demands the Yard opposes the suspicion of Centuries, saying, unofficially, "You are all a set of discontented and impenitent thieves. Go away." The ship, considering her own comfort and well-being for the rest of the commission, replies, also unofficially: "Ah, you're thinking of the Soudan-so. She was a nest of pirates if you like; but we're good. We're the most upright ship you ever clapped eyes on, and you're the finest Yard in the kingdom. You're up to all the ropes. There's no getting round you—and you'll pass our indents. We won't give you any trouble. Just a few minor repairs, and our own people will carry them out. Don't disturb yourself in the least. Send the stuff alongside and we'll attend to it."

And when the stuff comes alongside in charge of a slow-minded under-strapper they do attend to it. They talk the man blind and dumb, sack his cargoes, and turn him adrift to study vouchers at his leisure. Then the first Lieutenant grins like a Cheshire cat; the carpenter, so-called because he very rarely deals with wood, the armourer and the first-class artificers sweat with joy, and the workshop lathes buzz and hum.

But the understrapper gets particular beans because a great part of his stuff was meant for another ship and she is very angry about it.

Late in the afternoon the defrauded vessel sends a boat over to the Early Bird and wants to know if she has seen or heard anything of some oak baulks, a new gangway grating, some brass-work, and a few drums of white paint.

"Why, was that yours?" says the first Lieutenant. "We thought it was ours."

"Well, it isn't; it's ours. Where is it?"

"I'm awfully sorry, but—I say, won't you come and have a drink?"

They come—just in time to see the brass rods in position. Then they call the first Lieutenant a pirate, and he, poor lamb, says that he was misled by the chuckle-headed understrapper who brought the stuff alongside. Words cannot express the first Lieutenant's contention. It is too bad, too bad; but "you know what asses these Dockyard chaps can be."

With soft words and occasional gins-and-bitters he coaxes the visitors into their boat again, for he has studied diplomacy under West African Kings. They return to their own place, being young and guileless, and their reception is not cordial. Their Captain says openly that he has not an adequate thief in the ship, and that they had better go into the Church. They should have captured the understrapper early in the day. He will speak to the other Captain. And he does, like a brother, next time he meets him, galley passing galley, going to call on the Admiral.

We hope Messrs. Kelly and Walsh have a large stock of this most interesting volume: we feel sure they will need them to meet the demand that must spring up. The page is the same size as the well-known Colonial library book; the type is fine and clear; the cover, however, might have been stouter with advantage.

INTERPORT FOOTBALL MATCH.

YOKOHAMA V. KOBE.

Yokohama had an easy victory over Kobe on Saturday afternoon. The visitors had brought up a very fair team, but were somewhat weak in their forward combination, though smart pieces of individual play were seen. The Yokohama team worked together capitally, and in the first half had things entirely their own way, scoring no fewer than five goals. But for the smartness of the Kobe custodian, Meek, who kept goal extremely well, the score would have been even larger. In the second half, Kobe played up better, though one of their two goals was gained in rather an unsatisfactory manner. Of the home forwards, Drummond, Moss, and Kilby perhaps showed up best; and Lias was good at full back. Gillingham, Wilkinson, Braess, and Page did good work for Kobe.

There was a pretty large attendance at the commencement of the play, many ladies being present, tempted, no doubt, by the genial sunshine. The teams lined up as follows:—

K.R. & A.C.	Goal.	Y.C. & A.C.
R. W. Meek.		A Kingdom.
J. R. Gillingham.	Backs.	P. J. Lias.
W. Braess.		G. C. Alcock.
S. Revell.		D. Weed.
M. Gillingham.	Half-backs.	J. S. Forest.
J. Thompson.		E. Freckley.
W. N. Page (outside).	Right-wing.	K. Van R. Smith.
L. S. Hudson (inside).		J. Drummond.
C. H. Lightfoot (C. & T.)	Centre.	H. R. Meir.
F. E. Wilkinson (outside).	Left wing.	J. E. Moss.
E. T. Bethel (inside).		E. W. Kilby.

The Referee was Mr. P. Gillett, and the linesmen Messrs. F. J. Hall and H. S. Goddard.

Kobe won the toss, and elected to take the pavilion end, Yokohama thus having the disadvantage of the sun in their eyes during the first half. The light breeze was across the ground. From the kick-off play quickly settled down into the visitors' territory, and within five minutes of the start Forrest, getting possession, made a rush up the field, and passed to Moss, who put the ball through, scoring the first goal. From the kick-off the ball was again forced into the Kobe territory; Fradgely getting possession, and passing to Smith, who, however, failed to take advantage. Lightfoot kicked behind, and a corner was conceded to Yokohama. Fradgely taking the kick shortly after Kilby got possession, made a neat pass to Drummond, who sent the ball into the net, scoring the second point for the home team. Shortly after restarting Lightfoot kicked the ball behind, and from the kick Forrest made a shot at goal, but Meek saved brilliantly. Another penalty kick for Yokohama resulted shortly afterwards, but no advantage came from it, but the home-keepers were all the while swarming round the Kobe ciadel, and Meek had to save again and again. At length, from a corner, Mair put on a wain shot, which Meek returned, but the ball rebounded to Mair, who this time put it through, making the third goal for Yokohama. The home team again pressed, but the Kobe forwards broke away, and for a short time the ball was in the Yokohama territory, but play was soon transferred once more to their end, and Fradgely passed to Moss, who sent in a short which missed its mark. Wilkinson, on the left wing, then got away, but Kilby and Moss, by some clever passing, got the leather one again into Kobe's half, and the latter shot at goal, but Meek repulsed the attack. Lightfoot soon after secured possession, and passed to Wilkinson, and the play was transferred to the home end, Wilkinson making a fine attempt at goal, but Kingdon, who had been a long time idle, saved. A return was once more made to the visitors' quarters, and from a centre by Smith Moss headed into goal—but Meek was not caught napping. Immediately after Drummond put in another shot, but the ball went outside the post, and a fine long shot by Kilby just afterwards was saved by the Kobe goal keeper. Hudson secured and made a rush for the home goal, but Lias got the ball away from him and returned it to Kilby, who made two successive shots at goal. Forrest had no easy chance from a pass by Drummond, but missed his shot. Another rush by Kobe was stopped, and Kilby then got hold of the leather, and passed to Drummond, who shot wide. Kilby, however, got hold of the leather again, and sent in a hot shot, which beat Meek, this being the fourth goal. From the kick-off the visitors went away, but the ball was soon once more Kobe's territory, and several shots were made at goal, Mair at last making the ball in. The visitors' goal was bombarded constantly the remaining few minutes of the first half, and several close shots were made, but further point was added, and the whistle blew with the score:—

Yokohama 5 goals
Kobe none.

On resuming Yokohama again pressed, but shortly after Page, Lightfoot, and Bethell, working together, got the ball into the home quarter, and the latter made a shot at goal, which, however, failed. The Kobe end was again visited, but from a corner kick Page and Hudson secured for Kobe, and went away for the home half, passing to Bethell, who shot for goal. The ball would probably have gone wide, but it touched Forrest, and landed into the net, giving Kobe their first point. Yokohama pressed on the ball being once more set in motion, Moss, Forrest, Kilby, and Smith all doing good work. Forrest was charged by Lightfoot, and placed hors de combat for a moment, but went on playing after a minute or two's rest. At length, Hudson, Page, and Lightfoot got possession for the visitors, and ran the ball up to the home end, where Lightfoot beat Kingdon. Some give and take play followed. Moss and Drummond made two long shots for goal, and the latter soon after put in a third, which Meek saved. Both Moss and Mair, however, were close on the ball, and between them they scrambled it through, scoring Yokohama's sixth goal. Kobe were on their mettle, and played up well, making several attempts, to invade the home goal, but they were frustrated and no further point was scored on either side till twelve minutes before time, when Lias by a fine kick took the ball from Page, and Drummond, securing it, passed to Mair, who scored. Nothing further resulted and the game ended:—

Yokohama 7 goals.
Kobe 2.

Three cheers were given for the Kobe eleven, who returned the salute. The Town Band played selections of music during the afternoon.

THE DINNER.

In the evening the two teams and supporters of the Club dined together at the Club Hotel, where a most excellent repast was placed on the tables by Mr. Sioen. Mr. J. P. Mollison, the amiable president of the Yokohama Cricket and Athletic Club, was in the chair, and was supported by Messrs. F. J. Lias, F. E. White, C. H. Lightfoot (Captain of the Kobe team), C. H. Blake, and F. E. Wilkinson.

After the dinner the usual loyal toasts were submitted by the CHAIRMAN, who afterwards proposed "Our Kobe Visitors." He said he need hardly say that it gave him the greatest gratification to preside once more at the interport football dinner and to find himself supported by so many supporters of that glorious game. He was very grateful to have that opportunity to extend a hand of welcome to their Kobe friends, and to express the great pleasure it had given them to see them playing up with that pluck and determination that was characteristic of them. (Hear hear.) Without these interport matches he was afraid the interest in the game would languish—"No";—at any rate there was a falling off of those who attended practice matches until the interport match was within sight, and then the interest revived. He hoped these matches would long continue to be annual fixtures bringing the two ports together in mutual sympathy. He desired to pay a tribute to the energy and enthusiasm of the younger players for Yokohama, which he thought were deserving of all praise. Without them Yokohama to-day would have had a very poor showing. They were the backbone of the Club, they were what the Club had to look forward to in the future, and he (the Chairman) was glad to see so many of them finding a place in the team that day.—(Applause.) For Yokohama it was a very interesting game.—(Laughter and applause.) It only remained for him to congratulate the winners, and to offer his sympathy to the losers, at the same time recognising the pluck with which they played what he saw from the first was an up-hill game. He had no doubt they would do their best to reverse the verdict next year.

Mr. LIGHTFOOT, whose name was coupled with the toast, said one of the pleasures of coming to Yokohama, whether for football, cricket, baseball, or anything else, was to see the face of Mr. Mollison at the head of the table at dinner afterwards.—(Applause.) With regard to the game that day he was not going to have anything to say about it.—(Laughter)—except to congratulate Mr. Lias on having been successful in putting such a formidable eleven in the field. It was an eleven it would be difficult to beat anywhere in the East—in every part of the game. He did not know, however, about the goal-keeper; Mr. Kingdon did not have the chance of showing himself.—(a voice: "What about Meek?"). Oh, he was all right.—(Laughter). He expressed the thanks of Kobe to Mr. Gillett for his kindness in umpiring and for the admirable way in which he fulfilled his duties. In conclusion the speaker proposed "The Health and Prosperity of the Y. C. and C." coupled with the name of Mr. Lias, the Captain.

Mr. Lias, responding said it had given them the greatest possible pleasure to beat Kobe so handsomely as they had done.—(A voice: "Don't rub it in.") They were fighting against heavy odds. Several of their players were laid up, and two of their players were seriously unwell as the result of other games.—(Laughter.) He was sure those players had their hearty sympathy.—(Laughter.)

The other toasts were "The Referees, Linesmen, and all who have kindly assisted," proposed by Mr. T. S. FORREST, and responded to by Mr. HALL, in the absence of Mr. Gillett; "The Ladies," proposed by Mr. C. M. DUFF and championed by Mr. E. W. KILBY; and "The Press," proposed by Mr. B. H. PEARSON, and acknowledged by Mr. R. HAY.

Songs were given by the Chairman, Messrs. E. T. Bethell, H. Sharp, G. Middleton, H. E. Hayward, Hudson, etc.

THE BERRICK BANTO CASE.

JUDGMENT IN THE SAIBANSUO.

The Chiba Saibansho on Wednesday resumed the hearing of the charge against Narumo Kenjiro, formerly head banto of Messrs. Berrick Bros., No. 75, Settlement, of forging the name and stamp of the firm.

Kimura Noboru, of the Kimura Shoten, was called, and deposed to having business relations with Messrs. Berrick Bros. The latter made frequent failures in executing orders, and witness thought this was due to some financial trouble experienced by the London office of the firm. Finally witness was compelled to make an agreement with Berrick Bros. in the presence of Mr. L. Berrick, Mr. George Rice, Manager of the firm, and Narumo Kenjiro, the accused, for the reduction of a quantity of goods ordered to a half for the convenience of Berrick Bros. Simultaneously with the conclusion of the new agreement he proposed that the sum of yen 2,000 should be paid by the firm in case of another failure to execute orders. The proposal was agreed to by the firm. It was on June 9th that the agreement was concluded between both parties. But no cargo was to be delivered even after the conclusion of the new agreement. It was stated by Narumo, but not to Berrick, that the quantity ordered should be halved for the sake of the firm, orders for another half being placed with the London shippers direct. Witness was acting as the sole agent for Berrick Bros., London, through the Yokohama Branch, but at present he was carrying on the business direct with Berrick Bros. of London. It was from June last that witness had to place orders direct with the London shippers. Some time last year, when he was in Osaka, he received a telegram from Narumo asking him to come back to Yokohama, but he could not do so. Narumo came to Osaka himself and asked witness to apply to a bank on behalf of the firm in order to induce the bank to issue a letter of credit, as Berrick Bros. were unable to obtain it from either the Foreign or Japanese banks. Witness told him (Narumo) that it would cause him great trouble, but he would try his best after coming back to Tokyo. He had a consultation with a bank which consented to issue the letter of credit, and so was ready to do so if wanted. But in the meantime, he heard various rumours about the credit of Berrick Bros. and accordingly did not do so. The bank referred to was the Tooh Bank, Berrick Bros. were unable to comply with the agreement, though the quantity ordered was reduced one half.

L. Berrick, sworn, said he was a British subject, and came to Japan in May last. He denied that the firm was in financial straits at the time of the alleged commission to Narumo, though the firm felt some trouble caused by the non-delivery of the goods which were coming in excess and lying in accumulation in different godowns in Yokohama, so much so that witness made up his mind to diminish their import business. This was because delivery had not taken place in proportion to the arrival of the goods, and not on account of financial difficulties. They were not short of money, but were simply importing too much. He had never heard of a letter despatched by witness to the Ofi Paper Mill asking for the transfer of orders to the Toyo Shokwai after May 2nd last. With regard to a letter sent by Mr. George Rice, former Manager of Berrick Bros., reporting the transfer of business to the Toyo Shokwai, witness explained that the Mill referred to was not working for many months, and could not take delivery of the goods as promised, when the Toyo Shokwai proposed to take delivery of the goods ordered by the Mill on Berrick Brothers' behalf—in order to relieve the latter from the difficulty. The Toyo Shokwai had to pay for the goods instead of the Mill on a small commission. Witness did not know if they could make any profit or not.

Barrister Yano—Were you compelled to transfer the sole agency for W. D. and H. O. Wills, to the hands of the Kimura Shoten owing to the difficulty experienced in executing orders placed by Kimura Noboru?—I only told Mr. Kimura that he should place orders direct with any tobacco company.

Various office books of Messrs. Berrick Bros. were produced.

The Procurator submitted that there was a lack of evidence against the accused, and the Judges, after a few minutes' retirement, returned with a verdict of acquittal.

THE DREYFUS CASE.

THE CHARGES AGAINST JUDGES.

London, Feb. 9.

It is understood that the report of the supplementary inquiry completely exonerates the Judges of the Court of Cassation from the charges made by M. Beaurepaire, which are said to have been based on exaggerated inferences of excited witnesses and the gossip of underlings.

London, Feb. 10.

Yesterday's version of the Committee's report with reference to M. Beaurepaire's charges against the Judges of the Criminal Section of the Court of Cassation is con-firmly; nevertheless the Government insists on the passing of the Dreyfus Bill to transfer the decision from the Criminal Section to the full Court of Cassation.

London, Feb. 13.

Despite the Committee's rejection, the Chamber of Deputies has adopted the Dreyfus Bill by 332 against 316.

London, Feb. 14.

The French Senate has referred the Dreyfus Bill to a Committee.

THE CHINA QUESTION.

SPEECHES IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

London, Feb. 9.

In the debate on the Address in the House of Commons, Mr. St. John Brodrick (Secretary to the War Office) said he anticipated great results from the opening of Nanning-fu on the West River, and deprecated the exhibition of hostility and jealousy towards other Powers.

Sir Edward Grey (Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs in the last Liberal Administration) welcomed the declaration by the Government of its desire to avoid territorial expansion in China, and advocated a candid understanding with Russia as obviating difficulties which have occurred in the past.

THE RITUALISTIC CONTROVERSY IN ENGLAND.

AN AMENDMENT TO THE ADDRESS.

London, Feb. 10.

An amendment to the Address in reply to the Queen's Speech has been moved by Mr. Samuel Smith (Liberal member for Flintshire), demanding legislation to secure the obedience of the Ritualists to the law, has been rejected by the Commons by a majority of 221 to 89 votes.

The Right Hon. A. J. Balfour (First Lord of the Treasury and Leader of the House of Commons) admitted that there were certain excesses committed by the Ritualists, but urged the House to leave the matter in the hands of the Bishops until the impotence of the latter was proved.

MCKINLEY SIGNS PEACE TREATY.

London, Feb. 13.

President McKinley has signed the Treaty of Peace.

SAMOA.

AMERICA PROTESTS AGAINST GERMANY.

The American Ambassador at Berlin has protested strongly against the conduct of the Germans over the Samoan affair.

GERMANY AND THE PHILIPPINES.

Herr von Bulow, Minister for Foreign Affairs, speaking in the Reichstag, has repudiated any designs over the Philippines attributed to Germany, and said that the Filipinos were receiving no kind of German support. He believed that German and American interests would clash nowhere in future.

THE ANDRE EXPEDITION.

EXPLORERS' REMAINS REPORTED FOUND.

A circumstantial report states that the remains of Prof. André and his comrades have been found besides the balloon in Northern Siberia.

ANGLO-FRENCH AGREEMENTS.

FRANCE TO HAVE OUTLET ON THE NILE.

London, Feb. 14.

Apparently a semi-official note from Paris states that agreements between Great Britain and France are imminent, granting France a commercial outlet on the Nile and settling broad outlines of delimitation respecting the spheres of the regions of Bahr el Ghazal and Ubanghi.

GEN. MILES CENSURED.

A Washington report states that the Commission of Enquiry into the conduct of the late war censures General Miles for charging the commissariat with supplying bad beef.

TERRIBLE WEATHER.

GALES IN NORTH AMERICA AND ENGLAND.

A CUNARD LINER TWO WEEKS OVERDUE.

London, Feb. 14.

Continual gales have swept over Great Britain, and many wrecks are reported. A tidal wave has been experienced, and floods have occurred.

The Cunard steamer Pavonia is now a fortnight overdue. She was last reported helpless and drifting.

A blizzard and unprecedented cold have been experienced in America, and the usual weekly steamers from Europe have not arrived.

[The gross tonnage of the Pavonia is 5,587, and her horse-power 4,000. She was built in 1882.]

THE DEFENCE OF WEI-HAI-WEI.

STATEMENT BY MR. GOSCHEN.

London, Feb. 14.

The Rt. Hon. G. J. Goschen (First Lord of the Admiralty) has stated that the question of the defence of Wei-hai-wei is far advanced towards a settlement, and the proposals relating thereto will be submitted to Parliament.

(FROM THE "HONGKONG TELEGRAPH.")

THE SITUATION AT MANILA: AN IMPORTANT CAPTURE.

Manila, February 8.

Aguinaldo's captain-general and private secretary have been taken prisoners.

THE WATERWORKS TAKEN.

The Americans have captured the Manila waterworks.

PROPOSED NEGOTIATIONS.

Aguinaldo proposed a cessation of hostilities with a view to opening negotiations, but General Otis refused to entertain the proposition.

THE FIGHTING CONTINUES.

Desultory firing continues, but the Filipinos avoid an encounter. A large number of Filipinos have been taken prisoners.

THE RISING THAT FAILED.

The arrangements for the Filipino rising in the town of Manila have entirely collapsed.

Notes (abridged) by Emil Kemeny.

(a) In the fourth game of the match Showalter played P to Q3. The text move is much superior, and leads to a better development.

(b) B takes Q Kt, followed by P takes P, would have weakened the adverse Pawns, but Black, by playing B to R3 and eventually R to Q sq. ob.

tains a splendid development. The move adopted is better.

(c) Necessary, since Black threatened Kt takes Q P, followed eventually by B takes B.

(d) Better than B takes Kt.

(e) P to Q R 3 would have stopped the adverse Kt from entering at Kt 5. It would, however, have enabled White to play Kt to B 4.

(f) The text play gives good attacking chances on the King's side.

(g) More promising was R to Kt 4 or B to Q 5. Black should have endeavoured to win the adverse Q P.

(h) B takes Kt would have been rather risky. White answers R takes B ch, R to K 4 and R to Q 6, winning the Q P.

(i) An ingenious move. Black can not well answer R takes P, for White continues R takes Kt P, threatening R takes P ch, as well as R to Kt 2, winning the Bishop.

Notes (abridged) by Emil Kemeny.

(h) Better, perhaps, was B to Q 3. By moving the Bishop to Kt 3 White somewhat blocks the Queen's wing.

(c) He could not play P to K 4 on account of P to Kt 5, followed by winning of a Pawn.

(d) White had no time for a preparatory move like B to R 2. He should have played P to K 4, in order to shut out the adverse Q B, as well as to give his own Q B some development.

(e) P to K 4 was still in order. The move selected compromises White's game.

(f) B to B 3 followed eventually by B takes Kt was more likely to free White's game.

(g) Better was Kt to Q B 3. The Kt at K 5 was well placed for defensive purposes.

(h) Pretty nearly forced, since Kt takes Kt ch, Q takes Q, Kt to Kt 4, followed by Kt takes P ch, was threatening.

(i) A serious oversight, which loses at once. White should have played Q to B sq, guarding the K Kt P. His game was badly compromised, yet it was not a hopeless one.

THE STRONGEST TEN PLAYERS.

(By G. Reichel in the American Chess Magazine.)

Who are the strongest ten players of to-day, and in what order of strength should they be placed? The query will here be answered by figures, which, they say, "never lie."

For this purpose the latest epoch of play, starting with the Hastings Congress of 1895, and following with the St. Petersburg, Nürnberg, Buda Pesth, Berlin, Vienna, and Cologne tournaments, can alone be pertinently reviewed, and taking the seven events as a whole, I find that the best ten percentages of wins to be in the following order:—

	Tour- neys.	Wins.	Losses.	Per cent.
E. Lasker	III.	40½	16½	71.05
S. Tarrasch	IV.	63	29	68.47
H. N. Pillsbury	V.	74	36	67.27
R. Charousek	IV.	43	25	63.23
W. Steinitz	V.	67½	41½	61.92
D. Janowski	VI.	74½	47½	61.06
M. Tchigorin	VII.	86	58	59.72
A. Burn	IV.	54	38	58.69
C. Schlechter	VI.	71½	50½	58.60
G. Maroczy	III.	38	29	56.71

On the restricted basis of the ten players between themselves the order is:—

	Wins.	Losses.	Per cent.
S. Tarrasch	24½	14½	62.82
E. Lasker	20½	12½	62.12
D. Janowski	22½	21½	51.13
H. N. Pillsbury	29	28	50.87
C. Schlechter	22	22	50.00
R. Charousek	13	14	48.14
W. Steinitz	24½	27½	47.11
M. Tchigorin	29½	36½	44.69
G. Maroczy	12½	15½	44.64
A. Burn	12	18	40.00

These figures have at least the merit of presenting the subject of chess strength in a new light.

GAME No. 480.

LASKER'S CHESS.

Considerable curiosity is manifested in Chess-circles as to what kind of Chess the Champion will play after his long self-enforced recess. From the recent games that have appeared, it is quite evident that he has not lost any of his skill and cunning. They all reveal the "Master-hand," the wonderful nicety of position-play, and the subtlety of combination in which, probably, he excels all living masters. The following game in one of a number played simultaneously:—

CENTEN GAMBIT.

White—Lasker.		Black—Amateur.
WHITE.	BLACK.	WHITE.	BLACK.
1 P K 4	P K 4	14 P B 4	Kt x Q P
2 P Q 4	P x P	15 P B 5	Kt x Kt
3 Kt K B 3	Kt Q B 3	16 P x Kt	K K-q
4 B Q B 4	P Q 3	17 Kt x Pch	W Q-q
5 P B 3	B K 3	18 Q R 5	Kt K 5
6 B x B	P x B	19 B R 4	P K R 3
7 P x P	Q Q 3	20 Castles	B x B
8 P Q 5	P x P	21 Q x Bch	Kt K 4
9 P x P	Q Kt K 2	22 R B 7	Q B 3
10 Kt B 3	Kt K B 3	23 Kt K 6ch	K K-q
11 B K 5	Kt K 3	24 R K 5q	Q K 3ch
12 Kt Q 4	B K 2	25 K R 5q	K x R
13 Kt K 6	K B 3	26 P x Kt	K x P

And White announced mate in six moves as follows:—

27—Kt to Q 5 ch, Q R takes Kt; 28—Q to K 7 ch, K to Kt 3; 29—R to K 6 ch, K to R 4; 30—Q to B 7 ch, K to Kt 4; 31—Q to Kt 6 ch, K to B 5; 32—R to K 4 mate.

THE MODERN SCHOOL.

The following amusing verses are from the pen of Mr. Black, the champion of the Glasgow Chess Club. They appear in the British Chess Magazine.

I sing the praises of the Modern School,
The pond'rous reign of routine, rote, and rule,
The "French Defence," and if she wants con-art,
The "Ruy Lopez," "Queen's," and "Zukertort."
The Alphanumeric Automatic game
For arts mechanical wide spread the fame;
Content to win by letting others love,
And innocent of stratagem or ruse,
Of elegance or beauty, art or grace,
Annihilating every sign and trace,
Timorous and slow, dull, gross, and leaden,
Alert alone to petty and deaden.

Crush out all poetry, imagination,
Above all things to damn, a "Combination."
Stuffed with book lore and sham vitality,
Swollen with others' originality,
Well suited for degenerate sordid days,
When everything is gauged by how it pays,
For pot hunters and petty money grabs,
For dry-as-dust, wood shiflers, mental drabs!

Peace to all such! but let it still be ours,
To woo our Goddess in Arcadian bowers,
Her brow adorn with chaplets of choice flowers,
Or scale for her Olympian heights and towers,
For her weave garlands of poetic fire,
To higher flights advance, and still aspire;
No prize we need our ardour to inflame,
"We fight for honour and we fight for fame."

NOTES.

Janowski has challenged Pillsbury, the chess champion of the United States, for a match for $1,500 a side.

Lasker has visited Bristol, Cheltenham, Birmingham, Manchester, Ealing, &c. His system is to engage a large hall and charge for admission, taking 25 or more opponents at once. But according to reports, from Birmingham in particular and Bristol, many games were left unfinished. The object seems to be to give a display of steady chess, rather than to bring the games to a definite conclusion, even after four hours' play.

The Philadelphia Times is responsible for the story that comes from Germany, that two young artists were infatuated by the charms of the same maiden, and neither was given more ground for hope than his rival. The spoil clearly would fall to the lot of one or the other; and as each was a skilful Chess player, they decided to put their fates to the test of Pawns and Castles. The fateful game was played without a spectator at the Kaiserhoff Restaurant, and after a long and exciting struggle one rival succeeded in checkmating the other. The defeated player rose from the table and betook himself to France, where news reached him that the man who had "mated" him was himself more happily mated in Berlin.

By the resignation of its Secretary the Singapore Chess Club loses a valuable officer in Mr. J. B. Elcum, who is about to proceed to Europe on leave. Mr. Elcum says the Singapore Free Press, has proved a zealous, untiring and popular official, has done much to advance the interests of the Club, and it will not be an easy matter to supply his place.

IMPORTS.

The market generally is still in an unsatisfactory state of inactivity. Forward sales of grey shirtings made some time ago are now in evidence, but there is no demand for spot goods. There is slightly more demand for fancy cottons and woollens, but prices show no advance. Small sales of woollens, and cotton Italians have taken place at low prices.

PRESIDENT McKINLEY is suffering from fatigue as a result of overwork.

THE House of Peers has passed the second reading of the Copyright Law.

A new political party, under the title of the Kokuren-se, has been established.

THE death is announced of Count Leo von Caprivi, late German Chancellor.

THE death is announced of Mrs. Paul Ritter, wife of the Swiss Consul General.

A TELEGRAM from Formosa states that 3 cases of plague have appeared in Tainan.

In the middle of March, the Standing Squadron will engage in manoeuvres in Bungo Strait.

A WASHINGTON despatch says that the Senate has ratified the Peace Treaty by a majority of three.

THE Right Hon. Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman has been elected leader of the English Liberal party.

THE House of Peers has adopted a Representation in favour of the improvement of national education.

On Monday Miss Elsie Johnstone was married at Christ Church to Mr. James Leslie Robertson, of Kobe.

THE Bill extending the Government monopoly to imported tobacco has been read a second time in the House of Peers.

At a conference, the Premiers of the Australian colonies have settled all the disputed points regarding the federation scheme.

THE funeral of Mr. Otto Keil on Saturday was a most impressive ceremony. It was performed according to the Scottish Rite of Masonry.

MR. ONIWA CHOBEI and some other merchants of Osaka are promoting a Japan-Korean Bank in Seoul. The capital is to be yen 3,000,000.

A GENERAL assembly of tea traders throughout the country is to be held on the 20th inst. at the Department of Agriculture and Commerce.

At the half-yearly meeting of shareholders in Langfeldt and Co., Limited, a dividend was declared for the half year of yen 7.50 per share.

THE annual meeting of the Yokohama Fire Brigade was held on Thursday afternoon. The accounts showed a substantial increase of subscriptions.

A ROBBER armed with a large fish-knife entered the house of a pawn broker named Ota Jihei, Sugatami-cho, Yokohama, and stole a small sum of money.

A VOTE in the House of Peers on the Bill organizing Associations of Medical Men resulted adversely to the measure, the figures being 121 against and 38 for.

A BILL making very important alterations in the law of election and greatly extending the franchise has been referred to a Special Committee of the House of Representatives.

THE promoters of the new political party have established their office at No. 26, Uneme-cho, Kyobashi, Tokyo. They held a meeting on the 10th inst. to discuss the preparations for the ceremony of inauguration.

ACCORDING to Japanese official investigations made at the end of December there are 1,109 males, and 867 females residing in Seoul, Korea. They occupy 480 houses.

THE death is announced of Prince Alfred, son Duke of Saxe-Gotha, and not, as erroneously reported, the Duke of Coburg, better known as the Duke of Edinburgh, himself.

A BILL enabling foreigners to dispense with the use of seals (natsu in) in legal documents and giving them rights in forma pauperis has been read the first time in the House of Peers.

THE property of the Yamato Industrial Bank was confiscated on the 7th by the Liquidator of the Seiya Railway Company. The Bank was unable to pay a debt of yen 10,000.

It is reported that the new cruiser Chitose, which has been constructed at San Francisco, is to leave about the 10th proximo for home, and is expected to arrive at the commencement of April.

It is reported that the Korean Government intends to establish a Central Bank with a capital of yen 2,000,000, and to employ a foreign banker as adviser. The scheme is for the manipulation of the customs revenues, local taxes, &c.

A TELEGRAM from Havana says that Gen. Gomez has cabled to President McKinley assuring his co-operation in disbanding Cuban soldiers and in distributing the three million dollars offered by America to enable them to return to their homes.

THE launch of the Taigen Maru, the new steamer built for the Osaka Shosen Kaisha, at the Kawasaki Yard, was to have taken place on Saturday, but owing to a hitch the vessel was unable to leave the stocks. The christening ceremony, however, took place.

THE Committee of the French Chamber of Deputies appointed to investigate Judge Mazeau's report on the Beaupre charge of partiality has rejected it on the ground that it is not convincing. The Government has ordered a supplementary enquiry.

THE Queen's speech at the opening of Parliament states that the Queen's Government gladly participates in the conference summoned by the Emperor to consider the possibility of limiting the burdensome armaments, although unable to concur in all the resolutions concerning the proposed "anarchist conference." The speech announces the Government's Bills regarding measures dealing with education, and enabling workmen to purchase dwellings.

MR. HARA ZENZABURO, a wealthy Yokohama merchant, has died of consumption. He is said to have contributed yen 10,000 to the Imperial University, yen 10,000 to seven Primary Schools in Yokohama, yen 4,000 to the Commercial School, and yen 3,000 each to the Academy and the Normal School.

HOSTILITIES have begun between the Americans and Filipinos. An attack was made by the latter on Sunday, but they were defeated with heavy loss. Retter speaks of 14 hours of severe fighting in Manila since the 25th. The Americans carried two positions and advanced their lines, losing twenty killed and 125 wounded in so doing. The Filipino loss was heavy. The Washington Cabinet has decided on a vigorous offensive attack on Iloilo and on making endeavours to capture the Filipino Government of Malolos.

THE POLITICAL PARTIES.

February 6th.

It appears that a considerable section of the Progressists have determined to adopt a course which, though it has the advantage of being logical, is thought likely to cause a split in the ranks of the Party. They maintain that, in order to be rational and consistent, they must adopt one of two definite courses: either they must admit the necessity of the scheme of armaments expansion elaborated by the Government after the War with China, and, admitting it, they must vote for the increased taxation which it entails; or they must agitate for a reduction of the scheme and oppose all measures of increased taxation. The section holding that view is said to comprise 48 members of the Lower House, or nearly one half of the total strength of the Progressist Party. They formulated their programme on the 30th ultimo, and are now canvassing for support. On the other hand, the remaining members of the Party, though willing enough to oppose increased taxation, are unwilling to stand forth as opponents of military expansion, which has the approval of the nation at large, and for which they themselves voted when the Matsukata Cabinet carried out the second part of the post bellum programme. Thus a split is predicted. It can scarcely be denied that the new movement appeals to reason. The attitude of hostility adopted by the Progressists towards an increased Land Tax was based on reasons connected with the tax itself and with the alleged condition of the folks by whom it will have to be chiefly paid. They can doubtless find independent arguments for voting against each of the other proposed taxes. But to vote against them en bloc is to deny that any addition need be made to the revenue, and that denial carries with it an assertion that the scheme of military expansion is excessive, for, certainly, to complete the scheme, additional taxes are essential. The Progressists at present are suffering from total effacement. One hears nothing of them in the Diet. Even their newspaper organs seem to have lost all stomach for the fight. Never, since the Diet met for the first time, has the political atmosphere been so stagnant. Speaking as foreigners, we are disposed to say that the stout adoption of some positive and clearly intelligible policy is the only hope for the Progressists to re-attract public attention.

February 7th.

The new political party, concerning which there has been some talk lately, is now an accomplished fact. All the preliminaries for its organization have been completed; its head office is fixed at No. 26, Unemecho, in the Kyobashi district of Tokyo; a general meeting of promoters is to take place on the 18th instant; its platform has been published, and it has adopted the name Kokken-to, which literally means "national power party," but may conveniently be called the Nationalist Party. The platform consists of eleven planks, six of which are mere platitudes; namely, (1) maintenance of the Constitution; (2) assertion of personal liberty in accordance with the Constitution; (3) development of local autonomy; (4) extension of education; (5) encouragement of agriculture, commerce and industry, and development of the national economy; and (6) establishing equilibrium between administrative expenditures and national resources, and placing the finances on a sound basis. But the remaining five planks represent something like a positive and definite policy. They are:—First, the gradual acquisition by the State of all the machinery of communications, which evidently indicates that the Party will advocate the State purchase of private railways; secondly, the devising of means for the protection and assistance of labour; thirdly, expansion of national armaments as far as the resources of the country will allow, and with due regard to the armaments of other nations; fourthly, making peace the prime aim of foreign policy and insisting on equalization of the rights and privileges of foreigners and Japanese; and fifthly, while not opposing the introduction of foreign religions according to the Constitution, to assist the development and improvement of Japan's ancient creeds. With such a platform the Kokken-to will at least enjoy the advantage of having some principles to differentiate it from its rival organizations. A large section of the business community will be attracted by the scheme for nationalizing the machinery of communications; the "imperialists" will all flock to the standard of a party declaring itself boldly in favour of armaments expansion; the "strong foreign politicians" will find nothing to traverse in the announcement about foreign affairs, and the followers of Buddhism and Shinto will regard the Kokken-to as their patron and protector. What we do not understand, however, is the prominent association of Messrs. Shimada and Taguchi with a party advocating the State purchase of private railways and the expansion of national armaments. Probably the rumour connecting them with this Party is erroneous.

February 8th.

It appears to be certain that a considerable section of the Progressists are strongly disposed to inscribe "reduction of military armaments" on their banner, and to take the field with a definite issue such as may be expected to enlist popular sympathy. Their difficulty is, as we have already explained, that their Party voted for the inauguration of the second series of post-bellum measures, and thus pledged itself beyond all question to the whole programme. It will not be universally contended, we imagine, that even that record must necessarily prove deterrent on the present occasion. The Party performed something very like a volte face with regard to the Land Tax, and its credit, having supported one shock of that nature, might be equal to enduring a second. Besides, oblique consistency for the sake of consistency is of all things most irrational. Human judgment is not immaculate. Even a body of clever politicians may stray into the wrong path, and if the Progressists think that they have erred, there is no valid reason why they should not retrace their steps. Certainly something is wanted to bring them once more into public notice. The Land Tax question served its turn, but they took it up too late, and their thunder has been robbed of all resonance by the action of the Liberals, first in cutting down the Government's proposed rate, secondly in limiting the period of taxation, and thirdly in passing a Bill to exempt the land from all local rates throughout the duration of that period. The Progressists are in want of a fresh plank, or their platform will go to pieces, and as the newly organized Kokken-to has adopted "armaments expansion" among its political tenets, the Progressists might do worse than adopt the opposite doctrine. But it is a pity that they did not think of doing so before they lost Mr. Shimada Saburo.

It is alleged that the 47 parliamentary members of the Progressist Party whose agitation has begun to engross public attention, have signed a solemn compact to hold together, and to secede from the Party unless it definitely adopts their programme, the three principal planks of which are that the Ordinary Expenditures of the State must be strictly limited to 140 million yen annually; that there must be no Extraordinary Expenditures, and that the outlays on account of the Army and the Administration must be reduced. Messrs. Ishiware, Hamaguchi, and Kanakoka are the leaders of these agitators, and it has been arranged that a general meeting of the parliamentary members of the Party shall be held on the 10th instant to discuss their proposals. On the whole they seem likely to obtain a measure of public support, for the complaisance of the Liberals and the quiescence of the Progressists have evidently begun to seem tiresome.

THE NIPPON YUSEN KAISHA'S SPECIAL SUBSIDY.

It is a little surprising to find that the Shogyo Shimpo strongly opposes the idea of granting a special subsidy to the Nippon Yusen Kaisha on account of its European service. As a mere matter of theory there is justice in our contemporary's objections. It cites the practice of England, Germany, and France, which subsidise steamer lines to parts of the world where they have colonies or special interests, and never grant public aid to any service lacking such qualification. That rule of procedure, if applied to Japan's case, would limit her subsidies to lines running to China, Formosa, and Korea, according to our contemporary's calculation (why not also to Australia, Hawaii, and Peru?) and the Shogyo thinks that no warrant can be found for subsidising a service to Europe. The article containing this criticism reads as though it were inspired by some motive other than simple economical considerations. It takes no account whatever of the fact that Japan's programme of navigation encouragement is based upon military as well as commercial considerations. She wants to have means of transporting her Army, which would otherwise be practically useless, and there is no employment, meanwhile, except the European service, for large vessels like those specially constructed for the Nippon Yusen Kaisha. The European service received direct encouragement from the Government, or it would never have been started, and we do not see how the State can evade the obligation of assisting it.

WINTER CAMPAIGNING.

The 20th Regiment of the Third Division (Sendai) seems to be engaged in exercises of a trying character. The men have taken the field in campaigning order, and are advancing across the mountains to Yamagata, camping out in the snow with only tents over their heads, and, in fact, carrying on offensive movements in mid-winter. It is fine practice, but must test the men's powers of endurance very severely.

PRELIMINARY INVESTIGATION IN CRIMINAL CASES.

The Rev. D. C. Greene has addressed to the Kokumin Shimbun an excellent letter on the subject of the procedure followed in Japan in the preliminary investigation of criminal cases, and the Kokumin publishes a translation of the letter in leading article type, thus giving to it a degree of prominence which the subject certainly deserves. The Kokumin, following the Japan Mail, had pointed out that Lord Charles Beresford was apparently guilty of an inaccuracy when speaking to the Oriental Society at the Imperial Hotel. He said:—"If you arrest a man and do not allow him the advantage of counsel, do not allow him to see his friends, then you are holding him guilty until he has proved himself innocent." Had Lord Charles said:—"Your Judges have power to order an accused person into solitary confinement, thus depriving him of the advice of his counsel and the aid of his friends," he would have been absolutely correct. But the form of speech that he used suggested a misapprehension as to the exact provisions of the Code, and, since nothing injures a cause so much at any want of accuracy on the part of its advocates, we, for our part, were careful to correct Lord Charles' language, while supplementing it with comments of our own strongly endorsing the necessity of the reforms he advocated. Concerning the letter of Mr. Greene, who has given exceptional study to this subject, and whose extensive acquaintance with all classes of the Japanese, as well as his knowledge of their language, qualify him to pronounce a valuable opinion, we can but repeat our often expressed opinion that until a radical change of procedure is effected, miscarriages of justice, in the highest sense of the word, must be numerous. The present system imposes on the Judge who conducts the preliminary examination a kind of moral obligation to obtain from the accused person a confession of guilt. The Code provides powerful instruments to aid the Judge in attaining that end. It gives him competence to order the accused into solitary confinement for a virtually unlimited period, since the ordeal, though it can not bear on its face a period longer than ten days, may be renewed at the close of that time for a corresponding period, and so on to infinity. By investing him with this terrible competence, the law tells the Judge, in effect, that he is expected to obtain confirmation of the charge from the mouth of the accused himself, and that, if he fails to do so, the fault rests with his own incapacity. Few officials will be willing to sacrifice their own judicial reputation to any scruples of humanity. They will exhaust every possible means of proving an accusation, and it must often happen under such a system that cruel wrong is inflicted on innocent persons, not only in the form of physical suffering, but also in the form of unjust convictions due to the mental prostration resulting from solitary confinement. Naturally the judge, confronted with a task whose successful discharge largely concerns his own reputation, is averse to granting bail. It is his business to see that proofs are forthcoming, and he takes care that accused persons shall find no opportunity of suppressing or obliterating incriminatory evidence. He is not a judge, indeed. It is a complete misnomer to call him a judge. He is a prosecutor, and the greater the severity he employs in discharging his functions of prosecution, the better is his official record. The judges who conduct preliminary investigations under such a system can never be dispensers of pure justice. The system must be changed, if Japan wants to rise to the highest level of modern jurisprudence.

We may refer here to an idea which still prevails among many foreigners; the idea that beating, though entirely illegal, is still employed by the Japanese police to extort confession—not beating in the sense of tying a man up and bastinadoing him, but simply "smacking" or cuffing. Our own inquiries among the Japanese have not elicited any confirmation of the theory, but it would, of course, be unreasonable to deny that abuses may exist in Japan equally with other countries, especially when, as is the case here, all the officials concerned in the preliminary examination of an accused person consider themselves officially pledged to establish his guilt. We have been informed, however, by several Japanese that there exists among the lower orders a very exaggerated conception of the mise au secret, and of the consequences it may entail. They conjecture that to confine an accused person for an indefinite period in a solitary cell is only a partial exercise of the judge's power, and that very much worse things may happen to them if they show themselves obdurate. That apprehension is probably responsible for many of the confessions made by prisoners during preliminary procedure in criminal cases.

The Rev. Dr. Greene's letter has evidently attracted Japanese attention. A Tokyo barrister writes a reply, heartily endorsing Dr. Greene's comments, assuring him that the Barristers' Association entertain the same views as himself, and bidding him and his foreign friends to be of good heart, for the question is now under discussion in the Diet, and the Bill submitted by the Government, proposing some partial reform of the Code of Criminal Procedure, will probably be transmuted into a thorough and satisfactory measure before it is restored to its drafters. We have already explained this Bill. Its chief feature is a nominal reform of the system of secret confinement (mise au secret)—nominal only, for, instead of abolishing the misshitsu altogether, the Authorities propose to substitute a separate cell.

The legal correspondent of the Kokumin drawn forcible attention to another point calling urgently for reform, namely, the perfunctory nature of the judgments delivered by the Courts. Where trial by jury does not exist, it is plainly incumbent on the Judges to make a full and exhaustive statement of the reasons underlying their decisions. Such a course is necessary, not merely for the satisfaction of the general public, but also in justice to the parties directly concerned, who have a right to know the exact bases of the Judges' conclusion. But at present the occupants of the Japanese bench confine themselves to setting forth a mere outline of the evidence, and delivering a de-haut-en-bas judgment, which reads like a sentence pronounced by a feudal chief upon an erring vassal. That is a custom which the correspondent justly condemns.

The great difficulty that stands in the way of a speedy and thorough reform of the present system of preliminary criminal procedure is that it can not be condemned as manifestly opposed to the principles of Occidental Jurisprudence. In that sense the abolition of torture was easier to accomplish. From the moment that Japan made up her mind to recast her laws on Western models, torture was doomed. Torture did not find a place in any of the systems of Europe and America, and could not co-exist with their fundamental laws of evidence. But Japan's present procedure is practically French. It was elaborated by an eminent French juriconsult, and it received, at the time of its promulgation, the hearty approval of French, German, Belgian, and Italian experts. It could never, therefore, have been pleaded by foreigners as a ground of objection to Treaty Revision, and the foreign criticisms to which it is now subjected come from Anglo-Saxons only. Hence we learn with the utmost satisfaction from the correspondent of the Kokumin that the Barristers' Association has taken up the question, for we thus infer that there is no fear of obstacles being created by a conflict of views between the French and the Anglo-American schools of jurists in Tokyo. No one has ever attempted to show, no one could show, we think, that the system of the proces verbal, of the mise au secret, and of the other methods employed under the Code Napoléon to betray an accused person into convicting himself, is anything better than a half-way house between the old method of ordeal or torture, and the Anglo-Saxon principle that every man is innocent of crime until his guilt is established by independent testimony. Japan's first step took her to the half-way house, and if she now, of her own motion, passes to the higher plane, she will furnish a conclusive proof that the spirit of reform really animates her.

JAPANESE FISHERMEN IN SAGHALIEN.

A Bill now awaits the Diet's decision for abolishing the import duty on salt fish coming from Siberia. The business of catching and salting fish on the coasts of Saghalien is carried on by Japanese fishermen, under permission granted by the Russian Government. It is a flourishing industry, and great numbers of Japanese repair northwards every year to carry it on. In one bay there are no less than 343 fishing stations. The introduction of a Bill to improve the prospects of the enterprise has been made the occasion for circulating a canard in the sense that the Russian Government, having its attention thus drawn to the matter, has withdrawn the permit hitherto granted to Japanese fishermen, and has taken steps to reserve the industry solely to Russian subjects. The rumour appears to be quite erroneous. It is stated, on the contrary, that Russia has duly intimated her intention of continuing for next year the system hitherto in force. There is, however, a partial explanation of the misapprehension. The local authorities in Saghalien have considered it necessary, in the interests of conservation, to forbid netting in a river—we can not identify the Romanized name—whither the fish repair in large numbers to spawn. That prohibition seems to have been magnified by hearsay into a general interdict.

THE DEFICIT OF REVENUE.

It would seem that an agreement has at length been reached between the Government and the Constitutional Party as to ways and means. The deficit to be made good by new or increased taxes owing to the Party's having insisted on reducing to 3.3 per cent. the Government's proposed rate of 4 per cent. for the Land Tax is 5,800,000 yen approximately, and the methods now decided upon are said to be these:—

An increase of the tax on Soy	1,400,000
License fees of tobacco dealers	700,000
Increased Postal Rates	2,000,000
Taken from interest on Indemnity	1,700,000

No explanation is offered of the item "interest on Indemnity." It does not refer, of course, to the interest paid by China. That has already been lumped with the principal and shown in the accounts as the "total amount of the Indemnity." But a part of the indemnity (17,182,880 yen) was received in the form of bonds (face value 20 million yen) of the Chinese loan; twelve millions have been invested in Public Undertakings Bonds, and forty millions were spent last year in purchasing War Bonds through the Bank of Japan. The annual interest on these sums aggregates 3½ million yen, but we confess that we do not understand how it can be regarded as a special asset available at this juncture. The interest on the War Bonds and the Public Undertakings Bonds has to be paid by the Treasury, and it is not supposable that the Budget for 1899-00 includes any provision for interest on such portions of these securities as are held by the Government. On the other hand, the interest on the Chinese Bonds must have been already shown as a budgetary asset. This new device for covering the deficit remains inexplicable, therefore, pending some official explanation.

The increased tax on soy is strongly condemned in some quarters. Soy is among the prime necessities of life in Japan. It is almost as important to the people as salt. Certainly it should not be chosen as a source of additional revenue by taxation until the whole catalogue of articles having any character of luxuries has been exhausted. We do not understand—and the Mainichi Shinbun takes the same view—why the Government does not tax tea in preference to soy. Tea, as the Japanese use it, partakes less of the nature of a luxury than the same article does in Europe or America, but it is by no means a necessity, and there is strong reason to think that some reduction in the quantity consumed by the nation would be decidedly an advantage from a hygienic point of view. The tax could easily be remitted in the case of tea for export.

Apparently the proposal to increase the rates of postage has been endorsed and will become law. We greatly regret it. This is an emphatically retrogressive step. It will inflict upon Japan's reputation an injury out of all proportion to the petty addition it brings to the revenue. The item of 700,000 yen under the heading of "licenses to tobacco dealers" explains itself, but we may add that the idea is to charge each dealer 50 yen as a license fee. Statistics show, we believe, that there are forty thousand tobacco dealers in the empire; that is to say, forty thousand persons who make a business of selling the manufactured leaf. It would seem that only fourteen thousand, or about one third of that number, are expected to take out licenses. Presumably the idea is that a fee of 50 ren will prove deterrent in the case of twenty-six thousand. The fuller the experience gained of the tobacco monopoly the worse its economic results appear. It is calculated that each Awamre (8½ lbs.) 7 of the leaf costs the grower from 54 to 56 sen on the average. The Government buys it at 70 sen and sells it to the manufacturers for 1.40 sen, so that the effect of official intervention is to enhance the price by from 84 to 86 sen per Awamre; that is to say, over 10 sen per lb. The result is a net income which certainly does not exceed seven million ren, after deducting interest at 5 per cent. on the capital (14 millions) invested in the enterprise. Now the quantity of tobacco grown in Japan is 90 million lbs., approximately. If the English system of taxation were adopted, namely, simply passing the leaf through the government's warehouses and levying a tax on it in transit, the cost of collection would not exceed half a million yen, and the net revenue, at the rate of 10 sen per lb., would be fully 8½ millions. Moreover, instead of spending ten millions on the building of warehouses and the provision of plant, and setting aside four millions as floating capital, two millions would probably have sufficed for all purposes.

KOBE WAREHOUSING COMPANY.

A settlement of the affairs of the Kobe Warehousing Company has been effected on terms which enable the Company to continue its business. Its total liabilities are 751,966 yen, and of that amount Mr. Yonezawa has paid 66,462 yen, leaving a balance of 685,504 yen, out of which 300,000 is to be left in the Company's hands as working capital. The remainder will be paid off thus:—

	Yen.
On December 1st, 1899	108,000
On December 1st, 1900	108,000
On December 1st, 1901	58,000
On December 1st, 1902	58,000
On December 1st, 1903	58,000
	390,000

The figures do not exactly tally, it will be observed. Japanese newspapers add that the Company can earn 28,000 yen per month, and that its expenditures do not exceed 12,000 yen. Hence it should have no difficulty in discharging its debt, especially as the banks will be interested in promoting its business, and will subject its affairs to strict scrutiny.

A CORRECTION.

We have to apologise for an error of transcription in our issue of the 4th instant. Quoting the remarks of a correspondent with reference to the contention of "Jus Civile" that the laws of Japan provide no permanent remedy against trespass, or any other infringements of private right such as are dealt with under Anglo-Saxon law by means of injunctions, we made our correspondent cite "Art. 211 of the Code of Criminal Procedure," whereas what he wrote was, of course, "Art. 211 of the Code of Civil Procedure." The mistake is self-evident, but we note it for the sake of caution.

LIBERALS AND THE LAND TAX.

The Liberals are obviously determined that their action in supporting the Government's Bill for increasing the Land Tax shall not impair their popularity with the provincial constituencies. In the first place, they reduced the proposed increase by nearly one-half. In the second, they imposed a limit of 6 years, and further stipulated for re-assessment, so that, at the end of 6 years—supposing the present programme to be carried out—the nation will be paying less Land Tax by 3 million yen than it was paying before the increase was voted. Finally, the Liberals have introduced, and blithely passed, a Bill providing that the land, in consideration of the additional impost it will have to bear on account of the national tax, shall be exempt during six years from all local rates. The law now allows the Communes to impose upon the land a local rate not exceeding one half of the national tax. Hence, the amended national tax being 45 million yen, the local rate might amount to 22½ millions. It does not, in fact, amount to anything like that figure, but we imagine that it certainly does amount to more than the 7½ millions which have been added to the national tax. Hence, if the Liberals carry their point, they will be able to say to the land-owners:—"We have actually improved your position. You are now paying less than you ever did, and we, for our part, have been able to give a simulated support to the Government." It is not probable, however, that the Liberals will carry their point. The veto that they propose would throw the communal finances into disorder. They passed the Bill without even a pretence of debate, as though it were some wholly insignificant measure. But that is not the kind of treatment, it will receive at the hands of the Peers. And as friends of Japan we are glad to think that this extremely pusillanimous and short-sighted policy of the Liberals will not succeed, and that their six-years' limit will prove illusory. The main hope for sound finance in Japan is that the land should be properly assessed—the urban lots, above all, for their present valuation is farcical—and that a courageous tax should be imposed on it in lieu of the many vexatious and unproductive burdens which labour and its products are now compelled to bear.

THE ABORIGINES IN FORMOSA.

We read in a Tokyo contemporary that, during last year, there were 303 attacks made by the aborigines, and 635 peaceful folks lost their lives. The numbers, according to months, were:—January 63, February 39, March 77, April 47, May 69, June 53, July 37, August 29, September 85, October 39, November 39, and December 65. The preponderance in March and September is attributed to the fact that heads are needed in those months to offer to the gods at religious festivals.

MAD DOGS.

There has been a kind of epidemic of mad dogs in the Miura Division of Sagami. On three several occasions since the 23rd of January people have been bitten. The total number of sufferers is stated to be 17, and one death is reported.

TELEGRAPH RATES.

An explanation, professing to be official, is published with reference to the scheme for increasing telegraph rates. The statement is this:—According to the present system, the name and address of the recipient of the message, which average 25 kana syllables, are not charged for, and the name and address of the sender, averaging 20 kana syllables, are charged 5 sen. Hence the minimum payment of 15 sen for a message not exceeding 10 kana syllables, is really accepted in return for the transmission of 55 syllables. Taking 5 kana syllables as the equivalent of an English word, this means that 11 words are wired for 15 sen; namely, a rate of 1.36 sen per word; whereas in England the minimum charge is 24.5 sen (6 pence) for 12 words, or 2.05 sen per word. Hence the Japanese rate is 0.69 sen cheaper than the English. The Government's proposal is to raise the minimum charge to 20 sen for a message of 15 syllables, including the name and address of the sender, and to charge nothing for the name and address of the recipient. Thus 40 syllables—15 representing the message, and 25, the recipients' name and address—will go for 20 sen, which will be at the rate of 8 English words for 20 sen, or 2.5 sen per word.

There are several comments to be made here. In the first place, the obvious fact presents itself that money is far more valuable in Japan than in England, and that all postal, telegraph, and railway rates ought to be proportionately less in this country than in Great Britain. But the new scheme contemplates charging 2.5 sen for a service which, in England, costs only 2.05 sen. In the second place, if it be a correct estimate that the name and address of the sender average 20 kana syllables, then obviously a message limited to 15 syllables inclusive of the name and address will not suffice for even the name and address, and it will be necessary to pass that limit in order to convey any intelligence. Thus considered, the minimum charge for a telegram becomes, not 20 sen but 30 sen, which is 5.5 sen dearer than the minimum charge in England. But it is quite evident that in the vast majority of cases the sender will not devote 20 syllables, or anything like 20 syllables, to his name and address when he has to include them in the body of the message. At present, since no additional expense is involved in wiring these details, they are written out with great and wholly unnecessary fulness. But when it becomes an object to abbreviate the name and address as much as possible, the sender will generally be content to write his name only, and the average number of syllables required for that purpose will be less than four. Hence it is obviously misleading to allege that the name and address of the sender have hitherto required the wiring of 20 syllables. They may have done so, but that was simply because no charge was made, and people consequently expanded these portions of the telegram to a wholly needless extent. They will content themselves hereafter with one word, as Englishmen do. Indeed, the Japanese system and the English are not fairly compared in the Japanese official statement. The twelve words of the English system include names and addresses, which, being abbreviated as much as possible, certainly do not absorb more than one half of the number, thus leaving at least six words for the message itself. Six words is the equivalent of 30 Japanese syllables, and to send that number would cost 40 sen under the new system, against the English charge of 24.5 sen.

The Fiji Shimpō attacks the proposed increase vehemently. Let us take, it says, the estimate of the Government itself, thus:—

	Syllables.
Name and address of receiver	25
Message, including name and address of sender	15
Total	40

40 syllables (kana)=8 words, and since a message of 40 syllables costs 20 sen, the charge is 2.5 sen per word (English). But in England a message of 12 words costs 24.5 sen, or 2.05 sen per word, so that the Japanese rate is 0.45 sen dearer than the English. Besides, the unit of calculation in Japan is a group of 10 syllables, whereas in England it is one word. In England, every additional word over and above the minimum limit of 12, costs a half-penny, or 2.05 sen. Hence we have these results:—

In Japan, a message of 25 syllables (15+10) will cost	30
In England, a message of 14 words (12+2) costs	28.6
In Japan, a message of 35 syllables will cost	40
In England, an equivalent message of 16 words costs	32.7
In Japan, a message of 45 syllables will cost	50
In England, an equivalent message of 18 words costs	36.8
In Japan, a message of 55 syllables will cost	60
In England, an equivalent message of 20 words costs	40.9

There is thus no question as to which of the two systems is the dearer. Our contemporary further remarks that, whereas England spends on the service 94 sen out of every 100 sen of gross earnings, Japan spends 75 sen. Japan should be thinking seriously of lowering her rates and improving her service, instead of exacting higher charges for inefficiently discharged duties. As a matter of fact, the Japanese rates, in order to be as cheap, proportionately, as the English, ought to be about one-fifth of the latter.

COLONIZATION IN THE NORTH.

The Government is expected to ask the Diet's consent to an arrangement for granting special facilities to colonists in Iturup island. There is a considerable tract of land—some 17,000 acres—awaiting cultivation in the island, and the idea is to induce a thousand farmers to proceed thither, furnishing them with seeds, tools, and other assistance. It will be observed that this project contemplates a grant of about 17 acres to each settler. That is surely a very small area. In Australia a settler can obtain two square miles of land, or 1,280 acres. Only the very lowest class of farmer, a man with no capital, no experience, and no prospect at home could be induced to emigrate to a cold and remote island for the sake of a paltry grant of 17 acres of unclaimed land. The Australian method seems much more rational. The dimensions of the grant are sufficient to tempt a substantial settler, and, on the other hand, the settler is bound by conditions, which ensure that his presence shall be a real element of progress in the country, and that there shall be no colour of speculation about his enterprise.

THE IRON FOUNDRY.

It is not at all surprising that there should be a great deal of astonishment about the changes that the official estimates for the establishment of an iron foundry have undergone. After much discussion and great opposition, as well as amid numerous and loudly expressed doubts of success, the project was definitely started in 1896, and the Diet gave its consent to a programme submitted by the Government, the outlay involved being 4,095,793 yen—namely, 579,762 yen to be taken from the Indemnity and 3,516,031 yen to be obtained by the sale of Industrial Undertakings Bonds—, and the work to be finished by the close of the fiscal year 1899-0; that is to say, within a period of four years. But when the Houses met for their twelfth session, they were asked to consent to a further appropriation of 6,474,056 yen, and to an extension of time for two years. Thus, according to this second programme, the enterprise was to cost 10,569,849 yen, and the work was not to be finished until March 31st, 1902. These changes were sufficiently startling. But now the Treasury comes forward with a third proposal, involving an additional outlay of 8,632,845 yen, and extending the time of completion until 1904. Thus a work which, according to the original estimate, was to cost only 4,095,293 yen, and to be completed by March 31st, 1900, will now require an outlay of 10,202,694 yen, and will not be completed until March 31st, 1904. The expenditure has been nearly quintupled and the time has been doubled. It must be confessed that a partial explanation of this radical alteration of plan is forthcoming. Thus 4½ millions of the last increase is to form the working capital of the foundry, and 1,630,000 yen is to be spent on the acquisition of mines. At the outset, the Authorities expected to purchase the iron ore, coal, and time required at the foundry. But subsequent investigation has convinced them that the work can not be satisfactorily conducted on such a system, and they have decided that the State must own the mines from which the materials are taken. There is also a grant of 400,000 yen, spread over 4 years, to a company which has undertaken to improve Wakamatsu harbour, which will be the port for the foundry. Operations will be commenced at the foundry on a small scale from next fiscal year—beginning April 1st—, but all the factories will not be opened until 1905, when it is expected that 90,000 tons of steel will be manufactured yearly. Whatever excuse may be offered on the score of inexperience, there is no denying that the preliminary story of this foundry reflects little credit on Japanese experts.

A JAPANESE CONSUL IN MONTREAL.

The Kobe Chamber of Commerce (Japanese) has memorialized the Government in the sense that a Japanese Consul should be appointed for Montreal. The trade between Japan and Canada last year aggregated 2,365,600 yen, and there is a steady tendency to increase. But there is only one Japanese Consul now in Canada, and he is stationed in Vancouver, which lies far outside of the principal spheres of business. The recommendation seems reasonable.

THE QUESTION OF BAIL.

As the question of criminal procedure in the preliminary examination of accused persons is now occupying a large share of public attention, our readers will probably be interested in a point which has given rise to some discussion. Recently a Kobe journal advanced the following statement:—"According to the Japanese Code of Criminal Procedure, there is no necessity whatever for an application for bail from the prisoner or his advocate, it being the duty of the judge to grant bail of his own initiative if satisfied that the accused is entitled to have the privilege extended to him." This, it will be observed, is a very remarkable allegation. "There is no necessity whatever for an application for bail from the prisoner or his advocate," and "it is the duty of the judge to grant bail of his own initiative." We are told, in brief, that, according to the Japanese Code, an accused person need never trouble himself to apply for bail, as the obligation to grant it devolves upon the judge of his own initiative. It need scarcely be said that such an interpretation of the Code is quite erroneous. Indeed, it bears its refutation on its face, for unless sureties are tendered by the accused or his counsel, it is obvious that the judge can not find them on the accused's behalf. Referring subsequently, by memory, to our contemporary's statement, we inadvertently substituted "public procurator" for judge, and a great deal of capital is now made out of that substitution, though it is wholly immaterial, the public procurator being one of the judicial officials engaged in the investigation, and the question at issue being whether bail has to be applied for by the accused, or whether it is the duty of the judicial officials trying him to grant it of their own initiative. We have denied, and we do most emphatically deny, that any such duty is imposed by the Code on judicial officials in the matter of bail. The Kobe journal responsible for the original statement now defends it by quoting a translation of the 159th Art. of the Code, which runs:—"The examining judge may, after hearing the opinion of the Public Procurator, set the accused at liberty under the care of his relatives or friends, even if no request has been made for bail." This article, which gives the judge a discretionary power to set a prisoner at liberty, is actually quoted in proof of an assertion that "there is no necessity whatever for an application for bail" on behalf of the prisoner, since "it is the duty of the judge to grant bail of his own initiative." Such curiously loose and unintelligent renderings of definite legal provisions scarcely deserve serious treatment, and when our contemporary, after making the above quotation, recommends us to "read the Codes before venturing to say what they do not contain," its exultation is so naïve that we feel a certain reluctance in disturbing it. That a provision extending to a Judge permission to choose a certain course, should be construed as imposing on him a duty to follow that course, and that the possibility of a Judge's taking the initiative in granting a privilege should be held to dispense with all necessity for the prisoner to solicit the privilege on his own behalf—that is surely a quaint method of reading simple English. However, our contemporary's blunders of interpretation are altogether secondary. The issue is simply this:—We say that "the prisoner or his friends must make the application" for bail; our contemporary says, "no; there is no necessity whatever for the prisoner or his friends to apply: it is the duty of the judge to grant the bail of his own initiative," and in support of the latter assertion refers us to Art. 159 of the Code of Criminal Procedure as quoted above. Well, the fact is that the procedure indicated in Art. 159 is not bail at all. It would have been prudent on the part of the Kobe journal to ascertain the meaning of the Article before essaying to construe it. There are two entirely distinct processes in Japanese criminal procedure: one is "bail," or hoshaku. The other is "entrusting," or sekiyu. When an examining judge arrives at the conclusion that an accused person is innocent of the charge preferred against him, but, at the same time, sees reason to anticipate that his presence at the Court may possibly be again required for the purpose of elucidating the affair, he "entrusts" him to his relatives or friends, who sign a document promising to produce him, if necessary, but are not liable to any penalty if they fail to keep their promise. That is the measure set forth in Art. 159 of the Code. It has nothing whatever to do with bail, except that it is usually adopted in cases where bail has not been applied for. Naturally, though not necessarily, if bail has been applied for it is granted as the simpler course. The words of Art. 159 are:—

Yoshin hanji wa hoshaku no seikin aru to shaya to wa towazu tenji no item wo kiki hikoku-mi wo sono shizoku mata wa kokun ni sekiyu suru koto mo u.

A Judge of first instance, after consultation with the Procurator, may entrust a defendant to his relatives or friends, whether bail has been applied for or not.

This is an arrangement wholly distinct from bail, and that it should have been interpreted as referring to bail, above all as dispensing with any necessity for an application on the prisoner's behalf, and as imposing on judges the "duty" of "granting" what they have not been asked for, is another very striking example of the singular misconceptions gravely ventilated from time to time by the newspaper from which we have quoted. If an accused person wants bail in Japan, or if he entertains any hope of obtaining bail, he must apply for it. The Code of Criminal Procedure provides no machinery whatever for granting bail unless it has been asked for. We observe, from a paragraph in a later issue of the same journal, that it translates the two terms hoshaku and sekiyu, by the single English word "bail." Their meaning is quite different. In fact, the whole of our contemporary's argument is composed of ignorance and errors.

THE "YOROZU CHOHO" AND BARON IWASAKI.

It is really a pity that some one does not think it worth while to rouse the Yorozu Choho to a sense of its responsibility as a public print. The injury that it does to the reputation of Japanese journalism by its reckless and sensational attacks upon individuals is very great. The Yorozu may be inspired by worthy motives, but, if so, it must be the victim of some particularly mischievous fate, for it manages always to convey precisely the opposite impression. Its latest assault is upon the financial credit of Baron Iwasaki. It relates a circumstantial story of an attempt made by the Sanyo and Kiushiu Railway Companies to raise a loan of 15 million yen in London; alleges that Baron Iwasaki went security for the loan, and declares that the British capitalists with whom the negotiations were conducted, finding, on inquiry in Shanghai and elsewhere, that the Iwasaki name was not good to that amount, declined to complete the transaction. We know, on the best possible authority, that Baron Iwasaki had no connexion of any kind with the affair, and that his name was never lent or used to secure the loan. The Yorozu Choho might have acquired the same knowledge without any difficulty, but it apparently sets a higher value upon a sensational paragraph than upon the credit of its country's capitalists. That kind of journalism is very contemptible. Japanese railway companies can not borrow money in England until they are in a position to hypothecate their roads as security for the loan.

THE ARMS AND EXPLOSIVES BILL.

Readers of the Diet's Proceedings, as reported in these columns, have doubtless observed that the Lower House has passed, and the Upper has now under consideration, a Bill for the Regulation of Firearms and Explosives. The Bill contains a clause providing that regulations for the enforcement of the new Laws shall be enacted by the Home Department. When the measure came up for its Second Reading in the House of Representatives, Mr. Haseba Junko, referring to the above clause, said that he understood that the Departmental Regulations had been already drafted, and that they contained a provision limiting to 100 kwamme (833 lbs.) the quantity of explosive compounds stored by an individual or company at one time, and limiting the quantity of gunpowder to 1,200 kwamme. (10,000 lbs.) Would these limits be applicable, he inquired, to foreign merchants. If so, great inconvenience might be caused, inasmuch as the present system was for the foreign merchants to import large quantities and store them in the official warehouses—as much as 6,000 kwamme at a time—, delivering them out to consumers in convenient amounts as required. He added that, in these times of railway and mining activity, limitations of the kind proposed might be very crippling. The Government Delegate replied that the Law would of course be operative in the case of foreigners as well as Japanese subjects after July next, but denied that the Regulations had been finally drafted, and promised that due consideration should be given to Mr. Haseba's point. It appears to us very unlikely that these limitations, or, indeed, any limitations, will be imposed on explosives stored in the official warehouses. Such action would simply kill the trade, for the transport of petty quantities from Europe and from place to place in Japan could not be effected except at prohibitive cost. Mr. Haseba did well to call attention to the matter, though probably his point had already presented itself to the authorities. At all events the matter is of sufficient importance to merit attention.

TAXING OF JAPANESE BONDS.

There is a curious and interesting point connected with the tenure of Japanese public securities by foreigners. After July next, or, at any rate, from January of 1900—for it is rumoured that the Japanese Government will not levy taxes from the foreign residents until the latter date—every one enjoying an income of 300 yen annually, or upwards, will have to pay income tax. The interest accruing on Japanese bonds held by a foreigner will not be reckoned as part of his general income. The tax will be levied independently on that interest. On the other hand, by sending the bonds to a Bank in Hongkong, or Shanghai, or London, and having the interest collected there, it will be possible to evade the tax altogether. Foreign investors in Japanese securities naturally expect to receive the full interest registered on the face of the bond, but if they make the investment in Japan, and keep the bonds in their possession here, they will find the interest diminished by the amount of the income tax. It is a consideration of some importance. The Revised Income Tax Law says that "Interest on Public Bonds or Companies' debentures, payable in the district where this law is enforced" shall be subject to a tax of 2 per cent., irrespective of the amount. Hence a person holding 100,000 yen worth of 5 per cent. bonds will have to pay a tax of 100 yen annually if he collects the interest in Japan. Possibly if he had the interest collected in London the British tax collector might make him "stand and deliver," but however that may be, the effect of the Revised Income Tax Law is to reduce from 5 to 4.9 per cent. the interest on Japanese public securities held in Japan.

We may add that the new Law fixes no minimum taxable limit in the case of incomes derived from bonds. Incomes otherwise obtained are not taxable unless they amount to 300 yen annually of net assets; but if a man's property is altogether invested in bonds, he has to pay a tax of 2 per cent. even though his income be only 200 yen or 200 yen per annum. That seems very hard. Many men of small means invest their property in public securities in order to leave it to their widows and orphans in a safe and easily manageable form. But, however small the pittance thus bequeathed, the tax collector makes his raid upon it. That point was raised in the House of Peers, though in another form. An income not derived from public bonds or company's debentures is not liable for income tax unless it amounts to 300 yen. Suppose, then, that a person has an income of 390 yen, and that among his property is included five per cent. bonds of the face value of 2,000 yen. Then his income not derived from bonds is only 290 yen, and he escapes taxation altogether in respect of that income. In short, whereas his tax, were there no bonds in his property, would be 3.90 yen—the tax on incomes from 300 yen to 500 yen is 1 per cent.—, by having a portion of his belongings in bonds he escapes with a payment of 2 yen—i. e. 2 per cent. on the interest of the bonds alone. Or, again, if out of a total income of 300 yen, 10 yen be derived from bonds, the owner of the income escape with a payment of 20 sen on account of the bonds, his remaining income (290 yen) being below the taxable limit. In view of such contingencies it was proposed, in the Upper House, to reduce the minimum taxable income to 250 yen, but the amendment was rejected. Of course the Government's idea is to collect the tax on bonds by deducting it from the interest at the time of paying the latter, but it would seem a juster plan to include the interest on bonds and company's debentures in ordinary income.

ARBITRATION BETWEEN FOREIGNERS AND JAPANESE.

The Kobe Chamber of Commerce, in consultation with the Japanese Chamber of Hyogo and Osaka, seems to have elaborated an arrangement for arbitrating all commercial disputes that may hereafter occur between Japanese and foreigners, without taking them into Court. There is to be a section of joint arbitration (Kyōdō Chūsaiha) constituted with 20 members, 10 elected by the Kobe Chamber and 10 by the Hyogo and Osaka Chambers, which appear to be acting as one body in this matter. From these 20 members 3 are to be selected to form a board of arbitration in any case of dispute. The number 3 is not compulsory. One arbitrator will suffice if the parties to the suit agree in that sense. As to the appointment of the arbitrators, one is to be nominated by each of the disputants, and the third by the disputants conjointly, or by the Chairman of the arbitration section, if so desired—we are not sure whether the Chairman of the Chamber of Commerce is not referred to, but such a provision would be manifestly ambiguous, since three chambers are concerned. The disputants may, if they please, nominate arbitrators outside the members of the arbitration section. Persons thus agreeing to arbitrate a question will be required to sign a very detailed document, pledging themselves to accept the decision of the arbitrators as final; explicitly renouncing all legal remedy subsequent to arbitration, and subscribing other conditions carefully framed with the object of rendering the arbitration effective and final. Each party has to put up a sum of 100 yen by way of preliminary, and the place of arbitration is to be fixed by mutual consent. We gather from the terms of the arrangement that the Law Courts are expected to lend their machinery for the purpose of enforcing the decisions of the arbitrators, and that summary execution (shikkō) may be resorted to. Altogether the arrangement is carefully thought out, and appears calculated to ensure valuable practical result. The only point suggesting uncertainty is the manner of nominating the third arbitrator. Naturally, when the parties concerned are a foreigner and a Japanese, each will choose one of his own nationals from among the 20 members of the section. But when the two come to determine the third arbitrator, who is obviously the person of chief importance, is it likely that they will be able to agree? The Japanese will naturally want a Japanese, the foreigner a foreigner, and neither will be willing to submit his case to a board of which two out of the three members belong to a nationality different from his own. This difficulty must have occurred to the framers of the arrangement, but the translation from which we take this precis does not contain any provision on the subject.

THE GOVERNMENT AND THE REVISED TREATIES.

The Government is certainly displaying a very liberal spirit in its preparations for the operation of the Revised Treaties. All its measures hitherto have indicated a sincere desire to make things pleasant for the foreigner. The clause in the Press Law, restricting to Japanese subjects the privilege of editing or publishing journals, has been amended, and foreigners will be free to engage in newspaper enterprise. It has been contended that the privilege was already secured by the French Treaty, but the contention might be difficult to establish. Foreigners are not allowed to enjoy any such privilege in France, we understand, and a treaty between France and another Power, though couched in the same language as the Franco-Japanese Treaty, has not been interpreted as conferring freedom of journalistic enterprise. But happily the question has been finally settled by Japan's action. Then we have had amendments of the laws in the sense of recognising the diplomas and licenses of foreign medical men, pharmacutists and druggists, and we have seen the Business Tax Law changed so that its provisions will not bear hardly upon foreign insurance companies. Finally, there is now in the hands of the Diet a Bill to relieve foreigners from the obligation of affixing their stamps (natsu-in) to legal documents, and for extending to them the same succour in litigation that Japanese subjects enjoy under the Code of Civil Procedure. The Code of Criminal Procedure has also been amended in the sense of dispensing with stamps where foreign defendants or complainants, &c., are concerned. We believe that several other measures connected with the operation of the Revised Treaties have still to be submitted to the Diet, and that they are all couched in the same liberal spirit.

THE TOKYO WATER-WORKS.

When the first trial of the Tokyo Water-works was made an interesting coincidence occurred. The representatives of the Municipality and the chief officials in charge of the Works were enjoying the spectacle of a handsome fountain delivering its volume of water in duly ordered fashion at a certain position, while the citizens in another quarter of the capital were fighting against an inundation which threatened to swamp their dwellings. The water, en route for the place of trial, had found a weak spot in the main and had thus extemporized an unexpected fountain on its own account. This experience was repeated on the 28th ultimo. The water having been turned on in the Shitaya main, burst the pipes in Okachimachi and in Takecho, and wrought considerable havoc. It is believed that some of the defective pipes fraudulently supplied to the Municipality two years ago, are still doing duty in the works, and that the system will be liable to catastrophes at any time. It will be a bad business for the reputation of the engineers in charge, and, indeed, their method of carrying on the work, supposing them to have anything like a free hand, deserves to be roundly censured. But we do not see that they can justly be blamed for accidents due to bad pipes delivered to them under a system of fraud against which no ordinary precaution could have guaranteed them. It would have been safer, doubtless, to take up and discard all the pipes furnished by the dishonest company, but the Municipality has probably hesitated to incur such an outlay. It is impossible not to reflect now how enormously the citizens of Tokyo would have gained had they divested themselves of romantic and utterly unpractical ideas, and obtained their pipes in foreign markets. The first water-works made in this country, those of Yokohama, under the direction of a foreign engineer and by means of foreign material, were finished expeditiously without hitch of any kind, and have been rendering good service for a number of years. The same engineer planned works for Tokyo 13 years ago, and a Japanese company offered to construct them within 6 years, asking only for a Government guarantee of 6 per cent., and promising to hand over the works gratis to the Municipality after 30 years. The Municipality is paying 6 per cent. on a much larger sum than that involved in the original plan; will have to pay back the borrowed principal too, and seems likely to have to wait a considerable time longer before the city has a supply of water.

THE SOY TAX.

There is very strong opposition to the proposed increase of the tax on Soy, and many people predict that the revenue obtained from the measure will fall greatly short of the Government's expectation. The quantity of soy now consumed in the country is $1\frac{1}{2}$ millions of koku, in round numbers. In 1889 the quantity was only $1\frac{1}{2}$ million koku, and it remained stationary at that figure, or even showed a tendency to decline, until 1892, when it gradually expanded. A considerable quantity is now exported to Formosa, but the consumption in Japan has not increased apparently in a ratio at all proportionate to the improved circumstances of the people. The explanation given is that soy, unlike sake, is very easy to manufacture. Salt, beans, and barley are alone required, and it may be made at all seasons of the year, whereas sake can be brewed in winter only. Already domestic manufacture goes on largely, and if the people are asked to pay another yen per koku, the probability is that many of them will escape the tax by manufacturing their own shoyu.

THE PROGRESSIVISTS.

It is quite plain that great friction exists in the ranks of the Progressivists. The anti-expansionists show no sign of abandoning the position newly taken by them, and one of the members of the General Managing Committee, Mr. Sasaki Shigeto, has resigned. Rumour says that Viscount Miura, of Sōul notoriety, is acting as mediator, and, further, that in this dilemma there is talk of abolishing the General Managing Committee altogether, and placing the control and direction of the party's affairs entirely in the hands of Count Okuma. We should say that no wiser course offers itself. If the Progressivists ceased to wrangle among themselves, and trusted their business solely to Count Okuma, obeying him implicitly, the party's position would soon be altered.

JAPAN'S FOREIGN TRADE.

We have not recently observed any report compiled for the British Government by a trade commissioner on the subject of the condition of British commerce in the Far East. The Fiji Shimpō, however, writes as though such a document had been published, and says that the commissioner made six points:—(1) British merchants do not consult the tastes of consumers; will not import sufficiently cheap goods; will not employ the metric system of weights and measures, and will not do business on a credit basis. (2) Very few Englishmen go abroad to study the conditions of the markets and the fashions of the people they have to supply, and when the British Government, on rare occasions, sends a commissioner, he is not a person acquainted with foreign languages and does not possess the qualifications necessary for the task. (3) Compared with German and American goods, British exports are badly packed. (4) The freight rates by British ships are high. (5) Trade union troubles are so frequent in England that contracts can not be carried out within any certain time. (6) Germany sends numbers of young men to work in merchants' offices in foreign countries, where they acquire a full knowledge of the language of the country, and obtain other information which proves of great value subsequently; England does nothing of the kind.

Taking the above criticisms for text, the Fiji discourses upon the foreign trade of Japan, and asserts, at the outset, the somewhat unexpected contention that the foreign merchant at the Treaty Ports is an obstacle to the development of the country's commerce. He comes, we are told, between the foreign producer and the Japanese consumer; levies a heavy toll upon the goods passing through his hands; controls transactions to suit his own convenience; insists upon receiving ready money from his Japanese clients even in the case of goods imported by him on three months' bills; makes no concession on account of a fall in the Japanese prices of goods for export, and thus fails to encourage the trade. (We do not clearly understand this last statement. It seems to refer to exchange, but, since Japan adopted the gold standard, exchange is no longer a disturbing factor.)

Concerning these remarks, we can only say that they seem astonishingly wide of the mark. The foreign middleman is about the best agent that Japan could have. He takes upon his shoulders the whole risks of the trade; he brings the markets of Europe and America to Japan's very doors; so far from levying a large fine upon the trade to pay himself, he works upon a margin reduced by competition to the smallest possible proportions; and if he does not give credit, it is because bitter experience has taught him that loss is the inevitable result of doing so. These are cold facts. They ought to be quite obvious to the Fiji Shimpō, or to any observant Japanese.

Our contemporary does not spare its own nationals. It says that their untrustworthiness is a fatal obstacle to the development of trade. They do not keep their contracts as to time; they do not supply goods according to sample; they are without commercial morality; and finally, the men sent abroad by the Government to study and report upon foreign trade conditions are so unqualified for the task that they have to rely upon a few scraps of information furnished by Japanese Consuls.

THE NEW ELECTION LAW.

The new Law of Election, now in the hands of a Committee of the Lower House, reduces the property franchise from 15 yen annually of national-tax payments, to 5 yen of Land Tax, or 3 yen of Income Tax or Business Tax. It is calculated that this will raise the number of franchise-holders from 510,000 to 2,110,000, exclusive of Hokkaido. The division is thus:—

Payers of 5 yen of Land Tax.....	1,480,000
Payers of 3 yen of Income Tax.....	170,000
Payers of 3 yen of Business Tax.....	460,000

Total 2,110,000

In the case of candidates for election, the property franchise is removed altogether. The election districts are completely changed, being enlarged to cities, prefectures, towns, and islands. Every town (shi), even though its population be less than fifty thousand, will return one member, and above fifty thousand a member is added for every eighty thousand, or fraction of eighty thousand. Thus the membership of the Lower House will be increased from 300 to 445. It is proposed that the Law shall take immediate effect, in so far as concerns the election of the 145 new members created by its provisions, but the members already sitting will not be affected until the next general election. Of course one great object of the Bill is to correct the present inequality of representation enjoyed by the rural and the urban populations. But that aim is only partially effected. The urban population numbers 9,700,000 out of a total of 42,000,000, being thus nearly 25 per cent. Moreover, in point of intelligence, education, and wealth, it may be said to constitute one half of the nation. Under the new system, however, the members of the House will be distributed thus:—

	Representatives.
Rural Population	341
Urban Population	98
Hokkaido.....	3
Islands.....	3

Arithmetically speaking, the towns folk will be fully represented, but, could property and intelligence be taken into account, they ought to return about 145 members, instead of 98.

The system of voting is to be by unsigned ballot, each elector writing on his ballot the name of the person for whom he votes—one name only. There will thus be minority representation. Not without restriction, however, for it is provided that a candidate must obtain votes equal to at least one-fifth of the total number of voters registered in the district in order to be successful at the first ballot. In the second ballot this rule does not hold; but it is obvious that the minority have very little chance of returning their candidate in a second ballot, which is held only to fill vacancies left after the first ballot. On the whole, however, a minority commanding one-fifth of the votes should always be able to elect one representative, provided that the district returns at least 5 members. Take, for example, the case of a district containing 200,000 voters, of whom 45,000 are conservatives, and 155,000 Liberals. Such a district will have 3 representatives under the new system, and it is plain that the Liberals can divide their votes so as to give 51,666 to each candidate, thus returning all their nominees. But in a district of 300,000 voters returning 5 candidates, the Conservatives, if they have 61,000 voters, should be able to capture one seat certainly, and their position improves the greater the numbers of seats, provided that they have one-fifth of the votes. For example, in a district of 450,000 voters returning 6 members, the minority having 90,000 votes can capture one seat, whereas the majority, having 360,000 votes, can not return more than 3 members. But in the second ballot for the sixth member, the majority would have complete command of the situation.

THE JAPAN RAILWAY COMPANY.

The Japan Railway Company held its annual meeting on the 8th instant. The chairman, Viscount Soga, reported that, in accordance with resolutions adopted at the preceding meeting, the directors had been pursuing a policy of retrenchment. The staff had been reduced by 813, so that its total number now stood at 10,001. Full attention had also been given to the question of separating the accounts of the Omiya Works from the general accounts of the line, but there were many difficulties to be overcome in carrying out such a change.

The accounts were then presented, the principal figures being as follows:—

	Yen.
Net Profit on the year's working	1,613,151
Government Grant in Aid	642,132
Sale of property	1,230
Brought over from last account	25,434
	2,271,947

The above sum was disposed of as follows:—

	Yen.
Rewards to officials	48,394
Discharge of Obligations	3,494
Payment of Debts	21,700
Dividend, at the rate of 8½ per cent. ...	1,851,911
Carried forward to next account	265,791
Reserve	80,657
	2,271,947

The original proposal of the Directors had been to pay a dividend of 8½, but at the instance of the meeting the figure was changed to 8½. A dividend of eight and a half per cent. seems, at first sight, a sufficiently good achievement, but it has to be noted that the Company is still in receipt of Government aid to the extent of over six hundred thousand yen, or nearly 3 per cent. of its total paid up capital (21½ million yen, in round numbers). Thus, were it deprived of State assistance, the shareholders would not have much more than 5 per cent. to receive. The Japan Railway Company was the first private enterprise of the kind in this country. Organized in 1881, it received from the Government a promise that during a period of ten years in the case of the Tokyo-Sendai Road, and 15 years in that of Sendai-Awamori Road, the Treasury would pay a sum sufficient to ensure to the shareholders a dividend of 8 per cent. on the paid up capital. In reckoning the above periods, the time of actually commencing the work of construction is taken as a starting point. Hence the period for the Tokyo-Sendai line expired long ago, but that for the Sendai-Awamori section is still running. The Treasury's outlay on this account diminishes year by year. In the Budget for 1899-00, the sum entered is 430,897 yen.

It is interesting to note that the principal shareholders are:—

	Shares.
The Fiftieth Bank	305,232
Baron Iwasaki	36,482
The Imperial Route Bureau	22,492
Marquis Ason	17,947
Marquis Tokugawa (Kishin)	15,124
The Mitsui Firm	14,591
Prince Shimazu	13,947
Marquis Mayeda	13,362
Marquis Tokugawa (Owari)	10,326

THE PRESS AND THE AMENDED LAW OF ELECTION.

Tokyo newspapers are unanimous in their applause of the amended Law of Election. Naturally they welcome the great extension of the franchise that it grants, and they are also particularly pleased that by introducing the system of single voting, the representation of minorities has been provided for. The Kokumin lays much stress on the provision that a voter who can not write the name of the candidate he wishes to elect will be disqualified. Our contemporary regards that restriction as a premium for education. It seems difficult to conceive, however, that any one possessing the property qualification should be so illiterate as to be unable to write a name. Moreover, to indite the name of a candidate is not necessarily a proof of education. That amount of calligraphic ability can easily be acquired for the occasion. There does not appear to be much anxiety about the passing of the Bill, though the confidence felt on that subject is not easy to understand, seeing that an almost identical measure, introduced by the Ito Cabinet, was so radically changed by the House as to become simply a means of extending the franchise without in any degree improving the system. It is evident that if the Bill be passed in its present form, the political complexion of the majority in the House may be radically changed, for among the batch of 145 additional members who have to be immediately elected, a large proportion are representatives of the urban population, and in all probability they will throw in their lot with the new Kokkento, thus rendering it a very powerful organization. Had the Progressists retained their old character, they would doubtless have commanded the allegiance of many of the new members, but their recent championship of rural interest in preference to urban must tell against them under these altered conditions.

THE STATE AND EDUCATION.

It is pointed out by writers who plead for a larger measure of State aid to education, that whereas the Treasury in this country grants only 330,000 yen annually towards the support of the Primary Schools, the corresponding sum granted in England is 64,438,550 yen, that in France, 41,205,563 yen, and that in Germany, 16,063,657 yen. There can be no doubt, as we recently predicted, that the country will soon insist on a fuller measure of State assistance for education. A simple plan would be to reduce the fees paid by students to one-half of the present amount, and to grant 3 millions annually out of the Treasury to make up for the loss of revenue thus caused to the schools as well as to defray a moiety of the fees payable by the additional pupils whom the change would doubtless bring in. There would remain the question of increasing the emoluments of teachers, which, in spite of the improvement effected in recent years through Government intervention, are still inadequate.

INCREASE OF RAILWAY FARES.

Public opinion seems to be strongly opposed to the idea of increasing the fares on State Railways for the purpose of bringing additional revenue to the Exchequer. The Yōji Shimpō, which is by no means alone in its view, contends that so long as the Railways are in such crying need of improvement, any profit accruing from them should be devoted to their betterment. A second point made is that the private companies would raise their fares at once were they not restrained by Government example, and that they will certainly make a substantial increase if officialdom gives them a lead. A tax on means of communication is undoubtedly one of the last sources to which Japan should have turn for obtaining revenue.

THE TONNAGE DUTY LAW.

The Special Committee of the House of Peers, entrusted with the task of examining and reporting upon the Tonnage Duty Law, has made two important amendments. The first involves a reduction of the proposed dues by 50 per cent. A foreign-owned or Japanese ship engaged in over-sea trade, and entering a Japanese port from abroad, is to pay to sen per registered ton or per 10 koku of carrying capacity, according to the Government's Bill. The Committee proposes to write 5 sen instead of 10. It further suggests that when a ship has to enter two or more ports to discharge its cargo, a payment of 10 sen per ton on entering the first port should clear it altogether. It remains to be seen whether the House will adopt these amendments.

THE LATE COUNT KATSU.

The Emperor has been pleased to grant the title of Count to the tenth son of Prince Tokugawa, whom the late Count Katsu nominated as his heir. As a matter of strict right, the title should have become extinct, there being no lineal heir and Count Katsu not having complied with the legal formalities of adoption. But the Sovereign has made an exception in this instance.

A BIG CONCERN.

The final figures for 1898 of the Equitable Insurance Society of the United States have been issued. The surplus, compared with 1897, shows an enormous increase, now standing at the huge sum of £11,939,685. The "new business" written in 1898 by the "Equitable" amounted to over £35,000,000. With such figures as this the company has much to warrant its boast that it is the strongest Life Insurance Company in the world. The Branch Office for Japan is at No. 10, Band, and the representative is Mr. Kieue.

THE PHILIPPINES.

IT is difficult to ascertain exactly when hostilities broke out in the Philippines. The first news reached Yokohama at the end of January, but no one paid much attention to it. The source was a private letter sent from Hongkong by a Filipino correspondent. He alleged that on January 13th, a fight had taken place at Manila, resulting in the defeat of the United States' forces with a loss of 500 men, and he represented the situation as almost desperate, the civilian population fleeing from Manila in crowds, the Filipino leaders preparing to enter the city at the head of ninety thousand men, and the Americans having only ten thousand for the defence. There is no reason whatever to doubt that the whole of this story was false, with the exception, perhaps, of the relative strength of the Filipino and American forces, which seems to have been stated with an approximation to the truth. The next news that reached Japan was a telegram received by the Foreign Office in Tokyo on the 6th instant. Dated the 5th, it said that a general attack had been made on Manila by the Filipinos, and that they had been repulsed with heavy loss. The inference was that the attack had occurred on the 3rd or 4th, and that view derived confirmation from a London telegram dated the 4th instant, which spoke of hostilities having begun in the Philippines and of Manila's having been attacked. This telegram did not profess to emanate direct from Manila, but was merely a repetition of news wired thence to New York. Still the Tokyo and the London telegrams, taken together, constituted strong evidence that the trouble happened in the early days of this month. Indeed, there would have been no room for uncertainty had not another London telegram, also dated the 4th instant, alleged that 14 hours of severe fighting had taken place from January 25th, and that the Americans had carried two positions and advanced their lines, with casualties of 20 killed and 125 wounded, the Filipino loss being heavy. We are unable, therefore, to arrive at a closer approximation than that the situation culminated in an armed collision during the interval January 25th—February 4th. Obviously the initiative was taken by the Filipinos. They attacked Manila. General OTIS, being under orders to abstain carefully from recourse to arms pending the final decision of the Washington Government, can not have ordered any military movement. From the London news it would appear that he assumed the offensive when fighting commenced, and that he advanced his lines, occupying two of the enemy's positions. But that was doubtless a question of strategy only. The Filipinos had command of the city's water supply, which is in a distant suburb, and from the moment when they became hostile, OTIS could have no choice but to deprive them of that advantage.

The interesting point is the cause of this outbreak of hostilities. What occasion was there for it? Both AGUINALDO and AGONCILLO ought to have known very well that a fortnight's delay would bring to them the final decision of the Washington Government, and that on the American side there was no intention of commencing hostilities. They ought to have been fully aware that whatever course the United States resolved to adopt would be communicated to them peacefully, and that they would be given full opportunity to endorse or reject it. In the face of that knowledge, why did they precipitate a collision? Two answers suggest themselves. The first is that the Filipinos resolved to anticipate the arrival of reinforcements from the United States, thinking that if they succeeded in getting possession of Manila, or even in affording conclusive proof of their military prowess, before the Paris Treaty went to the vote in the Washington Senate, the hands of the anti-annexationists would be greatly strengthened. That, of course, was a false forecast. Whatever the Senate might choose under peaceful circumstances, the honour of the country, after hostilities had begun, would forbid a choice capable of being interpreted in the light of a concession to armed force. Still, the Filipinos were not altogether without warrant for such a view. At Iloilo the Americans had quietly bowed to accomplished facts. General MILLAR had withdrawn without attempting to land because he found the place already in the occupation of the Filipinos. That experience might be repeated in Manila's case: the Americans might be unwilling to make any great effort for its recovery if once it fell into Filipino possession. Or, though falling short of that success, AGUINALDO and AGONCILLO might show that they possessed a force not to be conquered without heavy loss and sacrifice on America's part, and that they were irrevocably determined to fight for independence. Had they known America better, they would have avoided such an error.

The second explanation of the Filipinos' action is that their leaders did not really understand the situation in the United States, and imagined that they were being trifled with. This hypothesis raises the question whether General OTIS has been as tactful as he might have been. All accounts go to show that he treated the Filipinos with great reserve, if not with actual hauteur. The pleasant friendly intercourse which at first seemed likely to be established between the United States' officers and AGUINALDO's officials seems to have been exchanged for a condition of mutual aloofness after OTIS assumed the command, and there is also some reason to infer that Admiral DEWEY did not sympathise with the policy which his military colleague was pursuing. There must, of course, be great hesitation in forming any conclusions of this nature. We refer to them merely as contingencies suggested by seemingly well-founded rumours, and certainly not inconsistent with the issue, for it is hard to conceive the impossibility of keeping AGUINALDO and the other Filipino leaders in a contentedly expectant frame of mind, had they been treated graciously and diplomatically. On the other hand, a cold, repellent attitude on the part of the invaders may easily have betrayed the Filipinos into mistaken inferences about the mood of the American nation. Possibly there are no grounds for this view, but that it will be widely entertained, to General OTIS' cost, we have no doubt.

It will be alleged now, in fact it is alleged by a Japanese newspaper, that America is in a very equivocal position; that she has made a signal failure; that she has proved untrue to her professions of international humanity and justice, and that a long and arduous campaign is before her. Surely that is a pessimistic view. The United States has decided to take over the Philippines, but has not announced any decision as to the form of government to be set up there. It is scarcely conceivable that the American nation should reconcile itself to the task of imposing its rule upon the Filipinos by force of arms. They will be given an opportunity of self-government under American protection, and, if the experiment proves successful, no obstacle will be placed in the way of their practical independence. In matters of foreign policy America must of course exercise suzerainty, and she will naturally require a coaling station, but for the rest the islanders will probably be granted full autonomy. As for a long campaign, we do not anticipate anything of the kind. If America considered it necessary to treat the Filipinos as rebels, and to beat them to their knees before offering them terms, an arduous task would certainly be before her. But that is not likely to be her mood. All that she needs is to demonstrate the hopelessness of their attempting to wrest the islands from her grasp. It is possible that they have learned that lesson already. If not, they will very soon learn it, and an arrangement can then be effected without much difficulty. In fact, it would be a hasty judgment to conclude that this warlike incident has been altogether unfortunate. A little practical experience of American mettle and the quality of American fighting will render the Filipinos much more amenable than they might have been had they approached the negotiations under a mistaken conviction of their own invincibility. A great deal has been written, we may add, about the vicarious responsibility incurred by the United States towards AGUINALDO and AGONCILLO in consequence of encouragement which the two leaders received from the American Consuls in Singapore, Hongkong, and Manila, and it is difficult to avoid the conclusion that some indiscretion was committed by those officials. But there is the plainest evidence that Washington repeatedly warned them against any compromising steps. However, minor considerations of that nature disappear in the presence of the appeal that the Filipinos have made to the arbitrament of the sword. They have now nothing to rely on except American generosity. It will not prove a bad object of dependence.

IMPERIAL DIET.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 3RD.

HOUSE OF PEERS.

The House did not meet.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
NEW LEGISLATION.

The House met at 1.10 p.m., and, having adopted the amendments made by the Peers in the Government Bill for amending the Statutory Tariff and the Annexed Schedule, proceeded to deal with the following measures:—

Bill for levying Tonnage Dues. Passed with slight amendments.

Bill for the better Regulation of Lethal Weapons and Explosives. On the motion of Mr. Haseba Junko this measure was amended so as to be applicable to Fire Arms and Explosives only, and was passed in the amended form.

Bill (sent down from the Peers) relating to the Registration of Immovables. Passed.

Bill (sent down from the Peers) for amending the system of Medical Inspection of Ships. Passed.

Bill (private) for changing District Boundaries in Yehime Prefecture. Passed.

Representation (introduced by Mr. Inouye Kakugoro) for the despatch of 10 commercial and industrial students annually to China, India, and the Occident, each to be abroad for 5 years at a total cost of 7,000 yen for that period; the system to be continued for 10 years, and the aggregate outlay to be 100,000 yen per year. Passed.

Bill (private) for the Conservation of Temples and Shrines. Handed to a Special Committee.

REPRESENTATIONS.

Representation urging that experimental stations be established for testing the materials available as super-phosphates in Miyazaki Prefecture and the North-Eastern provinces. The introducer of this Representation pointed out that the farmers were much hampered by insufficiency in the supply of fertilizers, and had to rely more and more on imported articles for that purpose. It was understood, however, that Miyazaki and the North-Eastern provinces were more or less rich in mineral which might serve that end. The Representation was handed to a Special Committee.

Representation urging that the Government should adopt the policy of gradually selling the State forests and moors to the people. At present these properties give an insignificant revenue and are virtually useless to the nation. The population of the empire has increased by 10 millions since the year 1873, and the demand for charcoal and fire-wood has been proportionately augmented, to say nothing of the question of timber for building purposes. The State now owns forests and moors in 168,888 places, the total area being 19,125,000 acres, exclusive of Hokkaido and Okinawa. The gross revenue obtained from this vast tract of territory is a million yen, approximately, and the cost of collecting it is 620,000 yen, so that the Treasury profits to the extent of some 400,000 yen only. On the other hand, the forests and moors in the hands of the people measure 18,275,000 acres, and the tax paid on them is 610,000 yen annually, so that the people can afford to pay a tax fifty per cent. greater than the whole profit obtained from a larger extent of forest lands under official management. Such results pointed plainly to the expediency of transferring the State forests and moors to private ownership. The Representation was handed to a Special Committee.

Mr. Hoshi Matsushiro called attention to the fact that many days had elapsed since the Bills relating to a House Tax, the Soy Tax, and the Postal Rates were handed to Special Committees, but no report had yet been presented to the House with reference to these measures. The House rose at 3.05 p.m.

SATURDAY, FEB. 4TH.

HOUSE OF PEERS.

The House of Peers met at 10.30 a.m.

FIRST READINGS.

Two Government Bills (sent up from the Lower House) were read for the first time and handed to Special Committees; namely, a Bill for changing the Capital Fund Account of the Tobacco Monopoly, and a Bill for granting State Aid to the Bank of Formosa.

JUDICIAL MATTERS.

The Government Bill (sent up from the Lower House) for effecting certain changes in the location, etc., of Courts of Law was favourably reported on by the Special Committee, and passed.

A private Bill (sent up from the Lower House) for extending the limits of suits judiciable by the Administrative Court was read and handed to a Special Committee, the Government Delegate having spoken in opposition to the measure as premature. The object of this Bill, as already explained in reporting the Proceedings of the Lower House, is to generalize the definition of complaints that may be carried to the Administrative Court, whereas the Government maintains that the system of particularization is better suited to the present condition of the Japanese people.

LOSSES THROUGH FIRE—LIABILITY.

The first reading was then taken of a private Bill (sent up from the Lower House) for altering the new Civil Code in the sense of removing the responsibility it imposes on the occupants of Houses where conflagrations break out. This Bill, as originally presented to the House of Representatives, proposed simply that the Article of the Civil Code referring to the question should be supplemented by a proviso excepting conflagrations from the category of incidents in connexion with which compensation may be claimed from their originators. The Lower House adopted the principle of the amendment, but added a clause that exemption from the obligation to make compensation could not be claimed when gross culpability was chargeable against the occupant of the house where the fire broke out. (In reporting the Proceedings of the Lower House, we erroneously interpreted this added clause by making it refer to "heavy loss" instead of "gross culpability.")

The Government Delegate explained that this problem of responsibility in connexion with fires had not escaped the attention of the Committee appointed to revise the Code. It had received the fullest consideration, and the Committee's final decision had been that no difference of principle existed between responsibility for losses, in general, suffered through the neglect or defaults of others, and responsibility for losses resulting from the particular calamity of a conflagration. The difference was one of degree only. In the majority of cases, losses entailed by conflagrations were comparatively great, and responsibility for them would be correspondingly heavy. But that did not constitute a reason for excepting them from the general category. On the contrary, from the point of view of security of property, the greater the danger, the more imperative the duty of guarding against it, and the heavier should be the penalty for neglecting that duty. The Government, therefore, opposed the projected change on principle, and was not swayed by any petty objection to changing the Code on the very morning of its operation. A wise change could not be made too soon, but this change, which the House was now asked to make, did not seem wise. He further explained (in answer to a question) that the "gross culpability" mentioned in the clause added by the Lower House, was understood to refer to palpable and flagrant neglect of the precautions prescribed by the police as safeguards against fire.

The Bill was handed to a Special Committee.

ASSOCIATIONS OF MEDICAL MEN.

Viscount Tani, Chairman of the Special Committee, reported on the private Bill (sent up from the Lower House) organizing Associations of Medical Men. The members of the Committee had been equally divided, four for and four against the Bill, and the Chairman had given the casting vote in opposition to it. The Viscount made a detailed statement of the views entertained by the advocates and the opponents of the measure. The former held, primarily, that these Associations would add greatly to the facilities for preventing epidemics and for limiting their spread, since concealment would be rendered more difficult and concerted measures could be taken more readily. To that it was answered that the official precautions already operative against concealment seemed sufficient, and that the sanitary boards organized by the Government were competent to adopt all necessary measures. It was urged, in the next place, that the Associations would exercise a wholesome restraint upon the conduct of medical men, some of whom were known to extort money from their patients by exaggerating the nature of the latter's maladies, and to adopt other courses derogatory to the profession. The reply was that no valid reason existed for supposing that the proposed Associations could exercise any deterrent scrutiny in such matters without arrogating powers which could not be properly entrusted to them. A third argument was that the Associations would enable the toll of medical men to be compiled and kept with greater accuracy; but that, after all, seemed a petty consideration compared with the inconvenience and expense that compulsory membership of the Associations might entail. Finally, with regard to mixed residence and the desirability of protecting the people against being exploited by foreign charlatans, the danger seemed chimerical, and, at any rate, the law operated equally for the restraint of all; no one was entitled to practise medicine without a diploma. The diplomas held by foreigners were recognised, as well as the foreign diplomas held by Japanese, and there was no reason to adopt any special precautions. Speaking for himself, the Viscount denounced the agitation which had been carried on among the members in the interests of the Bill, and declared that nothing of the kind had previously occurred in the House.

Dr. Nagayo Senmai supported the Bill, but the feeling of the House was evidently against it, and its opponents were strengthened by an anonymous circular which had been distributed in its favour, and by the fact that its provisions clashed with those of the law now in operation. Finally the closure was moved, and a signed ballot being taken, 121 voted against the Bill and 38 for it.

KASHII SHRINE.

A Representation, urging that State aid be granted for rebuilding the national shrine of Kashii in Chikuzen, was then adopted without debate, having been fully explained at a previous sitting, and the House rose at 3 p.m.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 6TH.

HOUSE OF PEERS.

The House met at 10.15 a.m.

THE USE OF SEALS.

A Government Bill was read for the first time relating to the use of Seals (matzu-in) by Foreigners on Legal Documents and to Succour in Litigation where foreigners are concerned. The object of this Bill is to enable foreigners to dispenes with seals and confine themselves to signatures on documents relating to civil suits; and, further, to modify the said Article of the Code of Civil Procedure. That Article provides that "a foreigner can claim succour in litigation in so far only as by treaty or by the laws of his State a Japanese could in a similar case obtain such succour." It is further provided, in Art. 93, that a party making a motion for succour—i.e. seeking permission to sue in forma pauperis—must produce a certificate issued by the Head of the competent Sai, Cho, or Son declaring the insufficiency of his resources for the payment of costs and giving other particulars. The Bill brings foreigners under the same system, and adds that where a foreigner has no residence or domicile in Japan, the necessary certificate must be obtained from the local authorities of the place where he has his residence or domicile, and must be endorsed by his Consul in Japan. Further, if, although having a residence or domicile in Japan, it is impossible for him to obtain the necessary certificate from the Head of the competent Sai, Cho, or Son, he may substitute a certificate procured, as above, from his own country. The Government Delegate explained that there was no idea of granting to foreigners any privileges not enjoyed by Japanese, but the provisions of this Bill were dictated simply by a spirit of equity. The Bill was handed to a special committee.

TOBACCO MONOPOLY.

The Second Reading of the Government Bill (sent up from the Lower House) for amending the Tobacco Monopoly Law, in the sense of extending the Monopoly to imported tobacco, was voted.

With reference to this Bill, Mr. Kaneko Kentaro inquired what course would be pursued with respect to foreign importers. The amended Law was to come into operation in six months. During that interval, it was conceivable that large quantities of leaf might be imported by foreigners and stored in the Bonded Warehouses as an escape to the restrictions imposed by the Law. Considerable supplies might thus be obtained, and gradually sold to manufacturers. Would the Government take over such tobacco, under the power created by this law, or would it be content to levy upon it the amended duty of 100 per cent. ad valorem?

The Government Delegate replied that tobacco stored in a bonded warehouse at the time when the law became operative, would be regarded as in transit.

The Second Reading of the Bill was deferred until the regular number of days should elapse.

BANK OF JAPAN.

Two Government Bills (sent up from the Lower House) relating to the Bank of Japan were then passed. The first, as originally drafted, had provided for a tax on the net profits of the Bank, but the House of Representatives had amended it in the sense of imposing a tax of 1½ per cent. on the Bank's note issues. The Peers introduced a further amendment, reducing the tax to 1 per cent. The second Bill was for raising the legal limit of note issues from 85 million yen to 120 million.

PATENTS

The Special Committee's reports on the amended Law of Patents, Law of Designs, and Law of Trade Marks were then made, and the three Bills were passed.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT.

A private Bill was read, for the first time, for amending the Local Government System. According to the present Law, the term of membership of City and Prefecture Assemblies is 4 years, and the members are elected one half at a time, the elections being held every second year. The Bill proposes to abolish this biennial system and have only one election in 4 years. While the introducer was offering explanations, the House was counted out at 12.10 p.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House met at 1.10 p.m.

ATTACKING THE GOVERNMENT.

Mr. Takagi Masatoshi presented some questions on the subject of finance, and seized the opportunity to make a violent attack on the Government, comparing it to a dissolute youth, and declaring that its professions about regulating the finances were a mere pretext for imposing fresh taxes.

NEW BILLS.

The Second Readings of the Government Bills for amending the Stamp Tax Law and the Business Tax Law were then taken, and both measures were passed, with slight amendments.

A private Bill for amending the Agricultural and Industrial Banks Law was read for the first time and handed to a Special Committee. The Bill provides that the management of communal moneys may be entrusted to these Banks, and that they shall have power to issue unregistered—or registered if desired—interest-bearing debentures of 10 yen larger denominations, for the better convenience of small capitalists.

The first reading of a Government Bill for amending the Formosa Bank Laws was next taken. It provides that, in lieu of the present unregistered night bills redeemable with silver, the Bank may issue bank-notes similarly redeemable with silver and of any denomination down to one yen, the present inferior limit—five yen—of the night bills being found inconvenient. The Bill was handed to a Special Committee.

The Special Committee presented a favourable report on the private Bill for exempting from local land rates all lands upon which an increased national tax is to be levied under the special six year system, and the House passed the Bill without debate.

The following two measures were passed, after a few questions had been asked:—A private Bill for granting State aid, to the extent of 150,000 yen annually, to Experimental Agricultural Stations in Cities and Prefectures, and a private Bill for granting State Aid to Marine Products Experimental and Instruction stations in Cities and Prefectures.

A private Bill for imposing a duty of 50 per cent. ad valorem on all imported foreign lacquer juice, including Chinese, was read for the first time and handed to a Special Committee. Its introducer explained that the use of foreign lacquer tended to impair the quality of Japanese lacquer, and that the industry was gradually declining.

In contrast to the above, a Petition was presented—but its discussion postponed by desire—for exempting Chinese lacquer juice from import duty, on the ground that it was essential to Japanese lacquer manufacturers.

AN ADDRESS TO THE THRONE WITHDRAWN.

The next measure on the Order was an Address to the Throne praying that His Majesty would take measures to punish Viscount Watanabe, President of the Board of Audit, for abuse of authority in removing 4 members of the Board under pretext of their physical incapacity. Mr. Abe Iwane, on behalf of the signatories, said that, as Viscount Watanabe had resigned, the Address might be withdrawn, but it had been allowed to come before the House as a warning to officials in general.

Two Petitions were then adopted for presentation to the Government, one praying that some measure of relief should be extended to the sufferers by the poison of the Ashio copper mine; the second, asking that Matsuko (in Tango) be declared a commercial port, in view of the importance the place would assume after the completion of the Siberian Railway.

The House rose at 3.50 p.m.

TUESDAY, FEB. 7TH.

HOUSE OF PEERS.

The House met at 10.20 a.m.

AN OLD ACCOUNT.

Baron Ogawa called attention to the fact that the settled accounts of income and expenditure for the War of 1894-5 had not yet been submitted to the Diet, and expressed a hope that no further delay would take place.

TONNAGE DUES.

The Government Bill (sent up from the Lower House) for levying Tonnage Dues, was read for the first time, and handed to a Special Committee, the Government Delegate explaining that the Government opposed the amendments made by the Lower House, and that the revenue which the measure was expected to yield at the original rates was 480,000 yen annually.

COMMITTEE WORK.

The following Government Bills (sent up from the Lower House) were read and handed to Special Committees:—

Bill for the Regulation of Fire Arms and Explosives. The Government Delegate said that if the amendments effected by the House of Representatives were endorsed by the Upper, it would be necessary to enact a special law for the regulation of cutting and thrusting weapons (N.B.—The Lower House had altered the Bill so that, instead of applying to lethal weapons, in general, its scope was limited to firearms.)

Bill relating to the Registration of Immovable Property. The Minister of Justice explained that, according to the provisions of the new Civil Code, this Bill was necessary for protecting the interests of third parties; and added that, as the operation of the proposed Law would entail some outlay and necessitate the introduction of a supplementary budget, expedition was desirable.

Bill relating to the raising of loans in foreign markets.

COPYRIGHT

Mr. Kato Hiroyuki, on behalf of the Special Committee, reported in favour of the Copyright Law. In view of the advantage that Japan derived by translating foreign books, many people were of the opinion that this Law should not be enacted since, under its provisions, translations as well as reproductions would be a violation of copyright. However, the French Government pressed very strenuously for legislation, and in connexion with Treaty Revision Japan had incurred an obligation to join the Berne Convention.

The House voted for the Second Reading, and proceeded to discuss the Bill clause by clause, and finally passed it with some amendments proposed by the Committee and by Mr. Iwano.

PRIVATE BILLS

A private Bill (sent up from the Lower House), relating to a change of boundaries in Ehime Prefecture, was handed to a Special Committee, as were two Private Bills for amending the system of local government, in the matter of electing members of local assemblies. The term of membership of City and Prefectural Assemblies is 4 years, but the members are not elected simultaneously, one half being elected every second year. In the case of District Assemblies the term of membership is 6 years, and the election of one half of the members takes place every third year. The Bills propose to make the term uniform, namely, 4 years, and to elect the whole of the members at one time.

EDUCATION.

Marquis Kuroda introduced a Representation calling upon the Government to adopt some vigorous measures for improving the educational system, in the sense of improving the quality of school teachers, increasing their number, removing the Education Department beyond the range of political changes, and generally developing educational facilities. The discussion of the Representation was postponed, however, until the next sitting, and the House rose at 1.50 p.m.

WEDNESDAY, FEB. 8TH.

HOUSE OF PEERS.

The House met at 10.10 a.m.

DEATH OF MR. HARA.

The President announced the death of Mr. Hara Zensaburo, on the 6th instant, and the House voted that a message of condolence be sent to his family.

GOVERNMENT BILLS.

The following Government Bills (sent up from the Lower House) were passed:—Bill for abolishing the system of State purchase of sugar in Okinawa, and the Bill for amending the Leaf Tobacco Monopoly Law in the sense of extending the monopoly to imported tobacco.

NATIONAL EDUCATION.

Marquis Kuroda, in an eloquent and lengthy speech, introduced a Representation calling upon the Government to adopt a more liberal policy towards education. His main argument was that education constituted the basis of all national successes. The valour of Japan's soldiers and the skill of her generals had helped materially to secure the victory over China, but the real strength of the Army and Navy had lain in superior education. It had been a struggle of educated men against uneducated. The great German Captain, Moltke, had said that Germany's success against France was won in the class rooms of the primary schools, and the Marquis believed that the same might be truly said of Japan's victory over China. Nevertheless, the post bellum programme was directed solely to expansion of armaments and development of industry, excellent objects in themselves, but certainly not worthy to take precedence of education.

Viscount Tani strongly supported the Representation. He declared that armaments expansion should come in the sequel of the encouragement of education, whereas in Japan that order was reversed. He was in a position to submit to the House 67 instances demonstrating the faultiness of the present system of education, but he felt convinced that all were agreed as to the necessity of reform, and that no lengthy appeal was required.

Mr. Kato Hiroyuki spoke in the same sense. He had recently been questioned by a foreigner about Japan's universities, and had been obliged to give a humiliating answer. In Germany 9 per cent. of the total cost of education was borne by the State; in Bavaria, 10 per cent.; in France, 6; in Saxony, 14; and even in England, the land, par excellence, of individual effort, the percentage was 9. In Japan, on the contrary, the figure was 2 per cent.

Count Kabayama, Minister of State for Education, being invited to make a statement of the Government's views, expressed general assent with the object of the Representation. He was not disposed to regard educational progress as altogether unsatisfactory, seeing that the percentage of school age children attending school had increased from 50 in 1895 to 64 in 1898, nor could he forget that success in such a field must always be a matter of slow achievement. It was, however, undeniable that a deficiency of teachers existed to the extent of 26,000, and that in many respects improvement was called for. So far as he himself was concerned, he could promise to spare no efforts, but his time in office had been short, and he had not yet obtained all the necessary information. It seemed to him, however, that while technical education was comparatively easy to impart, moral education was at once more important and more difficult, and to that end special efforts should be directed. His Excellency complained much of the excisions made by the Lower House in the appropriations for the Department of Education, especially the cutting out of the item for Local Inspectors (chiho shigakushan), who were an essential factor of the system.

Mr. Kubota Yuzuru applauded the sentiments expressed by the Minister, though not professing to be fully satisfied with his exposé of policy. However, he gathered that His Excellency endorsed the Representation, which was a matter for congratulation. At the same time, it must be confessed that every holder of the portfolio of Education entertained most excellent intentions on the subject of reform. Unfortunately, none had carried his principles into practice. They relied on Count Kabayama to prove an exception to the rule.

The closure having been put and carried, the Representation received an almost unanimous vote.

PETITIONS PROCEDURE.

Biron Suyematsu introduced a Resolution for imposing closer limits on the House's procedure with regard to Petitions. He argued that, under the prevailing system, the Government had ceased to carry any weight, since every Petition was transmitted whether for its own sake or for purposes of reference. The change he advocated was that no Petition should be adopted for presentation unless the House approved of its intention and object, and that all others submitted by the Petitions Committee, but not so approved by the House, should be merely placed in the archives for purposes of reference.

After a brief debate the House rejected the Resolution, and rose at 3 p.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House met at 1.30 p.m.

QUESTIONS.

Mr. Tokumasa Genaro presented Questions as to the Government's policy (1) towards foreigners in general; (2) towards the question of free labourers in Australia; and (3) towards the question of contract labourers in Hawaii.

THE NIPPON SINKED TAX.

The House then proceeded to consider the amendments made by the Peers in the Bill for taxing the Bank of Japan.

Mr. Ooka Ikuzo held that this was a matter touching the financial action of the House very closely, and demanding most careful consideration. They had also to remember that considerable difficulty confronted the Administration in finding convenient sources of revenue, and that at such a time the Upper House's proposal to reduce the Bank's tax from 1½ to 1 per cent. was no trifling matter. He wished to hear the views of the Government Delegate.

The Government Delegate said that the change would not entail any serious inconvenience, since a tax of 5 per cent. would be levied on all the Bank's note issues over and above 85 million yen.

Mr. Shimada Saburo thought that there were many points in the Government's relations with the Bank calling for close investigation. He moved that the House postpone the discussion of the Peers' amendments.

Mr. Hoshi Toru opposed the motion, but the House endorsed it by a large majority.

FORMOSA.

The Special Committee reported favourably on the Government Bill for granting to litigants in Formosa the right of appeal to the Supreme Court in Japan, but recommended an alteration in the sense of making it competent for the Supreme Court to order retrial by a Court of Appeal other than that which had already tried the case.

The Government Delegate opposed the change, but Mr. Seki Naohiko advocated it, on the ground that to have a case retried by a tribunal which had already adjudicated it was contrary to the spirit of the Codes. The House adopted the Committee's amendment, but, on the motion of Mr. Hoshi Toru, deferred the final discussion of the measure.

BANKING LAW.

The Government Bill for changing the Agricultural and Industrial Banks Law was then passed.

THE LAW OF ELECTION.

Mr. Hoshi Toru made an urgency motion that the Government Bill for amending the Law of Election for the House of Representatives, which had been submitted that day to the House, should, in view of its importance, be placed at once upon the Order of the Day. The House agreed, and the Bill was read for the first time. The principal differences between its provisions and those of the present Law are that (1) the Election Districts are to be Cities, Prefectures, Towns, and Islands; (2) the number of members will be increased from 300 to 445; (3) Hokkaido is enfranchised, one member each being allotted to Sapporo, Hakodate, and Otaru; (4) instead of opening the balloting boxes at the Election Place, they are to be opened at a special place, and the result reported to the Election Chief Official; (5) the Headmen of Districts cease to be Election Chiefs and become Directors of Places for Opening Ballots (Kaiyo Kwanri-sa), and the Governors of Cities and Prefectures become Election Chiefs; (6) the money qualification for an elector (which is now an annual payment of 15 yen of national taxes, for a period of at least a year previously to registration, or 3 years in the case of Income Tax) is changed to 5 yen of Land Tax, for a period of at least a year, and 3 yen of Income Tax or Business Tax for a period of at least 2 years; (7) all monetary qualification is dispensed with in the case of candidates for election; (8) a clause is added denying the franchise, as well as the privilege of offering themselves as candidates, to students of all schools, state, public, or private; denying the privilege of candidature to officers of companies or legal persons in receipt of Government support, to Government contractors, to officers of companies or legal persons acting as Government contractors, and to teachers in Primary Schools, as well as Buddhist Priests and Shinto Officials, but providing that in the case of the last three eligibility shall be acquired six months after they cease to hold the offices in respect of which the veto is enacted; (9) the date for revising the registers is changed from April 1st to January 1st; (10) unavoidable circumstances may be pleaded to remove the disqualification resulting from failure to register by the appointed date; (11) the date of a general election, now fixed for July 1st, is left to be determined by Imperial Ordinance; (12) the present system of signed and plural ballots is changed for unsigned and single ballots; (13) a clause is added, providing that any person not able himself to write the name of the candidate for whom he votes, can not exercise the franchise; (14) the present system of a simple majority is amended, and it is ruled that candidates elected at a first ballot must have votes aggregating at least one-fifth of the total number of registered voters, but that, in the case of second ballots, no such restriction shall apply; (15) the Election Chief is to be defendant in an appeal against the legality of an election, and other amendments are introduced in this section.

On the motion of Mr. Hoshi, the Bill was handed to a Special Committee of 27.

FISHERY ENCOURAGEMENT.

A private Bill was then read for amending the Law of Encouragement to Vessels engaged in Fishing on the High Seas. The present system is that steam vessels of at least 100 tons (registered) and sailing vessels of at least 60 tons, receive 5 yen per ton per year. The Bill proposes to reduce the limit for steamers to 50 tons and that for sailing vessels to 30 tons, gross measurement in each case, and to raise the rate of encouragement to 15 yen in the case of steamers and 10 yen in the case of sailing vessels. The Bill was handed to a Special Committee, as was also a Petition received from the Osaka Chamber of Commerce, praying that the regulation requiring all payments to the Treasury to be made in cash, whether in the case of taxes, duties, or security by contractors, should be amended so as to allow such payments to be made in bank cheques or deposit notes.

The House rose at 3.30 p.m.

THE BOOK-SHELF.

A Romance of Summer Seas, a novel, by Miss VERA ANNE JEFFERSON DAVIS.

Miss DAVIS, familiarly known as "Winnie Davis," was a daughter of Jefferson Davis, President of the Confederate States of America. On the death of her father, she added his name as above in order to continue it, and is said to have devoted herself for the same reason to maidenhood. She was born in 1864, and was, therefore, a babe in long dresses when her father was captured by the Federal troops. She was also known as the "Daughter of the Confederacy." A few years ago she made a trip to the Orient, and then she evidently caught the idea of this novel, dealing with high life in India, China, and Japan. It is not, however, at all a book to be commended. Miss Davis is said to have written one novel, "The Veiled Doctor," of some literary value. She died last year.

THE CONFUSED CRITIC.

A DIALOGUE.

H. (on his way back from the Club, where he has met an ex-Consular official)—This is fine! What material for a paragraph!

M.—You seem elated. What's up?

H.—Such a bit of luck! I've been told of "a defect that has not been pointed out before" in "the enormously puffed Japanese Codes."

M.—Made a discovery, have you? Which Code do you mean?

H.—The Code of Criminal Procedure. Just fancy, "the Courts in Japan have no power vested in them by law to grant an injunction to restrain, though both English and American Courts have the right," and "are frequently called upon to exercise it in the interests of justice." "It will scarcely be thought to be true, but the Courts in Japan have no such power."

M.—No power to grant an injunction to restrain! Are you sure?

H.—Yes, quite sure. "When tested by actual practice the Codes are found wanting."

M.—I recommend you to look at the fourth chapter of the sixth book of the Code of Civil Procedure. The 27 articles that it contains are devoted solely to the subjects of provisional seizure and provisional disposition.

H.—Don't talk to me. "You are simply discharging your duty of attempting to discredit the foreign press as much as may be in your power."

M.—Try to keep your hair on, old man. It strikes me that the best way for the foreign press to avoid discredit is to avoid making errors. Your own ignorance of the Code is your trouble in the present instance.

H.—You're always "falling foul of me." But I admit that my statement about the power to grant an injunction "appears to be a little erroneous."

M.—"A little erroneous" is good. Do you call it "a little error" to say that a subject to which 27 articles in a Code are devoted is not mentioned at all in the Code?

H.—Well "the error charged is not my own, but is that of a gentleman who is entitled to be considered learned in the law, who had consulted two others similarly qualified, who informed him that there would be no use applying for an injunction on the ground that the Court has no authority to grant it, as there is no legal provision in existence to that effect."

M.—Quite a house that Jack built chain of hearsay. I thought you said that the Code had been "tested by actual practice."

H.—Well, "had I not been assured by a gentleman of legal education that the case stood as represented, I should have exercised inquiry and more caution in giving the statement made by him. But I was thrown off my guard."

M.—You have not examined the Code then? Don't you think it would be a prudent preliminary to do so before condemning it?

(Later, H. again jubilant.)

H.—Hi! Here you! Since I made my first assertion and followed it by an apology for error, "I have been able to refer to a copy of the Code of Civil Procedure, and I find that my original statement was substantially correct. The Courts in Japan have no power whatever to grant permanent injunctions. What they appear to possess enables them to grant orders for provisional seizures or attachments only. I was nearer right than you, who blundered into confounding the exercise of temporary provisional power with the granting of injunctions in general."

M.—Come, come, my friend. You never said a word originally about "permanent" injunctions. Your actual statement was that "the Courts in Japan have no power vested in them by law to grant an injunction to restrain." This distinction that you now set up between "permanent" and "provisional" is altogether an after-thought. We can't be expected to discover your meaning from your mumbling, you know. If you were thinking of "permanent injunction," why did you confess and apologize for your error when I called your attention to articles explicitly treating of "provisional seizure" and "provisional disposition"?

H.—Don't be coming over me with your "affectation of superiority."

M.—There, there! Keep cool. Tell us what you mean by a permanent injunction.

H.—I mean "the power of granting a final and lasting injunction." That is to say "a final order to enjoin a person or persons or corporations from doing certain acts."

M.—Let me understand you clearly. Suppose that I bring a suit against a man in respect of a certain act of his which I regard as a violation of my private rights. You admit that a Japanese Court has competence to restrain him from continuing to perform that act pending its decision in my suit?

H.—Yes, but that is only a provisional injunction.

M.—Precisely. But neither an English nor an American Court could do more than restrain provisionally until the rights and wrongs of the case were decided, could it?

H.—No. I suppose not.

M.—Very well. Now let us advance a step, and assume that the Court gives judgment in my favour. In other words, it finds that the act of which I complain is really a violation of my rights. Do you mean to assert that the Court has no competence to give effect to its finding?

H.—You "have shifted your ground." The power of the Court to enforce its judgment is not in question.

M.—Pardon me. You say that the Court has no power to grant a final injunction. If it can accomplish the same end by other means, is not justice satisfied? If it has no means of accomplishing that end, then we arrive at the conclusion that, although a Japanese Court is competent to restrain a defendant from performing a certain act while the legality of the act is uncertain, it has no competence to prevent him from performing the act after its illegality is definitely decided.

H.—I say that the word "injunction" is not to be found in Japanese law.

M.—Well, in the word "electrocute" found in English law, or the word "guillotine" in American law?

H.—Of course not. Your talk reminds me of the lines:

"A little knowledge is a dangerous thing,
"Duck deep at taste not the Hyperion spring?"

M.—Very classical and white-haired! The principle you acted on, wasn't it, when you studied the Code so carefully before you were "thrown off your guard" by the "gentleman of legal education?"

H.—"You are discharging your duty of attempting to discredit the foreign press."

M.—Well, well! You admit that "electrocute" doesn't appear in English law or "guillotine" in American law. Would a citizen of New York State be justified in inferring from the absence of the latter word that the English Courts are not competent to condemn a man to death, and would a Frenchman be right if he concluded that an American Judge has no power to pass a capital sentence?

H.—Certainly not.

M.—Don't you see, then, that a Japanese Court may be able to grant all the relief sanctioned by its judgments although it does not proceed by the Anglo-Saxon form of an "injunction?"

H.—I don't consider it necessary to go on battling with you.

M.—Well, perhaps you will yourself state an illustrative case.

H.—Here is one, furnished by my friend "the gentleman learned in the law:"—"In England or America I can pray for a final injunction against a certain person or persons trespassing on my ground. The Court will then hear the case as an injunction, and if it thinks there is sufficient reason, will grant a final and permanent injunction against the defendant doing what is complained of. There is in Japan no Court or Judge who has in himself the right or power to grant such an injunction."

M.—Good. Now we have something to fix our ideas. Permit me at this point to submit a question to your learned friend through you. Does he "mean to assert that Japanese Courts have no power to enforce their judgments?"

H.—"Of course he does not."

M.—Very well. Now look here. (M. points out the precise provisions of Japanese law which enable a suitor to obtain a Court's judgment with regard to trespass, and points out also the provisions which perpetually secure the execution of the judgment.) You perceive now, don't you, that your complaint about the absence of the term "injunction" is absolutely meaningless unless you intend to affirm that a Japanese Court can not enforce its judgments by any formula other than an injunction?

H.—"Nothing that you say invalidates my contention." According to you, it is necessary to bring an action in order to obtain in Japan the same end compassed by means of a permanent injunction in England or America.

M.—Why of course it is. What do you expect?

H.—Pooh! "To await the result of success in an action would be altogether too slow a procedure in instances where a peremptory action is requisite, as is frequently the case when a Court is asked to interfere by granting an injunction."

M.—Hullo! "To await the result of success in an action would be altogether too slow a procedure." Do you mean to say that in England or America a suitor can obtain a permanent injunction without awaiting success in an action? Do you mean to say that an Englishman or an American can get a legal tribunal to protect his alleged rights without examining whether he has any real rights at all?

H.—I don't consider it necessary to go on battling with you on the subject of the defects in Japanese law to which I originally called attention.

M.—Yes, yes, quite so. But, after all what do you mean. You say that to await the result of success in an action would be altogether too slow a procedure. You must mean one of two things; either that a man should be entitled to get what he wants from a Japanese Law Court without a trial, or that a Japanese Law Court, having given a verdict in a suitor's favour, is without the machinery to make its verdict immediately operative.

H.—I never expressed any doubt that the Japanese Courts have the power to enforce their own judgments.

M.—But if they have the power, what do you mean by saying that "it would be altogether too slow to await the result of success in an action?"

H.—"You are discharging your duty of attempting to discredit the foreign press as much as may be in your power."

M.—Well, let us take your own case of trespass. Do you mean to allege that after a Japanese Court has decided that certain persons have no right to enter your ground, they can continue to enter it with impunity?

H.—"You are misusing my learned friend's case entirely round." In his case, "the right to enter, or not to enter, a man's ground was not the question at all. It was simply stated that a permanent injunction could be obtained in a U. S. Court against any one trespassing on plaintiff's ground, and not that a decision could be obtained whether this person or persons had the right or not to do so."

M.—Oh, come. That is just a little too much. Your learned friend's words were "I can pray for a final injunction against a certain person or persons trespassing on my ground." Pray how is a Court to grant such an injunction without determining whether the person or persons have or have not a right to enter the ground?

H.—"You are giving the cases an entirely different aspect, and what you say only goes to confirm my former assertion."

M.—Certainly. If by your former assertion you mean your admission that you were led into error, I entirely agree with you. You have tied yourself up effectually in that tangled web which, as the proverb says, is invariably woven by a certain practice, and you have been obliged at last to seek asylum in the subterfuge that to accuse a man of trespassing on one's ground is entirely different from denying that he has a right to enter it. You ought to compile a code, H. Its pages would surely overflow with that Hyperion spring which, quaffed in excess, leads to insanity.

H—You are a venal, shameless person. I won't argue with you any more.

WEDDING IN YOKOHAMA.

The nuptials of Miss Eliza (Elsie) Templeton Johnstone, eldest daughter of Mr. James Johnstone, of Yokohama, and Mr. James Leslie Robertson, of Kobe, were happily celebrated at Christ Church, Yokohama, on Monday afternoon. The sacred fane was transformed for the occasion into a grove of leathery bamboo, while the flowers of the season decorated the stalls, font and altar rails. A large congregation assembled and before the arrival of the bridal party Mr. W. K. Vincent played some of the wedding music from Lohengrin; he afterwards gave Mendelssohn's "Wedding March" in brilliant style. The bridegroom, who was accompanied by Mr. John McArthur, as best-man, was punctual in arriving, but he had not long to await the coming of the bride. She was escorted up the aisle by her father. Her dress was a beautiful confection in white satin and chiffon, the front being handsomely embroidered in white wistaria. A wreath of orange blossoms supported her full bridal veil, and sprays of flowers were draped over the long train. The bridesmaids were Miss Reah Kenderdine and Miss Muriel Cain. They were attired in white frocks of cor du roi cloth and wore white picture hats with one pink bow beneath the rim. Each carried a shepherd's crook adorned with flowers, and they wore gold brooches bearing their initials in pearls, the gifts of the bridegroom. The ceremony was performed by the Rector, the Rev. E. Champneys Irwine, M.A. After the service a reception was held at Mr. Johnstone's house on the Bluff, which was largely attended. The happy pair subsequently left for Tokyo en route to Miyazaki, where the honeymoon is being spent.

THE FUNERAL OF MR. KEIL.

If it be blessed to sink into the grave amid honour, love, and troops of friends, one's memory revered and loss mourned in all sincerity by a whole community, then the death of Mr. Otto Keil, tragic as were its circumstances, cannot be deemed an unhappy one. Seldom, perhaps never, in the Treaty Port's history has a more remarkable demonstration taken place in Yokohama than that which last Saturday afternoon marked the final act in the sad affair with which the community were startled on Tuesday. It was an eloquent testimony to the character of Mr. Keil and to the general esteem in which he was held. All—from the old and tried friends who had known him through all the stress of twenty years' business life in the East to the youngster just arrived from home, but long enough in Yokohama to have had a friendly word or received a good turn from one whose kindness was broad as the ocean—all were represented at the beautiful ceremony with which the craftsmen of the great Masonic brotherhood to which Mr. Keil belonged sought to do him honour. It was a most impressive ritual, solemn, but full of comfort and of the spirit of boundless charity with which the deceased was animated in his life. Masons were of course present in great numbers, but the attendance was not limited to them. Nearly every prominent resident, in fact, and many visitors from Tokyo, were present either at the Masonic Hall or at the graveside; and many ladies were also to be noticed. To accommodate as many persons as possible the folding doors dividing the large from the small hall in Keil's Building were thrown open, but in spite of this the seating facilities were quite inadequate; the hall, the corridors, and even part of the staircase were crowded.

The hall was draped in black; crape streamers hung from the pillars, and the archway between the two halls was hung with black cloth spotted with white, emblematic in Masonic imagery, of tears. Beneath this was a pedestal on which was placed the bronze vase—provided by Dr. Eldridge—containing the ashes of the deceased, whose body had been cremated on Thursday night. Beside the urn lay the dead Mason's purple and gold sheathed sword of office, the Rose Croix of the 18th Degree, and his two jewels of the 33rd degree. Above the altar, the frame veiled in crape, the portrait of Mr. Keil—a speaking likeness—looked down on the sad scene. Before the ceremony commenced the organist, Worshipful Brother Griffin, played solemn music which formed an appropriate prelude to the impressive service that followed. It was performed by the members of the Scottish Rite, some twelve in number, the different prayers and exhortations being delivered by Dr. Eldridge, Rev. J. G. Cleveland, Rev. E. C. Irwine, and Wor. Bros. Crane and Clarke. Into the details of the ritual we cannot go; suffice it to say that the charges and exhortations, and the exhibition of "the holy symbol of the Rosy Cross" of the 18th Degree, made up a most picturesque, impressive, and touching ceremony. When it was over, to the mournful accompaniment of that masterpiece of dirges, the Dead March in Saul, the urn was borne out by the knights of the Order, and, with the many scores of wreaths that had been sent, started on its journey to the Cemetery.

At the head of the cortege was Dr. Eldridge, of the 32nd Degree, who carried the deceased Legate's purple and gilded sword of the 33rd degree. The bearers were Worshipful Brothers Irwine, Clarke, Crane, and Cleveland, and after came Worshipful Brother Langfeldt, who was the only member of the 33rd degree able to follow. Worshipful Brother Gowey, the American Consul General, being absent through illness. Worshipful Brother Reitz, Wor. Bro. John W. Hall, Mr. H. C. Litchfield, Mr. J. F. Lowder, Mr. R. D. Robison, Mr. M. Kirkwood, and a large body of Masons and of the general public followed.

The service at the graveside was commenced by Dr. Eldridge, during whose exhortation the Rosy Cross was again exhibited, and then the Rev. E. Champneys Irwine said the Lord's Prayer.

Dr. Eldridge then delivered the following address:—

Brethren and fellow residents,—A few short weeks ago it was my pleasant task, on behalf of the entire Masonic fraternity of Japan, to present to the friend and brother, near whose ashes we now stand, a token of their esteem and love. To-day, by his grave, speaking not only as a Mason, but, equally as a member of the community in which so many years of his life were spent, I would testify to the affection and respect in which our deceased friend was held by all who knew him—and who is here that did not know him? To his wide-spread and abounding charities, and his fatherly care, continuing through long years, for the widow and the orphan bear witness. Of the counsel and active assistance, often more precious than gold to recipient, not rarely imposing on the giver heavy burdens of care, sleepless nights, and sapping the strength of which he possessed so little; let the many among us, who have benefited thereby, speak. Work and anxiety of the severest nature, always for others, never for himself, shortened his life and brought, of late, a partial eclipse upon his brilliant faculties. Feeble, broken, suffering often to the extreme of endurance, he has toiled on, as few of the strongest can toil, until the tired brain began to fail, the marvellously active mind to respond fitfully and sluggishly to the demands upon it, and, most painful of all, the man himself recognized this, and feared the seemingly inevitable end with a terror that, God grant, none of us may ever know. Haunted by this awful dread, under special and unendurable present strain, can we wonder that the great heart broke at last, the noble courage yielded, and that the moral sense shared the bewilderment of the mind? Whatever his faults, sad, beyond expression, as his passing, let no one challenge the assertion that, in our friend, man of affairs, scholar, mathematician, musician in the highest sense, died a man, great in mind, but greater far in goodness to his fellow men. But we know that somewhere, somehow, his wearied mind will find a sweet repose, his restless spirit the happiness that earth denied it; the good, beyond measure, that he did, its due reward. Farewell, my friend, my brother.

The Doctor's voice was broken with emotion as he pronounced the last words, after which the members of the Scottish Rite each cast into the grave a red rose, first pressing it to the lips.

The Rev. E. C. Irwine then said:—

Brethren and friends: I had no intention of adding any words of my own to the eloquent and entirely complete résumé of the life and character of Brother Keil—Mr. Oscar Otto Keil, as he was known to many of you—given by one of his eldest friends. But I have been asked very shortly before I came to this place to say in a very few words that which concerns very materially the memory of our departed friend. When a man of such varied business capacity, who had in his hands the reins of so many projects, plans, schemes, and also actual businesses—when such a man is suddenly taken away there must of necessity be a considerable amount of uncertainty as to the precise position in which his business affairs are situated. This would be the case, I venture to say, my friends, with very many of our most respected citizens, of whom Mr. Oscar Otto Keil was one. It has been found to be the case with men whose fortunes and whose business are known for their extent all over the world. It is therefore not at all unnatural that in the present instance varied reports—some of them very far from the mark and some of them perhaps positively adverse—should have found circulation, because fame is a wandering, wild, and uncertain thing. Therefore it gives me the greatest satisfaction, coming as it does from one of Mr. Keil's executors, that in the opinion of that gentleman the affairs of our late brother and widely respected friend will be found after sufficient examination to be ample to satisfy all the claims, however many, that may be made upon them. My dear brethren and my friends, I do not wish to add any further words regarding this subject, as I have stated it plainly; but I must express my own deep personal regret at the loss to this community of one of the kindest, readiest, most willing, and generous men it has ever been my fortune to meet.

The rev. gentlemen then pronounced the last solemn words of committal to the grave, and the ceremony was at an end. The urn is to be disinterred, and placed in a suitable monument that is to be erected.

CHINESE NOTES.

The North China Daily News printed the following Peking telegram on Jan. 30th:—

Upon receipt of secret denunciations by a cable at the head of which are Prince Ching, Kang Yi, President of the Board of Punishments, and General Ting Fushiang, accusing Director-General Hu of the Northern Railway of embezzling the Imperial Railway funds and making a secret alliance with Foreign Powers, the Empress Dowager issued a secret edict last night ordering the arrest of Director-General Hu for examination into his conduct, and appointing Hu Ching-cheng, ex-Minister to Germany, etc., as Acting Director-General pending the result of the investigations. It is stated that Hu's predilection for the British aroused the jealousy of the pro-Russian clique, and these, aided by the persons above-named who headed the denunciation, caused Hu's downfall, the results of which may be very serious not only to Hu himself but also to British prestige.

Commenting on this news, our contemporary said—"It will, no doubt, be remembered that H.E. Hu was Governor of Peking. He was removed from that post to make room for a Manchu, and appointed to the Tsung-li Yamén on the plea that his railway duties took up all his time, and he has now been sacrificed to the reactionaries. Hu Ching-cheng is a well-known Anglophobe."

The Marine Insurance Companies held an informal Conference in London on the 15th of December, to see whether they could arrange to advance premiums. It came to nothing, and a step of the kind seems impracticable against the competition of Lloyd's.

Capt. Trueman, of Company B, Shanghai Volunteers Corps, after 15 years in command, has retired and gone home to England. The members, to show their appreciation of the valuable services he had rendered, presented him with a handsome silver bowl, bearing the inscription: "Presented to Capt. Trueman by the members of B. Company, S. V. C., on his retirement from the command after 15 years' continuous service. 27th Jan., 1899." An illuminated address was also given.

In their weekly share report Messrs. J. P. Bisset & Co., of Shanghai, mention that the Hongkong and Shanghai Bank has made a loan on the Northern Railways from which it is expected to make a profit of some £60,000 to £80,000, and the price of the shares in London has risen to £57 15s., against 275 per cent. premium in Shanghai.

Richard Tournay, the marine engineer who "ran amok" on board the Fricking on Christmas Day, and did violent injury to two men, has been sentenced at Shanghai to one year's imprisonment with hard labour.

Mr. H. W. Gye attempted suicide by taking a large dose of morphine while in the Masonic Club, Shanghai, on Feb. 1st. The medical men eventually brought him round. No reason is assigned.

Viceroy Lin of Nanking recently ordered the institution of special classes in modern military tactics for the benefit of the younger and more promising officers holding commissions in the Vice-regal army. These special classes will be held at the Nanking Military College, and already some sixty young officers are said to have enrolled their names as special students, the anxiety to obtain instruction being very noticeable amongst all ranks of officers in Nanking.

Peking seems to be a most lawless capital, says the China Gazette. During a marriage procession the other day several women were attacked by a band of armed robbers, who dragged them from their chairs, and tore off their clothing and jewels. The men in the procession, not being armed, made no effort to protect the women.

The Foochow Echo understands that the Provincial Authorities have withdrawn their opposition to the locality demanded by the Japanese Government for a settlement at Foochow, on the condition that Chinese at present in occupation should not be required to move immediately.

A Peking dispatch, printed in Saanghai, states that H.E. Li Hong-chang, who has recently been busily occupied in determining and preparing for the conservation of the Yellow River works in Shantung province, has been lately ordered by Imperial edict of the Empress Dowager to return post haste to Peking. It is stated that this has been due to the uncertainty of Foreign and Palace politics at present, and the Empress Dowager appears to wish to have her old adviser by her side when occasion arises. The post vacated by H.E. Li will probably be given to H.E. Hsu Cuing-yi, Ex-Governor of Kuangtung, who was formerly Director-General of the Yellow River, and is supposed to know something of river conservancy.

According to the Universal Gazette the subsequent demands of the French with regard to the Ningpo Joss-house affair are as follows:—That the Ningpo and Saigon roads be extended as shown in a plan drawn by the French Municipal Council. That the ground southward of the Little East Gate to the first creek running into the Whangpoo, which was former inhabited by foreigners, the land at Pasiengao and outside the West Gate be included in the French Settlement. All Chinese owners of land within these limits are permitted to retain possession of their land on registration at the French Consulate. In the event of their wishing to lease or dispose of their land, foreigners should be given the preference; that the French may have a grant equal to whatever extension may be allowed to the settlement north of Yangking pang; that a site covering fifteen mows should be granted to the French for the erection of a French School and Hospital. That an indemnity of Tls. 20,000 will be paid by the French when these demands are complied with.

CORRESPONDENCE.

A WORD TO MISSIONARIES.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

DEAR SIR,—Several missionaries have expressed the belief that the heroism of the servant of the Rev. R. P. Alexander of Hiroaki should not be allowed to pass unnoticed. In her brave attempt to rescue her master's family from the burning building, she sustained spinal injuries which are believed to be likely to disable her for life. It is felt that the missionary body in Japan, and no doubt many others as well, would be glad to show in a practical way their appreciation of the noble deed of the sufferer, the more especially as her master, having lost all his earthly goods in the fire, is unable to relieve her.

The missionaries are already heavily burdened with demands on their resources; but by a small amount from each a sum of 200 yen or more might be raised, and would prove a great boon to the poor woman in her time of distress.

Those who wish to act on this suggestion would do a favour by forwarding their contributions to the Rev. B. Chappell, Aoyama Gakuin, Tokyo, at their earliest convenience.

A FRENCH HEROINE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

SIR,—In the January number of the New York Trained Nurse and Hospital Review there is an "In Memoriam" article, that tells a short story of heroism as sublime and inspiring as any thing I've ever read. Knowing of such a life almost makes one forget that this is a cold selfish cruel world. The article begins thus:—

Miss Margaret Nestler Tricoche was born in Versailles, France, in 1867. She belonged to a family of soldiers. Her father is a retired Major-General in the French Army, late member of French House of Representatives. She spent her childhood "following the guidon" from post to post. Although there was no prospect of her taking up any calling, she passed examinations at Paris fitting her to teach and pursued a thorough course of musical studies.

Her life was a serious and a studious one. She had but few acquaintances amid people of her social standing, but was deeply cherished by all with whom she came in contact. Her sympathy was unmistakably with the toiler, the working girl, and above all, the private soldier.

A few years ago she came to America on private business, and while there she decided to enter a Training School for Nurses and make nursing her profession, a calling fitting her aspirations and through which she could put into practice the highest teachings of her Master. When the Spanish-American war broke out she was just finishing her training school course, and impatiently waited the completion of her term, which was to enable her to reach her ideal, to become an army nurse and devote herself at last to her friend,—see sick soldier.

From this point some extracts from her diary not only tell her own story, but give some of the best insights into the army camp life that I have then:—

Thursday, Sept. 15—Although my application to the "Daughters of the American Revolution" bore the number 3,313, which I thought was giving me few chances to become a true niece of Uncle Sam, I was summoned this morning to the army building and duly enlisted as an army nurse. I got there my first lesson of military patience and forbearance; for I was obliged to wait for many hours, and had to do without luncheon.

Saturday, 17—Reached Ariston (Alabama) to-night, after twenty seven hours of very monotonous travel. It was dark when we alighted in the depot, which reminded me somewhat of that at Ellenville; only there were no familiar faces here, but plenty of negroes and soldiers instead. A three mile drive through the woods on a very sandy road took me to Camp Shipp. The Surgeon-Major to whom I had my contract takes me to my new home, a tent which I occupy with another girl—a trained nurse from Middleton. I take an inventory of our furniture: one stool, one agate basin as wash bowl, one pail of water, two coats made of canvas stretched over a wooden frame without any mattress, a trunk or two, —that's all.

Sunday, Sept. 18. Camp Shipp has been in existence only two weeks and many things are not settled yet. No provision having been made so far for women nurses, we are kindly invited to take our meals with the officers and doctors. Our first breakfast consisted of oat-meal without milk, coarse bread, some kind of meat the nature of which could not be ascertained, and a black liquid called coffee which is drunk without milk or sugar: upon the whole a wholesome if not palatable meal. Am detailed to the typhoid ward. This means three tents connected together so as to form one long canvas ward, containing eighteen cots. In front of the ward is a "fly," or awning, under which are kept on a small stand, bottles, boxes, a few utensils. Women nurses were much needed here owing to the scarcity of trained orderlies. When the first nurse arrived a few days ago, she found the boys lying on their cots wrapped up in blankets without any sheet, and the uniforms, canteens, and so on shoved pell mell under the beds.

Oct. 2—Two weeks have passed since I came, and everything is much changed for the better; thanks to the efforts of our Major and matron. On a sunny day our quarters are very nice indeed for a field hospital. When it pours (it does not rain here), there are drawbacks to our accommodations. The top of our closet is washed out; our pills become sticky in their boxes; our bed linen gets wet, and so does the nurse who is in charge of the medicine and washings, and has to spend nearly all her time under the "fly." Army nurses must give up that trim neat appearance they have been taught never to depart from when they are at school. Very soon the prim nurse takes off her cuffs; away goes the cap, which is either blown off by the wind or soaked by the rain, and her uniform dress is shortened to the length of a bicycle skirt.

Oct. 9th.—On night duty. This is an innovation. Formerly, as there were only three female nurses in camp, the night work was left to the orderlies. Night duty here is not without its charms, under the coal tent, dimly lighted by the regulation lantern, and a few candles stuck in old preserve cans. Were I writing for publicity, I should not omit this—"an ominous silence prevails." Fortunately poetry is not the order of the day. A furious gale is blowing impeding the safety of our canvas home. Now and then we hear the hammer of an orderly driving down some rebellious stake.

Oct. 15—This evening the band of the First Kentucky is playing in our camp. And as I am resting a while under the "fly," enjoying the mild breeze, my mind wanders back to another camp, far, far away, near the boundary line of France and Germany; and I think of a very young girl, who, quite a few years ago, was, as I am now, listening to a military band. She was not a soldier's nurse then, but the proud daughter of the camp commander, and it was not for the sick but mostly for herself that the band was playing. Little was she dreaming then, that some day her fondness for the Stars and Stripes and his unrequitable will would cause her to "rough it" in a Southern camp, and give sponge baths to typhoid patients of the South-east New York.

Margaret Nestler Tricoche,
Army Nurse,
1st Division 3 Army Corps.

This was the last record in Miss Tricoche's diary, and her mood of reverie seems ominous. She was contrasting her present position with that one back in her native land, "the proud daughter of the camp commander." Before she could make another record in her diary, Miss Tricoche was a typhoid patient, stricken down at the bed-side of her sick soldiers. She was carried back to New York, where she died and was buried in her nurse's uniform. This talented young French woman, the daughter of a Major General, had realized her ambition to help "soldier boys"; she fell at her post a martyr to her ideal of true usefulness. She is a heroic type of womanhood, an honour to the nation that produced her, and deserves the highest praise from the nation she served till death. Marquis La Fayette gave his great grins to the cause of American liberty and received the gratitude of a whole nation; Margaret Nestler Tricoche gave all she had—trained service and her life—for the American soldier and deserves a monument as a French heroine.

THE TREATMENT OF ALLEGED CRIMINALS.

We have been asked to publish the following letter:—

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "KOKUMIN SHIMBUN."

SIR,—Referring to your comments upon Lord Beresford's suggestion regarding the treatment of alleged criminals, will you allow me space for a few words? Just what may have been in his Lordship's mind at the time, it may be difficult to say, but there is, I think, no reason to assume any lack of accurate information regarding the Code of Criminal Procedure. Whatever the authors of that Code may have contemplated, there is no doubt that a fair construction does authorize the yoshin hanji at his discretion to confine the prisoner for an indefinite period without the privilege of counsel and without the moral support of his friends. It is also clear that such deprivation of counsel during a considerable part of the interval between the arrest and the hokan, or public trial, is a by no means uncommon feature of the practice of the courts. It is also clear, I think, that it is exceedingly difficult to secure bail prior to the conclusion of the yoshin, and that the yoshin is often continued through many weeks and even months. This certainly is the impression which a wide observation has made upon some of the most competent and candid minds, and it would seem to justify the guarded phrases of his Lordship.

Looked at from the foreign point of view, the cause of dissatisfaction is not so much the loss of harsh treatment after conviction, nor is it to be found in defects imputed to the regular prison discipline; for we have the best of testimony as to the high ideal which the prison authorities are exhibiting. After a careful examination of both the model prison at Sugamo and the old-fashioned prison at Ichigaya, the high commendation attributed to Lord Beresford does not seem to me too strong. Barring the cold in winter, I am not at all sure that the Ichigaya prison would be on the whole preferable to the other.

It is rather the thought of what at least English-speaking residents of Japan must regard as the unnecessary confinement of simply suspected persons, including of course a considerable number of entirely innocent men and women, which arouses anxiety. It is not a morbid sentimentalism, but the conviction that the system involves on the part of such innocent persons a very serious, as well as needless, loss of time and money, and in some cases at least actual want and misery on the part of their families, not to speak of the suffering from the loss of liberty which to certain sensitive minds is hardly less terrible than death. Neither do the opponents of the present system mean to charge the judges with any lack of conscientiousness in the exercise of their discretion. The radical difficulty lies in the fact that the system emphasizes so strongly the duty of the judge as the protector of society that, however generous-hearted he may be, he is almost certain to forget that he should be not less the protector of the accused who stands before him, and to forget also that even society may be quite as deeply injured by injustice to an innocent man as by the escape of a really guilty one—indeed, a mistake in the direction of undue leniency is much the less serious of the two.

After considerable inquiry, I am forced to the conviction that the suffering and loss resulting from the prolonged confinement which too often precedes the public trial, is very greatly underestimated by Japanese publicists, while they exaggerate the hindrance to justice created by the efforts of the suspected person to conceal the evidence of his guilt. It is known that sometimes even actual confession of guilt is made by innocent persons as a means of escape from the distress which the methods adopted to induce them to incriminate themselves involve. The London Standard last year cited the case of a woman arrested in France for the alleged murder of her new born child. She denied the charge, but under pressure confessed the crime in detail and was duly sentenced. Within two months, however, conclusive proof was found that not only had she not killed the child, but there had been no child to kill!

I have in mind a physician in Japan, a most respectable man, who was confined awaiting trial from December till the last of July without the privilege of bail, when, as I was informed on unquestionable authority, the penalty for the alleged crime could not have exceeded seventy days' imprisonment. He was acquitted at the public trial. In another case, a man who also was afterward acquitted, was begged by his friends to confess the crime charged, because forsooth he would thus the sooner regain his liberty. It may be contended that such cases are exceptional, but they occur often enough, in my judgment, to condemn the system, and to lead any who will carefully study the question to urge its speedy abandonment.

However, it is obviously impossible to revolutionize the method of criminal procedure at short notice, and this leads to the question, what should be the first step in reform?

My own conviction is that the key to the situation is to be found in opening the preliminary examination to the counsel for the defendant. If the large discretion conferred upon the judge must be exercised, is it too much to ask that he shall at least be made to feel the weight of public sentiment as represented by a lawyer pledged to maintain the personal rights of the prisoner? Even should the rest of the system remain substantially the same, I firmly believe the preliminary stages of the criminal procedure would be greatly hastened; that release on bail would be granted far earlier and more frequently; and that the alleviation of the condition of the accused would be fully recognized that the judges themselves would rejoice in the change.

Moreover, I believe that with the recognition of this benefit, there would come, even from men now strong in their conservatism, a demand for other safeguards which would ere long place the judicial system of Japan abreast of that of the freest nations in the world, as regards its careful reverence for the personal rights of her citizens.

Is it too much to hope that at the present session of the Diet, at least so much relief as I have advocated may be afforded in the large number of persons held to await trial? No step could be taken which would awaken warmer sympathy on the part of the great English speaking nations whose interests run so nearly parallel to those of Japan.

D. C. GREENE.

Commenting on the above letter the Kokumin Shimbun of Friday says:—The views of Rev. Dr. D. C. Greene on the treatment of alleged criminals, that appeared in the last two issues of the Kokumin Shimbun, will, we hope, receive careful consideration of the public and the authorities. As regards our comment upon Lord Charles Beresford's discussion of the subject, which was the occasion for eliciting the communication of Dr. Greene, our word of explanation is necessary. From the language used by Lord Beresford, guarded as it certainly was, it would appear that the advantage of counsel and the right of seeing his friends were altogether denied to the criminal defendant. It was to this apparent assumption that we ventured to take exception. But, as Dr. Greene points out, it is clear that the liberty of criminal defendants is more strictly restricted in this country than in Western countries, especially Great Britain and America. There is certainly much to be desired in the way of improving the system of criminal procedure. We shall not fail to profit by the criticisms and suggestions made by well-wishers for Japan, like Lord Beresford and Dr. Greene.

JAPANESE REFUSED A LANDING.

The Colony of New South Wales has passed an Act which will render it difficult for Japanese and others who are not conversant with the English language, and who may not be in possession of certain means, to settle there. Three Japanese who went from Kobe by the E. and A. steamer Australian were refused permission to land at Sydney and had to return in consequence. The experience was an unpleasant one for the Japanese and decidedly hard upon the gentleman who had paid their passages to the Colony, but the law had to be respected. As a matter of fact we believe the Japanese themselves are not serious losers by the unexpected restriction, the party who had engaged them having compensated them for their loss of time.

The men in question had been engaged for service in Sydney as house servants, their passages being paid. On arriving at Sydney on December 12th the authorities declined to allow them to land and told them they must return whence they came as they were unable to comply with the Act passed to restrict immigration. Needless to say the news created quite a stir on board, but the officials were obdurate and represented that they had no alternative but to enforce the law. The three men therefore returned to this port by the Australian, and a well-to-do Sydney man is still without his ideal Japanese servants.—Kobe Herald.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

A telegraphic despatch from Formosa dated the 4th announces that the rebels in Tainan Prefecture have been routed: about 250 surrendered.

On Sunday, the steamer Tairen Maru sustained some damage off Kanonaki, on her way from Yokohama to Hakodate. She returned to Yokohama for repair.

Queen Victoria's footmen wear wigs which have eight rows of curls, whereas those of the Prince of Wales are allowed seven rows, and those of the Lord Mayor of London are given six rows.

The North German Lloyd Company has representatives now at Seattle arranging for the starting of a line of steamers between that port and the Orient. Besides Chinese and Japanese trade, they see good possibilities in Samoa and the Philippines.

A San Francisco paper has this heading (reaching over some six columns, though the paragraph it refers to is entirely unimportant): "A Chinese Burglar on a Large Scale." The size of the burglar across the waistcoat is not stated.

On Saturday a word-broker named Ogawa Shimbei (53), living at Kasukabe, Saitama Prefecture, murdered with a spear his adopted son Hyosuke (31), who was married to his eldest daughter. The murderer then attempted suicide by cutting open his abdomen with a sword.

The Nippon Yusen Kaisha's steamer Kiofun Maru encountered a violent storm on her way to Seattle, arriving there on the 3rd inst., three days behind the schedule time. Consequently her departure for Japan will take place a few days later than the date announced in the schedule.

The Official Gazette gives notice that Second Captain Wenceslao Jose de Souza Moraes, of the Portuguese Navy, has been appointed vice-Consul ad interim of the Portuguese Consulate for Osaka and Hyogo, which has for several years been in charge of the French Consul here.

Since the outbreak of hostilities in the Philippines the Japanese Government has decided to despatch the warship Suma to protect Japanese traders and witness the operations. The Suma left Tsu on Wednesday morning for Sasebo to provision for the voyage. She is expected to leave immediately.

It is reported from Shanghai that a Chinese has assembled over 600 malcontents at Pita-wu, preaching a crusade against the Russian Authorities in Tientsin and the vicinity. He tells the natives that the Russians are introducing an oppressive administration. The Commandant-in-Chief of Shing-king Prefecture has despatched two divisions of soldiers to put down the riots.

In chronicling the death of a young lieutenant at Haiphong on the 14th February, Le Courrier d'Haiphong passes some strong criticism on the French transport service. M. Cuzen du Ren was a second lieutenant in the 10th Marine Infantry, and was landed from the Cholon suffering from typhoid fever. Numerous cases of typhoid have occurred in the transports between France and the French Colonies during the troping season, remarks the China Mail.

At the Yokohama Saibansho on Friday, Oshima Sadaki, a lad of 19, in the employ of Mr. C. J. Strome, was sentenced to six months' hard labour and six months' police surveillance, for stealing from the residence of Mr. Strome, No. 12 Bund, on January 13th, a hand-bag containing a diamond ring, a bracelet and other articles, about 1,500 yen in value, besides six to ten gold pieces and 17 yen in paper currency. Prisoner was smartly captured a few hours after the theft was discovered, and the whole of the stolen property was recovered.

At a meeting of the Committee of the Yokohama General Chamber of Commerce, held on Thursday, the Chairman expressed the unanimous feeling of regret of the Committee at the loss they had sustained in the death of Mr. Keil, a man of high intelligence and great industry, having the interests of the Chamber keenly at heart, whose loss will not easily be made good; and it was unanimously decided to place on record in the minutes of the Chamber an expression of regret at his death.

An evening contemporary learns that telegrams were received on Tuesday at the purchasing office of the Imperial Government Railways for Tyres and Best Yorkshire Iron as under:—

The death is announced of Mrs. Ritter, wife of Dr. Paul Ritter, the Swiss Consul-General at Yokohama. The deceased lady had been in unsatisfactory health for some time, and, a lengthened stay in the country not restoring her, it was thought that a return to her native air might prove beneficial. She travelled to Europe by the German mail just before Christmas, but did not live to reach Switzerland, dying shortly after the arrival of the steamer at Naples. Every sympathy will be felt for Dr. Ritter in his bereavement.

The death is announced of Mr. Hara Zenzaburo, a wealthy Japanese merchant in Yokohama, which took place at his residence, Oimatsu-cho, on the night of the 6th inst. He had been confined to his bed for some time, and, in view of his advanced age, 73, the illness was early recognised as hopeless. A few days before his death Mr. Hara contributed 60,000 yen to the Tokyo University and other schools. On the 6th inst. he was promoted to the rank of Frugii in recognition of his various services to the State. The funeral takes place on the 16th inst.

All the Kobe R. and A. C. Debentures, new 7 per cent. issue, have been taken up. In fact applications were received for more than the amount required. At a Committee meeting it was decided to invite Messrs. W. S. Taylor and J. R. Gillingham to join the Committee. The following sub-Committees were appointed: Messrs. Sorhagen and Kalkhaff, Rowing; Mr. Lightfoot, Football; Mr. Taylor, Canoeing; Messrs. Hall and Gillingham, Athletic Sports; Mr. Hall, Gymnastics and Bar; Mr. Bethell, Theatricals. Messrs. Drewell and Franklin retain the offices they held last year. Work on the new Reading Room will probably be commenced some time next month.

THE BERSFORD DINNER.

The total expenses connected with the Bersford dinner amounted to yen 1,847.76. The details of the account are as under:—

The cost per head is thus yen 12.

PRESENT CONDITION OF JAPANESE INDUSTRY.

Mr. Ariga Nagatami, after graduating at the Imperial University, specially studied political economy, and was recently a high official of the Agricultural and Commercial Department. He gave an address recently on "The Present Condition of Japanese Industry," before the members of the Kokkagakkwai, and it has been reported in the magazine of that association. The main points are as follow:—The actual state of a Japanese industry is best explained by statistics. Taking the sum total of the exports to be one hundred, the ratio of increase of industrial exports was 66 per cent. in 1888, 64 per cent. in 1889, 67 per cent. in 1890, 55 per cent. in 1891, 67 per cent. in 1892, 71 per cent. in 1893, 75 per cent. in 1894, 77 per cent. in 1895, 74 per cent. in 1896, and 78 per cent. in 1897. In short, the exports have increased from 66 per cent. in 1888 to 78 per cent. in 1897. The decrease in the import of industrial products for the same period is shown by the following figures: 92 per cent. in 1887, 87 per cent. in 1888, 87 per cent. in 1889, 73 per cent. in 1890, 73 per cent. in 1891, 72 per cent. in 1892, 76 per cent. in 1893, 67 per cent. in 1894, 71 per cent. in 1895, 71 per cent. in 1896, 60 per cent. in 1897. That is, imports of industrial products declined from 92 per cent. in 1887, to 60 per cent. in 1897. There is thus a tendency to decrease in manufactured imports and to increase in exports.

Of the capital used in Japanese industry, no perfect statistics are obtainable with regard to monies absorbed in industrial works conducted by partnerships and individuals. But in regard to industrial companies, the increase of capital is from yen 56,000,000 in 1894, to yen 62,000,000 in 1895, yen 74,000,000 in 1896, and yen 151,000,000 in 1897. That is to say, the capital employed by industrial companies in 1897 is about three times that used in 1894. But all this capital was not actually paid up. The actually subscribed sums were yen 36,000,000 in 1894, yen 41,000,000 in 1895, yen 48,000,000 in 1896, and yen 74,000,000 in 1897. Thus the actual capital of industrial companies is yen 74,000,000, to which debentures—yen 4,000,000 in 1894, yen 4,900,000 in 1895, yen 5,500,000 in 1896 (that of 1897 is not yet ascertained)—have to be added. Of these debentures, yen 610,000 in 1894, yen 420,000 in 1895, and yen 440,000 in 1896 were actually paid-up. Briefly stated, the industrial capital in 1897 was three times that in 1894.

The total amount of industrial products of Japan in the present day is very difficult to ascertain. The following figures, however, have been collected by the Minister of Agriculture and Commerce, for 1895:—

	1895.	1896.	Increase.
Osaka fu	30,000,000	32,000,000	2,000,000
Kyoto fu	27,000,000	29,000,000	2,000,000
Tokyo fu	14,000,000	22,000,000	8,000,000

The total amount of important industrial products of the whole Japanese Empire was 338,000,000 in 1895, and 367,000,000 in 1896. Industrial products not considered important are not included in the above figures.

Figures with regard to the position of factories in 1896 are as follow:—

I. Industrial works in which motive power—steam, electricity, water, gas—are provided:—
Factories	2,968
Engines	5,325
Horse-power	58,172
Workmen	273,793

II. Industrial works in which mechanical motive power is not provided:—

Factories	4,398
Workmen	140,243

Thus the total number of factories was 7,366, and that of the workmen more than 414,000. The above does not, however, include factories employing fewer than ten workmen, which, it must be remembered, are very numerous in Japan.

The figures concerning the consumption of coal show that 728,000 tons were used in 1893,

1,092,000 tons in 1894, 1,188,000 tons in 1895, and 1,553,000 tons in 1896. The total of 1893 is thus about doubled by 1896.

Present industries may be divided into two classes—native and imported. Indigenous industries are of woven goods, porcelain, lacquered wares, precious metal, utensils, paper, oils, unbleached wax, silk, Sakai cotton carpets (danshi), straw braid, and others; and the imported industries are those relating to spinning, matches, cement, glass, and others. Industries were first started to check the import of foreign goods; and under favourable circumstances they are now not only able to supersede imported goods, but many of their products are exported to China, Korea, Australia, and other places. Industries of this class are generally managed by big merchants, and by them scientific principles are applied. On the other hand, native industrial works are carried on usually on a small scale. Applications of scientific principles and new knowledge are rare. According to statistics published by the Finance Department, the total amount of Japanese industrial products exported in 1877 was yen 112,390,000, of which the so-called Western goods were only yen 16,000,000, or rather more than one-tenth of the total sum, and the balance of more than eight-tenths was made up from native industries. Thus great importance must be attached to the native industries.

The employment of labourers differs in the native and Western industries. In the textile manufactories of Kiyo or Ashtaka, for instance, labourers are employed for a term of years, say, three or five years, wages being generally five or six yen per year, yen 25 or 30 being given at the end of the term. Food, shelter and clothing of the labourers are provided by the employers. In Fukui, wages are paid according to piece work, and the daily gain of a skilled workman is said to be about forty yen. But in no place are daily wages paid to native industrialists. In the Western industries, on the other hand, labourers are employed at a daily wage. The following is a table showing the rise during the past few years, for first class, second class, and third class artisans:—

1st. and 3rd. class.	1st. and 3rd. class.
Osaka Sulphuric Acid Co.	50 30 80	75 48 96
Saitoh Spinning Co.	50 30 80	55 39 59
Tokyo Kanegafuchi Spinning Co.	44 25 9	45 27 10

In Western industries, it is very difficult to get good workmanship, for in the first place the artisans are drawn directly from the ranks of agricultural labourers, fishermen, and others, very few of whom continue in employment for many years; and in the second place these men are not educated. From a recent report of the United Association of Spinning Companies it appears that labourers who have graduated in primary schools, or have that degree of education, are only nineteen per cent. of the whole.

The capital employed by companies carrying on Western industries is yen 140,000,000 (of which yen 74,000,000 is paid up), with debentures, etc., as above stated. It consists generally of fixed capital, floating capital for the payment of wages, purchase of raw materials, etc. The interest charged is very high. In the case of one company, yen 36,943, and in that of another company, yen 26,400, were paid in interest in the first half of 1898. It is thus inevitable that, with high interest and inefficient workmanship, the companies sometimes suffer great losses. The following table illustrates the position of the spinning companies:—

Total number of Companies.	Companies making a profit.	Companies sustaining loss.
1893	33	29
1894	43	28
1895	59	41

A still more deplorable condition is seen in the native industries. Take the case of Fukui, in which district Mr. Ariga made an official tour. Fukui is famous for the production of habutai, the export of which amounted to yen 8,000,000 last year. But the total capital used in its production is only yen 500,000, and the smallness of means brings about difficulties and entails enormously high interest. According to Mr. Ariga's examination, the daily interest per hundred yen was 3 sen and 7 rin, but as a matter of fact it was above 5 sen. With such a scarcity of capital the Fukui weavers are compelled to sell cloth at very cheap prices in the agents of the foreign merchants at Yokohama, who make very lucrative bargains.

THE LATE COUNT CAPRIVI.

Men and Women of the Times contains the following biography of the illustrious German statesman whose death has just been announced:—Caprivi de Caprera de Montecuccoli, Count Georg Leo von, the German Chancellor, is the eldest of the four sons of Julius Edward von Caprivi, who was a high legal functionary in the service of the Prussian State. General von Caprivi was born at Charlottenburg on Feb. 24, 1831. Entering a general regiment in high eighteenth year, he won rapid promotion and served with distinction in the campaigns of 1864 and 1866. In 1870 he acted as Chief of the Staff to the 10th Corps, of which he is now the Commander, and reaped fresh laurels in all the battles on the Loire. Swiftly ascending the other steps of the military ladder, he was appointed in 1883 to the command of the 30th Division at Metz; and next year, passing from the army to the navy, he succeeded to Herr von Stosch, on the latter's retirement from the head of the Admiralty. In a short time naval men by profession were amazed at the mastery of their art and the perception of their interests which were displayed by a mere landman and soldier. Soon after the present Emperor's accession, on the death of Count Monte, he reorganised the navy; the command of the Imperial fleet being vested in Admiral von der Goltz, while something like a ministry of marine was created under Rear-Admiral von Hensen; and it was on this occasion that General von Caprivi, sharing in the redistribution of military commands, was rewarded for his loyalty to the army, no less than for his naval services, with the 10th or Hanoverian Army Corps, which is one of the finest in the whole army. During the manoeuvres of the autumn of 1886, when the Hanoverians and Westphalians met in mimic warfare, with smokeless powder and other innovations on their trial, the Emperor had opportunity enough anew to study the character of General von Caprivi, and this general's character and ability to serve him in a political capacity must have fairly convinced his Majesty, otherwise he would never have asked him to assume the enormous burden of responsibility which Prince Bismarck had laid down. It was not without grave scruples and self-distrust that General von Caprivi listened to the proposals of the Emperor; but his Majesty, it is said, had finally decided to have a soldier for his new Chancellor, thinking, as he does, with Frederick the Great, that a General must be the surest conductor of a foreign policy, as knowing best how far he can go with the army behind him. On March 19, 1890, the appointment of General Caprivi as successor to Prince Bismarck was made public. The General received the title of Count from the Emperor in December, 1881. He gave up his position as Prussian Prime Minister to Count von Eulenbourg, in March, 1892, but remained Chancellor and Minister for Foreign Affairs. In 1892 and 1893, despite of prolonged opposition, he conducted the German Army Bill successfully through Parliament. He unexpectedly resigned in October, 1894, owing to friction with Count Eulenbourg in the matter of the Agrarian League malcontents.

His Honour Judge Wilkinson sat on Thursday for the purpose of revising the Jury list. The only claim for exemption was preferred by Mr. C. M. Daff, who asked to be excused on the ground of deafness, producing medical certificates in support of his statement.—The application was allowed, and the rest of the list passed as published.

SERPENT CULT AMONG THE AINU

A LECTURE DELIVERED BEFORE THE ANTHROPOLOGICAL SOCIETY OF SAPORO, ON SATURDAY, FEB. 4TH, 1899, BY THE REV. JNO. BATCHELOR.

I.—GENERAL REMARKS.

A general survey of the mythology of the nations of the world very soon leads one to conclude that there is no superstition more universal in extent and diversified in thought and conception than that connected with ophiolatry. While there are some races of peoples who regard the serpent family as divine and therefore worthy of all reverence and worship, there are others who look upon every species of the ophidian tribe as very demons; as demons absolutely and in every way antagonistic to man and for this reason worthy of hatred and only fit to be slain. The Phœnicians of old were of opinion that serpents were beneficent beings and welcomed their appearance as omens for good. The Dyaks of North Borneo regard them in the same light to-day.¹ It is hardly necessary to mention in this place the snake temples of India and to note how these reptiles are sometimes fed, though perhaps with reluctant interest, at the doors of Hindu cottages; and all here present will certainly have heard of the worship given to snakes at the present time in Yanagishima Mura, near Tokyo.

The national flag of China is a large dragon, and the common people of that land attribute to the supposed kings of heaven bodies like serpents. In Mexico the highest member of the Viti pantheon is Ndugei, who is worshipped as a mighty serpent.² The ancient Persians regarded this reptile as symbolizing the principle of evil, and in Egypt a hideous serpent was connected with the Typhonic superstition. Those curious pseudo-Gnostic sects of the 2nd Century, viz. those called Ophites, Sethites, and Cainites, even went so far in their regard for the serpent as to endeavour to graft ophiolatry on to the Christian faith. So catholic then, both as regards time and place, is this superstition found to have been.

The Ainu race does not differ from others in this matter, but is quite catholic in it, for it also has its Serpent Cult. And, though indeed there is nothing like the elaborate proportions of the worship of the Danigwe in the serpent's house at Dahomey,³ and the cult is quite distinct from it in kind, still the fact remains that ophiolatry is practised among them. What is now seen, however, is probably nothing more than the remnant of what was in bygone ages a much more complete system. I verily thought I had said all there was to say on this matter in my book on "The Ainu of Japan," but I have, since publishing that book, discovered that the subject has by no means been therein exhausted. Indeed, when writing that book I must frankly confess that I had no idea that ophiolatry was practised at all by this people. So that had anyone asked me concerning the matter I should certainly have said no. The fact is, all religious practices, of whatever kind they may be, mixed up as they are with a tremendous amount of superstition, are very occasional among the Ainu, and, like intermittent fever, quite irregular. But ophiolatry is particularly irregular, only occurs at long intervals, and is practised by very few people indeed. However, having met with it I now proceed to give the facts.

II.—ORIGIN AND HOME OF THE SERPENT KIND.

According to Ainu ideas the first serpent that ever was belongs not to this earth, but had his origin in heaven above. In this we are reminded of Persian mythology, in which "Ahimain, the serpent enemy of man and purity," descended earthwards in the fashion of a serpent.⁴ But the Ainu, differing from the Persians, say that the original serpent, who is still pretty much alive, is a good and honourable deity. He is therefore not only worthy of divine honours but is actually worshipped by this people.

The history of his descent from above is very peculiar, and as related to me is as follows. This world is, under the Creator of all things, governed chiefly by the goddess of fire as His deputy. Originally this goddess had her home in heaven above, but was sent down by the Creator to take care of this world. Having heard that it was determined that she should leave her heavenly abode and descend to earth, the serpent, being enamoured of her, desired to come down with her. Having expressed his ardent love, the goddess, trying to dissuade him from this course, informed him that if he descended with her he would be obliged to endure fire, which would be exceedingly hard for him. Notwithstanding all this, however, the serpent declared himself ready to brave everything if only he should be permitted to accompany her. And so, after having received full permission, he came down with her in a flash of lightning; here he has been ever since, and here he is to remain.

The serpent, descending as he did in a flash of lightning, came down with such mighty force that his fall made a large hole in the ground. Even at the present day some of his offspring who were left behind, in heaven and have a longing to visit their father, likewise descend in lightning, and the force of their fall also makes holes in the ground.⁵ These holes, when known to exist, should by no means be approached, for they lead down to Hades which is now supposed to be the true home of the serpent kind. The original father-snake has his palace there and there reigns as king over all his tribe. Such is the account of this matter as given to me.

In writing of the home of snakes I have said elsewhere:—"By some Ainu, snakes are supposed to live in large communities in the under-world, and their real homes assume the bodily forms of men and women. They have houses and gardens just the same as human beings have. Their food, however, consists of dew.⁶ They have also a language peculiar to themselves. But their resemblance to men and women extends only to bodily form. Their hearts and natures are decidedly diabolical. They only assume the form of snakes when they come to the upper world, and they never appear here except with the intention of doing some harm to human beings."

The ancients of the Ainu once met together in prayer to take away these evil-working objects. He heard their prayer and determined to snare them out. But when they were about to leave, a frog stepped forth and told them that, if they would but hold its leg in their mouth, they would not snare to death. One snake tried the remedy, and found the frog's leg so sweet that he swallowed its whole body. From that time to this frogs have been the staple food amongst the reptiles of Ainu land.

All serpents, however, are not supposed to have descended from above, but may be said to be born upon earth and in Hades in the ordinary course of nature. For, having once descended to earth, the conditions of life here have become the natural course of nature to them. All of these so born are considered to be of a very evil disposition and desirous of doing all the harm they can to mankind. Of one of these I have written:⁷ "Some of the Ainu tell of a large serpent which is said to have been the immediate cause of wars and stinging ants. This monstrous reptile is, curiously enough, said to have been of the feminine gender, of an extraordinary length, and of such a beautiful colour as to be quite charming to look upon. She was, however, a very dreadful and dangerous creature, for she used to devour whole villages of people, and even swallow houses. One day this monster met an Ainu who was hunting far away in the forests, and tempted him to sin with her. The Ainu, however, was a God-fearing man, and would not be led into danger, but manfully maintained his integrity. Thereupon the serpent, instead of swallowing him up as he expected, told him that as a punishment he should be unable to die for a thousand years; and it came to pass that when this Ainn attained the age of a hundred years he shed his hair, beard, skin, and teeth, and became a child again, subject to all the ills and trials of babyhood, and this took place every time the poor fellow reached the age of one hundred years. He was quite unable to die till he had lived his thousand years, and lost his hair and teeth ten times. At length this reptile was slain by the Ainn, but as its carcass became decomposed and fell to pieces the particles became stinging ants and wasps."

⁴ To this I must add now that some Ainu suppose these beings to have dogs, and also their eating and fishing propensities in Hades, and to live on the same food and follow the same pursuits as when upon earth.

As most of the Ainn really believe the original serpent to have been good and to have come down from heaven, they appear to be at a loss to understand why so many of his offspring are bad. They therefore seek to prove that they are not his children after all, but owe their origin to another. It is the opinion therefore of some that Yoshitsune, the famous Japanese who fled to Yezo in the 12th Century and lived for a time among the Ainn, was the true original of all evilly disposed snakes. There are two legends to this effect. The first is as follows. Yoshitsune was one day going to fish in the river, and, as he was pushing his boat off with the boat pole, the pole broke, one part remaining sticking in the mud and the other in his hand. He was very angry at this, and, cursing the piece which remained in his hand, threw it ashore. As soon as it left his hands it became a venomous snake, and is the ancestor of all such. It is the children of this reptile who ever seek the harm of men. The other legend says that when Yoshitsune was building a hut for himself in Ainn-land he cut down an alder tree and proceeded to make a frame for his hearth out of it. When he had finished the mending and the pieces of wood were fitting together and placed in position one piece began to move and wriggle about. This surprised him very much indeed, and, upon cutting it open to see what was the cause, there came out a demon in bodily form like a snake. This is said by those who believe in this legend to be the true ancestor of all the evil ones among the ophiolatry tribe. By the majority of Ainn, however, both of these legends are looked upon as mere tales, for the general opinion is that the serpent who originally came down from heaven with the goddess of fire is the ancestor of all snakes, both good and bad, and that all together have now their real home in Hades.

III.—OPHIOLATRY.

Before proceeding with this division of my subject I will take the liberty of again quoting from the "Journal of American Folklore" what I wrote therein. I there say:—"Speaking of the tree of evil brings to my mind the subject of the serpent and his connection with the fall of man. The Ainn are not different from many other nations in their superstitious fear of these reptiles; they have a very great dread of every kind of snake. Though the people do not seem to connect them with the entrance of sin into the world, yet many of them certainly believe snakes to be demons both in nature and deed, and to be at enmity with all mankind; and they think that, having a special spite against women, they will bewitch them and drive them mad if they get the opportunity. To be bewitched by a snake or to be possessed by a devil are the same thing according to Ainn ideas. The men are afraid to kill these reptiles because they think that the evil spirits which are supposed to dwell in them will, on leaving their former abode, enter the heart of the slayer." I must here qualify this last sentence by saying that while this is true of some men it is not so of all, for I find that many Ainn are very particular to have every snake killed which comes across the path of a woman. This is so because the people believe that snake possession is the chief cause of all troubles experienced at childbirth, and the only certain preventive is to slay the snake which is seeking to possess the woman. "It is also said that if a snake finds any person asleep out of doors, it will immediately enter the sleeper's mouth and take up its abode within him, the result being madness."

But to speak more particularly of the worship of serpents. Ophiolatry, I find, most frequently practised when an addition is being made to a family, but more particularly when there is any difficulty in the matter. When it has been decided that serpent-worship shall take place, the image of a snake is made of Pophe-kina, a kind of sedge (Carex rhynchochrysa). This image is called Inoké kamui, which means, "the image of god or divine image." In the particular case I have now in view the image was, it appeared to me, used as much as a charm as anything else. After the patient had been walked about, and various other courses resorted to and the desired effect has not been brought about, the image of a snake was made and suddenly placed upon the shoulders of the woman. Here it was held for some time and worshipped.

Upon asking why this object was worshipped I was informed that according to Ainn belief all such like difficulties are caused by the demon of snakes. But lest I should suppose that it was any wicked, evilly dispositioned, snake which was worshipped, I was assured that it was the chief serpent himself alone who had this honour done him. The people go directly to head-quarters and ask the original parent himself to undo the mischief done or designed by his wicked progeny. After the image here referred to had been worshipped it was laid by the side of the patient for a time and afterwards put in the sacred north-east corner of the hut by the side of the household god which is sometimes called Chissé koro skashi, "the ancestor who keeps the house."

The next case in which serpent worship takes place is when a person has had the misfortune to be bitten by a snake or viper. At such times the image is by some people made and set up by the fireplace where it is worshipped. Inao are offered to it and sake drunk in its honour. It is then placed on the side for a time. If the demon has heard the prayers and wrought a cure, it is again produced, set by the fire-side, worshipped, thanked, presented with inao and sake, and then reverently taken outside and placed with the inao at the east end of the hut. However, should the patient die the image is left severely alone as being of no use. In such cases again I am informed that the people worship the chief of these serpents only and not any of his servants.

The other case in which I have known of serpent-worship taking place was for a woman suffering from an attack of ague. On this occasion the image was made and worshipped, and then with a good deal of professional air and mystery was secretly brought to the patient and suddenly slipped into her bosom. This caused the woman to become much agitated with surprise, and, upon springing from her couch, she was well beaten with a bunch of grass which goes by the name of Takusa. In these cases therefore we find that Ophiolatry is very closely connected with exorcism. In cases of ague, however, all the Ainn do not worship the serpent, but only such of them as ascribe attacks of this disease to the malice of his offspring. There may be other cases in which serpent-worship is indulged in, but so far I have heard of none.

You will not be surprised to learn that the Ainn are not ophiophagous. I have frequently heard of Japanese eating snakes as medicine, and even sometimes as a delicacy, but never of an Ainn doing so. I have heard also of snakes being killed, cut up, and given to horses to eat, but this is not an Ainn but a Japanese custom. It is said that they are given to horses because it is thought that, in some way or other, they confer physical strength.

IV.—OPHIOMANCY.

The only case I actually know of in which anything like predicting events by means of the serpent is practised is that of a woman witch-doctor, Icarunde by name, residing at Hoya-kotan, in the district of Shibichari. This woman keeps the image of a serpent in her hut all the time, and it is positively asserted that she prays to it often. She is said to regard it altogether as her shuen kamui, or guardian angel, and is looked upon as being inspired by it at times. It is said that she is in the habit of taking it from her box, talking to it, and asking it all kinds of questions. By its inspiration she professes to tell the reason of any given sickness or trouble and to discover the remedies for them. Indeed, she also claims to foretell future events by its influence. I need scarcely remark that this woman is very much feared by the people near at hand, and is treated kindly by them. But this is not what would be called true ophiomancy. I cannot hear of any Ainn, man or woman, who professes to predict future events by means of a genuine serpent, dead or alive, whether it be by its manner of eating or by its coils. They are too much afraid of these reptiles to watch them much in their live state.

It is said to be most unlucky for a woman to see a snake swallow anything, for that would mean nothing less than certain okokko parat, "snake possession." In such a case it must be killed at once and a stick of noya, "mugwort" (Artemisia vulgaris L.), stuck through its head.

In the same way the Ainn say that any snake which is seen with a large stomach, as though it had been gorging itself, must be killed and examined so as to see what is inside. A case in which I myself was interested is mentioned in my book on

g. Whittled sticks used as charms and offerings, though sometimes worshipped.

"The Ainn of Japan."¹¹ I there say:—"The Ainn, particularly the women, are remarkably afraid of snakes. Many a time have I been sent for to act as snake executioner. On one occasion I was asked to go and kill a snake which had got into an old man's storehouse. I found it, and saw that it had a very large stomach, as though it had been gorging itself. As soon as it was killed I invited the master of the storehouse to come and look at it; and when he saw its great size he assured me that if I would but make a post mortem examination of it I should find great treasure inside, which treasure, as the snake was killed on his premises, would belong to him. On examination we found that it had swallowed a large rat! The Ainn was dumfounded and angry at this being rewarded or punished for his greed. A somewhat similar case in which a young man now with me took part has also come to my knowledge. But a young hare was found in the stomach of the snake he killed, and not a rat, and it was not for treasure that the reptile was killed, but in order to get rid of a supposed demon and prevent a woman who had seen it from being possessed.

The Ainn declare it to be very unlucky to see the skeleton of a snake stretched out lengthwise. One does sometimes come across such when travelling in the interior after the grass has been burnt off in the early spring. The sight of one of them is supposed to mean a curse. In order to avoid the curse one must expectorate upon the ground and say:—Turam koro guru kira! "the coward was running." It is likewise considered unlucky to see the skeleton of one of these reptiles lie curled up. In such a case the curse may be avoided by simply saying Kametek koro guru na! "What a brave one! This last one died standing against the fire, while the former died running away from it." These phrases have reference to the boast of the original serpent who is supposed to have descended in lightning and who said he would brave even fire for the sake of the goddess of fire.

UNION CHURCH, YOKOHAMA.

The annual meeting of members of this Church was held on Monday evening in the Van Schwick Hall, the Rev. J. H. Ballagh presiding. After prayer by the Rev. J. L. Deering the Treasurer's report was presented by Mr. S. E. Unite, who pointed out that the income of the Church represented by the first two items of the accounts, showed a total of yen 3,007.49, as against 2,750.37 the preceding year. He expressed his thanks for the kind assistance rendered by the Misses Kuhn and Mr. C. T. Sale, in collecting the amount of yen 1,500 as a subscription for Dr. Meacham. While the balance sheet presented to the meeting showed a debit balance of yen 47.65, still since the books had been closed a cheque had been received from Mr. Thomas Rose, and another sum of yen 20 from another quarter, and thus, instead of a debit balance, the Church started the new financial year with yen 30 in hand. The accounts were as follow:—

The Report was passed on the motion of the Rev. E. S. Booth, seconded by Mr. POLLARD, a vote of thanks being passed to the Treasurer.

The Rev. E. S. BOOTH reported that since Dr. Meacham's departure the Elders had met and arranged for pulpit supplies, and arrangements had been made to have two services on Sunday evening. He referred to the loss the church had sustained by the death of Mr. W. Barrie.

On the election of officers being taken, Mr. C. V. SALE pointed out that the existence of the church was endangered by the continued absence of a Pastor. There appeared to be no one in Japan at once able and willing to take the position, and the engagement of a pastor from abroad involved some element of risk which could not be undertaken in the present state of their finances. The only course he could see was to provide for the continuance of the church services in such a manner that the congregation could be kept together, and for the establishment of a fund which would enable them, when the opportunity offered, to risk experiments which they could not now undertake. He proposed,—"That an Honorary Pastor be elected whose office it shall be to obtain supplies for the morning services, to conduct those services, and administer the sacraments, and, together with the elders, to have the oversight of the spiritual needs of the Church and congregation. That the usual pastoral duty of general visitation should be delegated to the elders who shall give the Honorary Pastor information concerning new arrivals, cases of illness, or any special need of a pastor's services. That the elders provide for the Sunday evening services. That the Treasurer be authorized to disburse on the Honorary Pastor's order a sum averaging ten yen per Sunday for the supplies and any other small expenses which may be incurred by him in the services of the church. That the value of the Honorary Pastor's services be fixed at 100 yen per month, and that the sum be placed by the Treasurer each month in a separate account to be known as the Union Church Pastors' Fund. That the Rev. C. E. Booth be invited to take the position of honorary pastor." Mr. Sale mentioned that he had already asked Mr. Booth for permission to put forward his name, and the latter had very generously suggested that the remuneration should take the form of establishing a Pastors' Fund. Mr. Booth had always taken a deep interest in the church, and they were much indebted to him for undertaking the task of providing supplies for several long periods during the past 20 years.

The motion was seconded by Mr. BUNTING and carried to its authority.

The officers were elected as follows: Elders, Rev. H. Loomis, Mr. Finch, Mr. Bunting; Deacons, Messrs. G. Booth, C. V. Sale, and S. E. Unite; Deaconesses, Mrs. Bunting, Mrs. Loomis, Mrs. Fisher, and Mrs. Stansland; Trustees, Mr. C. V. Sale, Mr. T. Rose, Mr. L. Pollard, Mr. MacArthur, Mr. F. Stansland, and Mr. G. Booth; ushers, Mr. Fitzgerald and Mr. Bunting, jun.; organist, Mr. T. Southall.

Some discussion took place on the unsatisfactory state of the organ, and the Trustees were asked to give their consideration to it.

Several members expressed the opinion that it would be advantageous to remove the place of meeting to the Bluff, and the matter was finally left for the consideration of the Elders.

YOKOHAMA FIRE BRIGADE.

The annual meeting of the Yokohama Fire Brigade was held on Thursday afternoon. There were present Messrs. Jas. Walter, W. B. Walter, J. P. Morrison, E. Flint Kilby, and J. D. Hutchison, Hon. Secretary and Treasurer. Mr. Jas. Walter was voted to the chair.

THE REPORT.

The report and accounts were as follow:—

REMARKS ON ACCOUNTS.—During the year, the contributions from the various Fire Offices have amounted to Yen 3,005.00, and the Policy Fees paid in to the Hongkong and Shanghai Bank by the Agents of the Fire Insurance Companies amount to Yen 3,785.00. These figures show respectively an increase of Yen 50.00 and Yen 1,608.50 compared with the Brigade's income for 1897, but a portion of the latter sum really belongs to fees for the previous year. The Working Account shows a slight increase in expenditure over that of the previous twelve months, but this is fully accounted for by the additional expense attached to the keeping up of the new Hose-reel Station on Lot No. 107, Settlement.

WATCHMEN AND PATROL.—The usual look-out at the Tower has been kept up all through the year, while the Patrol-men have been on duty during the regular winter months. The Hose-reel Station referred to in last Report has proved to be of very valuable assistance to the Brigade.

FIRES, &c.—The full particulars given below show that the Brigade men have answered in all 13 calls during the year. The Waterworks water supply has been good at all fires in the Settlement.

SUPERINTENDENT'S REPORT.

Yokohama Fire Brigade, Yokohama,
January 1st, 1898.

To the Fire Brigade Committee,
Gentlemen,—I have the honour to present the following report of the work of the Yokohama Fire Brigade during the year 1898.

The number of calls for Fires, or supposed Fires, have amounted during the year to 13. Of these in the Settlement 6 slight, 2 false alarms, and 1 kitchen destroyed.

On Bluff 1 house destroyed. On Native Bluff, 1 house destroyed.

In Native Town 2 godowns destroyed, 1 shed slight, and 4 houses destroyed.

The causes as reported were as follows, viz:—

SETTLEMENT.

The figures above only refer to calls which involved the turning out of the Firemen, Fire Engines, Hose Reels, &c., belonging to the Yokohama Fire Brigade.

I beg to place on record that the Fire Brigade have worked most amicably with the Police and Waterworks authorities. I think it but right to mention Mr. S. Ikariyama, Inspector in Charge of Settlement Police Station, for his urbanity at all times and his endeavours to have his force in unity with ours.

I have the honour to be,
Your obedient servant,
N. MORGIN,
Supt., Yokohama Fire Brigade.

E. & O. E.

J. D. HUTCHISON, Hon. Sec. & Treas.
Examined with Vouchers and found correct.
E. FLINT KILBY, Auditor.
Yokohama, Jan. 30th, 1899.

The CHAIRMAN, commenting on the report and accounts, said there was a substantial increase on the amount of subscriptions collected and of policy fees paid into the bank as compared with the previous year, but part of that money actually belonged to the last account. There was a slight increase in the working account owing to the formation of a hose reel station at No 107, Settlement.

On the motion of Mr. MORRISON, seconded by Mr. E. FLINT KILBY, the report and accounts were adopted.

As no member of the public was present the Committee had perforce to continue in office.

THE BLUFF WATER SUPPLY.

The CHAIRMAN said it had been suggested that the Honorary Secretary and Treasurer should communicate with the Water Works authorities and ascertain whether anything was being done to supply the Bluff with water, which was very necessary both for fire and for household purposes. In reply to a letter from Mr. Hutchinson, Mr. Asada, Supt. of the Water Works, wrote: "I am in receipt of yours dated the 8th inst. regarding the question of water supply to the Bluff Concession. In reply I beg to inform you that the extending of water supply to the Bluff has now been determined upon and that we can commence such supply about the end of 1901."

Mr. W. B. WALTER thought it would be very desirable to have the supply of water to the Bluff expedited. Possibly later on it might be arranged to have it on the Bluff earlier than the end of 1901.

COMPLIMENTARY.

The CHAIRMAN spoke of the debt the community owed to Mr. Hutchinson for his services, and, in replying, Mr. Hutchinson said Mr. Flint Kilby had promised to look after the affairs of the Brigade during his temporary absence, Mr. Marshall taking the routine duty of attending to the accounts.

LANGFELDT & CO., LIMITED.

The half-yearly meeting of this company was held on Thursday afternoon at Keil's Building. Mr. J. F. Lowder in the chair. Those present were Messrs. F. H. Bull, A. C. Read, C. Weinberger (Director), A. Langfeldt, F. Grosser, Eckhart, J. Tannor, Clark, G. R. Bennett, H. W. Fraser, Arnold, E. B. Jones, Bergmann, and J. Feicke, Secretary.

THE DEATH OF MR. KEIL.

The CHAIRMAN, in opening the meeting, referred to the death of Mr. Keil, with whom, he said, he had been intimately associated from the moment he took up the idea of promoting the purchase of the business of Langfeldt and Mayer in the year 1890 to his death, having served with him continuously on the board of directors during that time. Mr. Keil's character presented many facets, each giving evidence by its individual brilliancy to the purity of the gem from whose depths its lustre was derived. Its chief features were self-denial, and active benevolence. A heart, ever overflowing with love and sympathy, and pity, and desire to succour the helpless and afflicted,—a large that neither envy nor anything that was petty or mean ever found entrance into his thoughts; an enthusiasm in all he undertook, which never cooled, and which, whether it originated in that catholic spirit of charity which was his life's impulse, or whether it had for its object the promotion of some business plan or arrangement, was so unselfish that it carried everyone who came near it into its irresistible vortex; a hatred of dishonesty,—a total suppression of self,—such were some of the prominent characteristics of his nature. In business matters, a huge capacity for painstaking work, a store of energy, a power of concentration, a mastery of principle, and a love of accuracy and of detail. "It's all right," Keil says so," was a sufficient assurance for most men. Among the shareholders, and those connected with that company's business there was no one who could wholly fill his place; and yet in their Manager, they had a man on whom Mr. Keil at all times placed unquestioning reliance, and who was deserving of the utmost confidence. His knowledge and experience, extending as they had over the whole period of the existence of the Company, and derived, as they had been, from the closest association with Mr. Keil in the management of the business of the Company during that time, make him eminently fitted to continue to carry it on. This he said for the express purpose of allaying any fears that might be entertained as to the future, owing to the loss they had sustained; and he was certain that if Mr. Keil were still with them he would echo the assurance he (the Chairman) gave them that though Mr. Keil's loss was a serious one, it was not irreparable as long as they were able to retain the services of Mr. Feicke.

THE COMPANY'S POSITION.

The affairs of the company were in such a position that there was absolutely no more ground for anxiety now than there was during the period to which the report and accounts referred, and in order that there might be independent testimony on these and other points, Messrs. Weinberger and A. C. Read were, two days ago, invited to join the Board of Directors. They at once proceeded to make careful inspection of the books, and of the stock, and close enquiry into the affairs generally, and into the method of managing the business; and the result was that they were entirely satisfied, and joined in the assurance which he (the chairman) had just given them. Of course it was not possible to say how soon they might again be able to look for such exceptional dividends as had been distributed of recent years. That depended on matters entirely beyond their control. But they had lost none of their business connections, and none of their ability to benefit by them; they were forming new relations and hoped to form others; and for the moment they were waiting, without anxiety, the right time for the profitable investment of that large portion of their working capital which, as the accounts showed, was temporarily lying idle for lack of opportunity to turn it over. Looking at the statement of assets and liabilities as on the 31st December, 1898, they would see that the first item was an asset consisting of stock of merchandise and shipchandlery, amounting to yen 108,047.37. Considering that this Company commenced business on a capital of 100,000 dollars, they might suppose that this was rather a large stock to carry. But the business had been increasing ever since they purchased it, and three or four years ago it was necessary they should increase that capital by yen 50,000. With regard to the valuation of the stock, it had been valued for the purpose of this account by their auditor, who, having fallen ill during the audit, was assisted by Mr. H. W. Fraser, of the Hongkong and Shanghai Bank. They together had inspected the stock of merchandise, and he, the chairman, was able to assure them that not only upon the report which was before them, but also upon the inspection which had been made recently, when the new Directors joined the Board, that the stock of merchandise and shipchandlery was in first-rate condition, and the valuation before them was at the cost price of the goods laid down in Yokohama. The plant and fixtures and so forth called for no comment, but the sundry debtors and cash in Bank, representing nearly the amount of their working capital, was lying there waiting for an opportunity to invest. On the other side, turning to the liabilities,—the capital was 1,500 shares at 100 dollars, carried out at yen 150,000. That was to say, they had taken one yen as the equivalent of one dollar, but it was worth a great deal more, and if that figure were carried out it would show a great deal more favourably. It was better, however, to do as they had hitherto done and carry out the capital into yen at par, instead of altering it every time according to the exchange of the day. The general expenses amounted to yen 10,041.76. In looking over the account for the past eight years, the general expenses had hardly varied. They began with 8,000 dollars and they were now 10,000 in consequence of certain increases they had made from time to time in the salaries of the staff. The general expenses included salaries and wages, and it might be better, perhaps, in another half year to separate the general expenses from salaries. The result of the account was that the gross profit on trade, instead of what they had been accustomed to in recent years, was only yen 17,898.15, and therefore they were only able to recommend a dividend for the half-year of yen 7,500; but if they would look back to the past they would see there were many half-years very much worse than that. In the last half of '91, the whole of '92, and '93, they sometimes were able to divide 4,000 dollars of net profit, and sometimes 6,000 and sometimes 8,000. Then they suddenly made a jump of yen 25,000, and now for this last half-year they had come down to yen 7,500, which was by no means the lowest limit they had touched, and by no means, taking into consideration all the circumstances, a bad dividend to be able to declare for the half-year. In fact, he considered it a very good dividend, and if they added it to the dividend for the preceding half year, they would see the company had earned 35 per cent. He had to make these remarks, because he was told there was a little dissatisfaction at the accounts, but he saw no reason why there should be, except that they would all like to earn more than they had earned. But it had not been owing to any defect in the management of the Company, or falling off or loss in their legitimate business. They would see in the report that Mr. Meyerdicks had been invited to rejoin the Board in consequence of the resignation of Mr. Reiz. The latter was invited to rejoin the Board, but he had since then written to say it was quite impossible he should pay the requisite attention to their interests. Mr. Bull and himself, the Chairman, retired by rotation, and it would be necessary for them, therefore, either to re-elect them or not if they pleased. The Directors had much pleasure in recommending the retention of the services of Mr. Hutchinson as auditor.

Mr. BENNETT—I have much pleasure in proposing the adoption of the accounts, also the dividend.

Mr. TANNOR seconded, and the motion was carried unanimously.

DIRECTORS AND AUDITOR.

On the proposition of Mr. H. W. FRASER, seconded by Mr. BERGMAN, Messrs. Lowder and Bull were reappointed Directors, and on the motion of the CHAIRMAN Mr. Hutchinson was re-elected auditor.

The CHAIRMAN then thanked the shareholders present for their attendance and the proceedings terminated.

Report of the Directors, and Statement of Accounts, to be submitted at the Sixteenth Semi-Annual Meeting of Shareholders, held at No. 61, Main Street, Yokohama, on Thursday, the 9th day of February, 1899, at 4 o'clock in the afternoon.

The Statement of Assets and Liabilities, and Profit and Loss Account for the half-year ended the 31st day of December, 1898, accompany this Report.

The Net Profit for the half-year, including balance brought forward from the 30th June, 1898, and after providing for General Expenses, Directors' and Auditor's fees, Depreciation, bad and doubtful Debts, and the rectification of an omission in the accounts as rendered on the 30th June last, presently to be explained, amounts to..... Yen. 9,506.43 which it is proposed to apply as follows:—
In payment of a Dividend of 5 yen..... Yen. 7,500.00 per share for the half-year..... 7,500.00
Bonus to employees..... 800.00
Balance to new account..... 1,206.43

Your Directors have to express great regret for an inadvertent omission, when submitting the accounts to the 30th June last, to provide for meeting a liability incurred during the first half of the year, but not falling due to be paid until the second half. Owing to this omission, the moneys which would have been available for division during the last-named period, have been reduced by the sum of 6,400 yen, though the dividend of 25 yen per share for the whole year is unaffected.

Mr. Meyerdicks has been invited to rejoin the Board in consequence of the resignation of Mr. Reiz.

Messrs. Bull and Lowder retire by rotation, but offer themselves for re-election.

The Directors have much pleasure in recommending the retention of the services of Mr. Hutchinson as Auditor for the current year.

THE NAGASAKI HOTEL, LIMITED.

The following is the report of the directors of the above Company presented at the fifth half yearly Ordinary General Meeting of shareholders:—

The Directors have now the pleasure to lay before the Shareholders a statement of the Company's accounts for the six months ended 31st December, 1898.

Taking into consideration the disadvantage under which the Hotel was opened and also the working shown during December, the Directors have every reason to anticipate good results in the future.

In accordance with the Articles of Association of the Company, Mr. Ringer retires by rotation from the post of Director, but offers himself for re-election.

Notes (abridged) by Emil Kameny, in The Ledger, Philadelphia.

(a) In the fifth game of the match Q Kt to Q2 was played. The text move is more aggressive.

(b) Endangers the King's side.

(c) He could not well play P takes B. Black answers Kt to K5, regaining the piece, with a decided advantage in position.

(d) Better perhaps was B to B8. Another play for Black was Kt to K5, which might have been answered by R (K3) to K2 and P to KR3.

(e) He could not retreat the Kt, for Q to R7 ch would have led to a winning attack. Black being two Pawns ahead, was quite justified in selecting this continuation, for the three Pawns will at least make up for the loss of the Kt. He, however, overlooked the brilliant continuation White had on hand, which leads to a speedy win.

(f) Brilliant and sound play. By sacrificing the Rook, White opens the diagonals, thus establishing a winning attack.

(g) He had hardly any other defence. White threatened Q to R7 ch, as well as Q to Kt6 ch, leading to a mate. The text play is quite promising.

(h) Excellent play. White can well afford to sacrifice the Kt, for Q to Kt6 or Q to R7 ch will win easily. The move prevents Black's intended R takes Kt and R to B8 continuation.

(i) Necessary, since Q to Kt7 mate was threatening, as well as Q takes B.

(k) He could not capture the Bishop on account of Q to R7 ch, followed by Q takes R.

THE PLEASURES OF CHESS.

Thou knowest not, friend, the joys that Caissa yields

To those who do her inmost parts explore;
O sweeter far are they than ancient lore
To him who travels in poetic fields;
Or the stern strife so dear to him who wields
The patriotic sword. Thou knowest not friend,
Nor is it always given unto the wise
To know her great and varied possibilities,
Resources vast, and riches without end.
Oft o'er her ordered squares have we resolved
Plots vast and deep as e'er were thought or penned,
And subtler strategy than e'er evolved
From out the brain of him whose mighty plan
O'erwhelmed the Gallic legions at Sedan.

END GAME.

BLACK.

WHITE.

White to play and draw.

The following is the answer to this interesting end game.

WHITE.	BLACK.

DEATH.

At Yokohama, on January 31st, OSCAR OTTO KELL, aged 58 years.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

HIS MAJESTY the Emperor is suffering from a slight cold.

PRINCE YAMASHINA arrived at Kyoto on the 29th and afterwards left for Ujima.

THE NIPPON RAILWAY Company has decided to declare a dividend of 8½ per cent. per annum.

COL. KITCHENER is returning to Omdurman after an unsuccessful pursuit of the Khalifa.

As the late Count Kato left no direct male issue, it has been decided that the Peerage shall lapse.

MR. JUNKER's second grand concert took place at the Public Hall on Monday and drew a good house.

THE English Churchmen of Kobe have decided to build a rectory on the land adjoining All Saints' Church.

THE Tokyo Dramatic and Musical Society will give a theatrical performance at the Sho-iei-kai on February 14th.

IT has been decided that the enforcement of the new Commercial Code shall take place on the 15th June.

THE torpedo destroyer Murakumo, which has been constructed in England, is to leave for Japan in a few days' time.

THE Yokohama Engine and Iron Works have had another very successful year, and declare a dividend of 10 yen per share.

THE Hankahn Railway was recently completed. Traffic was opened on the 29th ult., when over two hundred guests were invited.

AN engine on the Boso Railway was derailed on the 28th January near Chiba station. Some four or five passengers received injuries.

THE construction of the jail at Negishi has been completed. Prisoners are to be removed from Tobe Jail from the 6th proximo.

IT is reported that Marquis Ito will proceed to the west again, after his mother has regained her health. He is now staying at Oia.

A DESPATCH from Mr. Odagiri, Japanese Consul General at Shanghai, states that small-pox is prevalent there, and is likely to increase in virulence.

THE iron safe of the warship Isukushima, then anchoring at Yokosuka, was broken into on the 26th January, and money amounting to yen 160 was stolen.

THE first payment of the public loan of yen 2,055,000 for the Yokohama Water Works has been completed, and the remainder will be paid by the 10th proximo.

AT Esashi, Kitami province, Hokkaido, gold-bearing sand has been discovered. About 40 swanne has been already secured by the people residing in the vicinity.

A POLICEMAN named Kuriya Tora-jiro (40), of Wadayama, Kobe, has stolen yen 440, breaking open the iron safe belonging to the station. He is supposed to be in Tokyo.

ADVICES from Brussels state that Major Lothaire's soldiers have joined the Bataste mutineers, killing their officers. The Major has been wounded and taken prisoner.

A WASHINGTON despatch says that the House of Representatives has passed the Army Bill fixing the minimum strength of the national Army at 5,000 and the maximum at 95,000.

THE amalgamation of the Osaka 34th Bank, the Nippon Kyodo, and the Nippon Chinnai Banks has been settled. The business is to be carried on under the name of the 34th Bank.

MR. G. KELL, for many years Secretary of the Yokohama Chamber of Commerce, shot himself at the Phoenix Saw Mills, on Tuesday, while in a state of temporary mental un soundness.

THE Korean refugee Chong Yee ying arrived at Tokyo from Nagoya on the 27th to visit Prince Li Yun yung, grandson of the late Tai Wön kun, at Ikegami, and Mr. Pak Yongho of Orai.

A MAID servant named Yamakawa Shiko (21), in the employ of Mr. Doi Seiki, a barrister living at Hachioji, who stole yen 1,200 belonging to her employer and is now in jail under sentence of 4 years' imprisonment, attempted to commit suicide on the 24th ult. by hanging herself. She was, however, cut down in time by the jailor.

A COOLIE named Heumi Junichi (43) and his wife Fuji (29), living at Ofikano machi, Chichibu, Saitama prefecture, murdered his father, named Yasujiro (63), by beating him to death with a club.

ON the 22nd, Mr. Ujijasu, a Grand Chamberlain, proceeded with a message of condolence from the Emperor to the house of the late Mr. Awata, Professor of Literature. He was the bearer of a gift for the family.

THE Filipinos have definitely declared a republic and protested against the annexation of the Philippine Islands by the United States. The Americans are hastening the dispatch of reinforcements to the Philippines.

THE Russian Legation in Seoul are said to be hurrying on the work at the Russian Cathedral. Recently two missionaries under orders from Bishop Nicolai, of Tokyo, arrived in Seoul to conduct services.

A NEW political party is promised. It will probably be called the New Constitutional Party, and the promoters, among whom is Mr. Shimada Saburo, are trying to obtain a building for the head office.

IT is announced that the Russian Government intend to place the fisheries of Saghalien under a monopoly. Japanese fishermen have been in these waters for many years, and a protest will probably be made against the innovation.

THE ritualistic controversy is becoming acute in England. At a demonstration by ten thousand people at the Albert Hall, it was resolved to uphold the Protestant demand for the suppression of the mass and confession in the Established Church.

THE Times announces that the Chinese five per cent. loan to the extent of £2,300,000 sterling has definitely been arranged for, being guaranteed by the Northern railways. The Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation will issue the prospectus at the end of the week.

THE directors and shareholders of the Kyoto Imperial Fire Insurance Company (paid up capital yen 500,000), held a general meeting on the 29th and decided to wind up the concern. It is reported that the Company has lost yen 40,000.

A WASHINGTON despatch says that the Senate has resolved to take a final vote on the Peace Treaty on the sixth of February. It further states that there is in America a tendency to the increase of the opposition to imposing American rule in the Philippines.

THE Right Hon. Arthur J. Balfour, First Lord of the Treasury, speaking at Manchester, said that he was convinced that the strength and efficiency of the British armaments constituted the best security to universal peace, and that he regarded the good understanding established with the United States as the surest guarantee to future civilization throughout the world.

A TELEGRAM has reached the Government to the effect that the Czar has made the following proposals for discussion at the Peace Congress:—(1) Abolition of the use of balloons and of the use of explosives from balloons; (2) Abolition of explosive shells and bullets in naval and military warfare; (3) Vessels despatched to save lives to be recognized as having the privileges of neutrals.

SUICIDE OF MR. OSCAR KEIL.

Yokohama was shocked on Tuesday morning by the news that Mr. Oscar Otto Keil, Secretary of the Yokohama General Chamber of Commerce, had been found in an insensible condition near one of the sawpits of the Phoenix Saw Mills, Creek-side. At 9 o'clock on Tuesday morning, Mr. Keil was in the bar of the German Club conversing with Mr. Luther, the Manager, and appeared to be in the enjoyment of his accustomed health and spirits. Within an hour an employé of the Saw Mills, going the round of the mill on business, found Mr. Keil's body lying extended behind a pile of boards, a revolver near at hand. The unfortunate man, who was still breathing, though unconscious, had shot himself through the mouth. With all possible haste medical men were summoned and the body conveyed to the German Hospital on the Bluff, where he lingered until about a quarter to 12 o'clock. His couch was surrounded by many sorrowing friends, who arrived only to see him die.

Mr. Keil, who was born at Breslau 58 years ago, was at first intended for a physician's career, but not liking the profession turned his attention to music. In early manhood, having been left a competence, he travelled to the United States, where he took out naturalization papers, and after spending several years among the gold-diggings extended his travels to Japan. At first he occupied a position as school-teacher at Nagoya, but afterwards started in business in Yokohama. As the years went on he gradually took up the work of public accountant and then became Secretary of the Yokohama Chamber of Commerce. Mr. Keil was head of the American Rite of Freemasonry in Japan, holding the 33rd degree in the Southern Jurisdiction of the United States. He had filled the principal chair in the Scotch and English Lodges working in the Craft, Mark, and Arch degrees, besides being for many years District Grand Secretary of the D.G.L. of Japan.

Mr. Keil's exceptionally cheerful nature, the rare helpfulness and kindness of his disposition, his unflaggingly active and successful life, were all inconsistent with any of the theories usually formulated to account for self-destruction. It can scarcely be doubted, we think, that he succumbed to the climatic effects which have already proved so frequently fatal in this Settlement. Yokohama's record long ago established the fact that there is something in the air of the place which creates in many persons a condition of nervous tension such that events, insignificant in themselves, assume the dimensions of unendurable strokes of fate, and death becomes the only apparent refuge for the sufferer. During the past two months, Mr. Keil was known to be afflicted with nervous prostration which is said to have driven him to the use of anesthetics. Though retaining his wonted brightness and activity, the highly disordered state of his nerves did not escape the notice of his friends, and, now that the end has come so sadly, many incidents will probably be recalled indicating the possibility of a catastrophe at any moment. It is the tendency of such a disease to incite efforts which help to aggravate it. There was no ostensible reason why Mr. Keil should have over-worked himself, but the fact is that he could not be content to take the rest which his condition so sorely needed, and it is conceivable that when the intolerable pain of continuing the struggle finally overcame his strength of endurance, no consciousness remained with him except a bewildered recollection of the one infallible place of repose. There is no occasion to write any eulogy of his life or character. Such expressions as that he was universally beloved and respected, offend in his case by their conventionalism. Yet they are literally true. Charity seemed to be the guiding principle of his existence, and we may say of him with absolute veracity that he lived for others rather than for himself. Doubtless to these extraordinarily philanthropic instincts may be attributed his devotion to Free Masonry, which is before everything a cult of brotherly love and unstinted benevolence. It seems almost like a happy dispensation that his portrait was painted for the Masons of Yokohama a few months ago.

His funeral takes place this afternoon.

CRIMINAL PROCEDURE.

One of the apprehensions entertained by thoughtful persons when forecasting the operation of the Revised Treaties is that frivolous charges of fraud may be preferred against foreigners and lightly taken up by tribunals. A creditor may suspect—a common enough suspicion—that a debtor has behaved dishonestly, and may induce some public procurator to adopt that view without due scrutiny. We have heard it alleged in well informed quarters that abuses of that character are not uncommon. Considerable interest attaches, therefore, to some statistics just published by the officials of the Tokyo Local Court. They show that out of 4,675 criminal charges submitted last year to the public procurators within the Court's jurisdiction, 994, or 26 per cent., were dismissed as groundless. In these instances no arrests were made, nor were the accused persons subjected to any inconvenience. The figures, however, seem to partially bear out the apprehension suggested above, though happily the astuteness of the law officers averted any miscarriage of justice. It would appear, also, that in the vast majority of instances the discretion of the public procurators was wisely exercised. For among the 3,681 cases of persons actually summoned or arrested, 182 were dismissed at the preliminary examination, and among the 3,499 remanded for trial, 3,407 were convicted and only 92, or something over 2 per cent., were found innocent.

These figures are distinctly re-assuring. They seem to indicate a satisfactory condition of criminal jurisdiction, in Tokyo at all events. But they do not touch the great trouble, namely, that accused persons are detained for long periods awaiting trial, and that, partly through their own apathy or ignorance of criminal procedure, and partly through the timidity of the judges, the privilege of bail is not often obtained. We have been informed, in the course of investigations made on this subject, that the average time of detention awaiting trial is 70 days, and that in the case of serious crimes it averages 120 days. If that record be even approximately true, it indicates a most defective state of affairs. Happily the judges and public procurators seem disposed to introduce useful reforms. One is to appoint at each Court a shuban henji, or procurator on weekly duty, who must remain at his post unremittingly for seven days so as to be always ready to investigate complaints. We explained in a previous issue that a public procurator is supposed to live constantly in the immediate neighbourhood of a Court, and to be available, day and night, for examining persons arrested. The procurator on weekly duty appears to be an additional precaution against delays. It is further stated that, at a meeting of police inspectors and captains of gendarmes, held on the 25th instant, the following five resolutions were adopted:—(1) In the case of a person accused of a crime, the documents relating to the case shall have a red tag attached to them, and shall be immediately submitted to the procurator on weekly duty. Should that officer find that there is no prima facie case, the accused shall be forthwith liberated. Should a prima facie case be judged to exist, he shall be brought up for trial on the following day. (2) Applications for bail made by an accused person have hitherto been refused in 7 or 8 cases out of ten, from which it would appear that some understanding in favour of refusal exists among the judges. Hereafter, applications for bail shall be granted as far as possible. (3) Witnesses shall hereafter be summoned by telephone as much as possible, so as to avoid the delay and expense of using bailiffs. (4) When criminal accusations are laid before a public procurator, without being accompanied by proper proofs, he shall not entertain them, and every effort shall be made to prevent the arrest of innocent persons. (5) The chief procurator shall unfailingly make a daily examination of the record of accused persons.

In connexion with this subject, passing reference may be made to an extraordinary statement recently advanced by a Kobe journal, to the effect that the indifference or timidity of prisoners could have nothing to do with their failure to obtain bail, since it is the duty of the public procurator to apply for bail on their behalf. Unfortunately that idea is quite erroneous. It would doubtless be a very good system if the public procurator could be charged with such a duty, but according to the Code of Criminal Procedure the prisoner or his friends must make the application. Perhaps the Kobe newspaper imagines, also, that the public procurator should find sureties for an accused person.

In another newspaper, a Yokohama journal, we find the following:—

Notwithstanding the enormous amount of puffing about the perfection of the Japanese Codes, when tested by actual practice, they are found wanting. To give an instance, which has lately occurred, a case arose which fully justified the granting an injunction to restrain, but it will scarcely be thought to be true, that it was found that the Courts in Japan had no such power vested in them by law, though both English and American Courts have the right, which in the interests of justice, they are frequently called upon to exercise. The defect mentioned has not been before pointed out.

The "enormous amount of puffing" referred to in this very pretty specimen of English "as she is heralded" exists entirely in the writer's imagination, for the Code of Civil Procedure, which alone is in question, has never been "puffed," or even journalistically reviewed, since it went into operation on January 1st, 1891. That, however, is a minor point. The important fact is the denial that the Courts in Japan are not legally invested with power "to grant an injunction to restrain." If the editor who makes that remarkable assertion refers to the Code of Civil Procedure, he will find that the whole of Chapter IV, Book VI, from Art. 737 to Art. 763, is devoted to the subjects of "Provisional Seizure and Provisional Disposition," and that the Courts have most full and sufficient competence to take steps of that nature in the interests of justice. It is amusing to learn that "the defect mentioned has not been before pointed out." We should think not, indeed!

It was recently stated by a local contemporary that Japanese Courts of Law have no power to grant an injunction to restrain. We pointed out that such an assertion is erroneous, for the whole of Chap. IV. Book VI. of the Code of Civil Procedure, from Art. 737 to Art. 763, is devoted to the subjects of "Provisional Seizure and Provisional Disposition," and by these provisions very full and sufficient competence of the nature in question is vested in the Courts. Our contemporary, in reply, first admits the justice of our correction, but then contends that its reference was to permanent injunction. This second contention is avowedly based on a discovery resulting from reference to the Code of Civil Procedure. One imagines that the obviously necessary precaution of referring to the Code would have been adopted before the original assertion was made, but such commonplace preliminaries are not always observed in the Far East. Our contemporary's new position is that "the Courts in Japan have no power whatever to grant permanent injunctions." We may change the terms in which that proposition is expressed in order to make its full import clear to lay minds:—"The Courts in Japan have no power whatever to enforce their own judgments." That is what it amounts to; that and nothing less. P. brings a suit against D., and, pending its decision, applies to the Court to restrain D. from pursuing or adopting a course prejudicial to the interests which P. asserts. The Court grants the application. The case is then duly tried, and judgment is rendered in P.'s favour, the judgment, as a matter of course, securing to P. all the relief to which he is legally entitled. What more is required? If the Court has competence to enforce its judgment, P.'s rights are fully asserted. Does any one seriously contend that Japanese Courts have not that competence? Surely such an extravagant assertion is not seriously advanced? It is true that the terminology of the Codes is not identical with that of English or American law. We do not find that the judgment of a Court takes the form of a "permanent injunction to restrain." But the same end is unfailingly attained, whatever be the language employed to attain it.

It appears that our contemporary's original allegation was based on information obtained from "a gentleman who is entitled to be considered learned in the law." The same gentleman, or presumably the same, now addresses our contemporary over the signature of "Jus Civile," and adduces the following illustration in support of his position:—

In the Courts of England and the United States I can pray for a final injunction against a certain person or persons trespassing on my ground,—a step which was frequently resorted to during the big coal strike in Pennsylvania two years ago. The Court will then hear the case as an injunction, and, if it thinks, there is sufficient reason, will grant a final and permanent injunction against the defendant doing what is complained of. If the defendant acts contrary to this decision, he can be arrested and brought up for contempt of Court, and such is the law in the United States that, in that case, he even loses his right to a trial by jury, which, by the way, secured a good deal of controversy in the case quoted. There is in Japan no Court or Judge, who has in himself the right or power to grant such an injunction.

Another "gentleman learned in the law," and that not merely Anglo-Saxon law but also the law forming the basis of the Japanese Codes, writes to us as follows with reference to the above:—

"Jus Civile" is, of course, right when he says that the word "injunction" is not to be found in the Japanese Law, but there can be no doubt that the new Codes furnish ample means to secure the same end as that compassed by "injunctions" in English and American law. Taking, for instance, the case of "trespass," which is specially chosen as an example by "Jus Civile," a decision of the Court as to the existence or non-existence of a person's right to enter the plaintiff's ground can be obtained by bringing an action, or by raising the question in a cross-action, under Art. 211 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. Pending the Court's decision, provisional dispositions are admissible, according to Art. 755 of the same Code. After the Court has rendered judgment declaring the non-existence of the defendant's right to enter the grounds of the plaintiff, the execution of the judgment is perpetually secured by Art. 733 of the Code of Civil Procedure in conjunction with Art. 414 par. 4 of the Civil Code. The Court can issue any order it considers necessary for the future preservation of the plaintiff's rights.

It should scarcely be necessary to warn English readers of the Japanese Codes that they are apt to fall into very serious errors if, from the absence of some particular terminology to which they are accustomed, they infer absence of all provisions couched in such terms by British or American legislators.

FUNDS FOR EDUCATION.

It is plain that the next demand of considerable dimensions made on the Treasury will be for educational purposes. The country's grants in aid of education have not expanded in anything like reasonable proportion to the growth of its revenue or its outlays on account of military and naval purposes. The statistics of 1897 showed that 66.6 per cent. of the boys of school-going age were receiving instruction, and that the total sum expended on their education was 15,207,037 yen, of which 11,455,098 yen was paid by the Communes, 3,372,947 yen, came from the students in the form of fees, whereas the drafts made upon City and Prefectural funds and on the Central Treasury aggregated only 478,892 yen. These figures relate, of course, to Primary Schools, and take no account of the Government's expenditures on the Department of Education, the Universities, and the High and Middle Schools. A society called the Association for Promoting National Education (Kokuritsun Kyoiku Kisei Domei kai) presented to the Diet, in its fourth session, a petition signed by 10,162 persons, urging that greater liberality should be exercised by the State in the matter of education, and the two Houses, last session, adopted a Representation advising that 20 million yen from the Indemnity should be appropriated to form an educational fund. The Government itself has doubtless all the desire in the world to comply with these suggestions, but the main thing is to find the necessary money.

AN EMERGENCY RESERVE.

It is understood to be the purpose of the Government to form an emergency reserve of 50 million yen with the residue of the Indemnity. The Kokumin Shimbun is puzzled to discover how such a sum can be obtained. It estimates the state of the Indemnity thus:—

Total sum received from China with interest	364,482,305
Sums already taken from the Indemnity or already allotted to purposes approved by the Diet	289,754,361
	74,727,944

Supplementary Budget—

No. 1, for 1898-9	2,400,905
No. 2, for 1898-9	1,142,383
No. 3, for 1898-9	1,800,000
No. 4, for 1898-9	100,900
No. 5, for 1898-9	898,965
No. 6, for 1898-9	37,102
No. 7, for 1898-9	1,110,143
Drafted to Imperial Estate	20,000,000
	27,490,398

Actually remaining

47,237,546

The Kokumin naturally asks how 50 million yen can be set aside out of 47 millions, but our contemporary seems to have lost sight of the fact that the Government's financial programme contemplates annual surpluses from 1900-1 onwards, which, by the end of the fiscal year 1905-6, will aggregate 107 million yen. The idea is to apply those surpluses to paying back the drafts made upon the Indemnity for the purpose of balancing previous yearly accounts.

THE JAPAN-CHINA BANK.

The projectors of the Japan-China Bank (Nis-shin Ginko) are of opinion that the Treasury should be their foster-parent to the extent of three million yen. Their scheme is extensive. They hope to finance all the trade that Japan does with China, Korea, and South Sea ports, and they talk of establishing their head office in Kobe with branches or agencies in Yokohama, Nagasaki, Hakodate, Shanghai, Hongkong, Amoy, Tientsin, Newchwang, Hankow, Canton, Chefoo, Chemulpo, and Fusan. Their capital is to be 10 million yen, and they expect to get three millions of it from the Treasury without interest, which sum they would hold as a reserve against losses. That means, of course, that the Treasury would merely stand sponsor to the extent of 3 millions. Public opinion, however, does not appear to be altogether favourable to the scheme. Some writers see no reason why a new institution should be started while the Specie Bank, with its 20 years' experience and its established credit, is ready to do the work. The difficulty calling for removal in the interests of trade is said to be that the Specie Bank will not grant bills for longer periods than 10 days' sight, which time is insufficient for transactions either in China or in Japan. Hence the whole trade between the two empires—a trade aggregating something like 100 million yen—tends to pass into the hands of Chinese merchants, though it is not explained why these latter enjoy greater financial facilities than their Japanese rivals, unless, indeed, the foreign banks are open to one and closed to the other, as seems to be the case. Recent incidents in Shanghai showed that Chinese traders receive large accommodation from the foreign banks there, and we presume that the same rules apply to Chinese traders in Japan, but assuredly Japanese merchants are not similarly favoured by foreign banks. The idea of the opponents of the Nissin Ginko is that the Government should give aid to the Specie Bank rather than to a new institution. It appears that the Government has already lodged 3 million yen worth of silver bullion with the Specie Bank, in order to enable it to lend money on easy terms to the exporters of cotton yarns, but the loan may be recalled after June next, and that possibility naturally hampers the Bank's transactions.

There are strong objections to the idea that no occasion exists for establishing a bank of Japan and China, since the functions to be undertaken by it can be discharged without difficulty by the Specie Bank. The Fiji Shimpō acts as spokesman of the objectors. Its chief argument is that as the Specie Bank works on a gold basis, it is not properly qualified to carry on the required business. It seems to us that such a contention is not very convincing. Japan is now a gold mono-metallic country, and the Japanese shareholders of the new Bank would scarcely consent to have their capital converted into silver and to receive their dividends in that metal. They might be willing to take the risk of working with silver, but they would naturally insist on having their dividends in gold, and on forming a special reserve to guarantee them against heavy losses from exchange on advances made in terms of silver. A bank with its head office in a gold mono-metallic country and with shareholders and customers who must ultimately convert everything into gold, could not derive much advantage from keeping its accounts in silver.

THE BANK OF KOREA.

It is alleged that the Bank of Korea, projected by Mr. Omiya Chobei, Baron Ozaki Saburo and others, will be started next May. The scheme hung fire for some time, owing to the same cause which has interrupted many enterprises, the unfavourable state of the money market and the consequent impossibility of obtaining funds. But there is a general expectation that an improvement will take place in economic conditions before the spring sets in. Strange to say, the projectors of this particular enterprise seem to have no intention of seeking assistance from the Japanese Treasury. They hope to raise 2 or 3 million yen of capital without making any draft upon official credit. But the success of their banking operations depends on getting the management of the Korean Government's funds and on obtaining note-issuing power in Seoul. Rumour alleges that they have already enlisted the active sympathy of some important Korean officials.

ACCIDENT AT YOKOHAMA STATION.

On the night of the 31st ult. the train from Hodozaya ran into the stop buffers at Yokohama station, and the engine was derailed. Three women and three men amongst the passengers sustained injuries. Two of the latter were seriously hurt, and are now in Yokohama Hospital.

PHYSICIANS' ASSOCIATION LAW.

The project of law for organizing associations of physicians has been carried in the Lower House, and is now awaiting discussion by the Peers. Meanwhile it is vehemently criticised in some quarters as a useless and possibly pernicious measure. Its supporters rely chiefly on the argument that some machinery is needed to prevent foreign quacks from setting up in the provincial districts without having the necessary sanction from the Authorities. It is evident, they say, that the Japanese are specially exposed to a danger of that kind, and, unless the orthodox members of the profession render some assistance, great abuses may be practised. That view of the case is certainly incontrovertible. The law, as it now stands, does not suffice to restrain charlatans. In no country does the law suffice for such a purpose. One has only to consult the advertising columns of an American or European paper to find innumerable announcements of medicines, patented and consultations invited by men who would not be recognised as legitimate members of the medical profession anywhere. It is not easy to see a valid reason why the individual should not come to the assistance of the legislature in such cases. There are laws in England, for example, against the brutal treatment of helpless creatures, but their restraining effects would be insignificant in practice were they not aided by the efforts of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals. Under existing conditions a totally unqualified charlatan may settle in some provincial district and practise medicine or surgery whenever he can find patients, but such an abuse would be effectually checked if every practitioner had to obtain the recognition of an association of duly licensed experts. The feature of the proposed measure which invites legitimate criticism is the pretence that it is rendered necessary by the inauguration of mixed residence. Why, at the present moment there are hundreds upon hundreds of Japanese practising medicine openly and doing excellent work, who have never taken out a diploma, but have received their training solely as apprentices and assistants of licensed experts. The passage of the Bill would sweep these people out of the field. Yet they play there a most useful part, for, while thoroughly competent to deal with all ordinary ailments, they are satisfied with a scale of remuneration which places their services within the reach of nearly every class. The suppression of such practitioners would be a great, a terrible, hardship to millions of people who can not afford to pay the fees of a licensed physician, and would therefore be virtually deprived of medical assistance altogether. There is a shrewd suspicion that the real object of the Bill is to drive these practitioners out of the arena, and thus add materially to the clientèle of the costly licensee. Speaking as foreigners, we are reluctant to traverse any measure calculated to protect Japanese against foreign charlatans, but we can not close our eyes to the fact that for every alien quack who might be hereafter restrained by this law, many hundreds of useful and fairly competent Japanese practitioners would be suppressed at once. The measure seems to bear the impress of insincerity, and we trust that the opposition will muster strength enough to obtain the rejection of the Bill when it comes up for its second reading in the House of Peers.

THE FOREIGN LOAN.

According to Tokyo journals, there are no less than seven competitors in the field for Japan's new foreign loan, four of them being English, one American, one German, and one French. Under such circumstances, the negotiating of the loan on favourable terms should not be difficult. Three-and-a-half per cent. bonds at 97 or 98 are talked of, but that may be regarded as an optimistic estimate. Three-and-a-half per cent. bonds at 92 would be nearer the level of the market, we imagine, and if Japan can obtain a loan on such terms, she may count herself very fortunate. It would pay her well, in that case, to convert her national debt, for if she borrowed 400 million yen abroad at 3½ per cent., selling the bonds at 92, she would save 4½ millions annually in interest by redeeming 400 millions of her five-per-cent., domestic debt. But, for our own part, we are disposed to doubt whether such transactions are possible. Her credit was better last spring when she sold her five-per-cent. War Bonds to an English syndicate at par, and if there be any truth in the rumours freely circulated, she had to pay more for the accommodation than the public in general imagined. If her five-per-cent. securities could not be sold at a better figure than par a year ago, her three-and-a-half's should certainly not fetch more than 70 now, for though her finances are perfectly sound, she has taken no manner of trouble to make the fact known to the world.

JAPANESE PUBLIC OPINION ON EXTRA-MARITAL RELATIONS

One of the results of the sensational disclosures published by the Yoroku Chōhō last year on the subject of extra-marital relations was the thorough discussion of the whole subject by writers of every school of thought. The majority of foreigners when considering such topics begin by assuming the superiority of Occidental to Oriental customs and have no hesitation in condemning the practice of concubinage in toto, because it is contrary to our Western canons. It is hardly necessary to point out that such a summary method of dealing with any long established Oriental custom appears to the Japanese to be no less arbitrary than unwarranted. With regard to Japanese opinion, the majority of the leading writers of the time hold that in most cases the circumstances which first gave a kind of moral sanction to the practice do not now exist, and that concubinage to-day is to be attributed to general looseness of morals. Mr. Fukuzawa Yūkichi, in his Ukiyo-dan, and Dr. Katō Hiroyuki, in No. 84 of the "Hundred Short Essays" both champion this view. Dr. Katō maintains that concubinage was quite a different thing in the eighth and ninth centuries and even in the Tokugawa era from what it is now. The practice, now so common, of making geisha concubines, was unknown in olden times. Nor was it allowable for gentlemen to choose concubines from women belonging to the lower classes. The one recognised object of using concubines was the perpetuation of the family line. No other reason for resorting to it would have been deemed valid by Japanese society prior to the Meiji era. Dr. Katō further remarks that the number of such women in foreign lands is certainly very large, and that hence when we come to actual practice the Orientals and Occidentals are on a level, with one difference: what is done in the East openly is carried on in secret in the West.

The Tetsugaku Zasshi argues that the practice can only be condemned in toto when referred to Western current moral standards, but that it considered in the light of Confucian and Buddhist teaching and the stress that they lay on the preservation of the family line, it is impossible to show it to be immoral. This organ is ready to concede that, as a matter of principle, the Western ethical standard which condemns concubinage in toto is in every way superior to the Oriental Confucian and Buddhist standard which sanctions the custom, but, in practice, the Tetsugaku Zasshi does not think that the Japanese people can follow the lead of the West under existing circumstances.

In the Shakai Zasshi and the Rikugō Zasshi, Mr. Yamagata Tōkon discusses the whole subject at great length. The value of his essay consists in the minute analysis that he furnishes of the statistics supplied by the Yoroku Chōhō. As a record of a state of things that actually exists the contents of some of his tables are worth reproduction here. Though some facts were misstated by the Yoroku Chōhō, the general opinion among the Japanese is that on the whole the account given of the prevalence of concubinage by this organ was correct. The cases referred to amounted to 493. These are divided under various headings. First we have 183 instances of geisha who have been made concubines. Among the cases quoted are 7 Ministers or ex-Ministers of State, 5 Peers, 7 Barristers, and 3 learned doctors. The rest are nearly all business men. The next table given by Mr. Yamagata concerns instances of servant girls being used as concubines. They total 36. It is explained that the Japanese term for servant-girl (jochu) includes the naka-bataraki, or maid of all work, the homa-sukaye, or errand-girl, and the o-shaku, or wine-server. Among the gentlemen who, presumably for purposes of economy, says Mr. Yamagata, turn their servants into concubines are 1 ex-Minister, 1 Vice-Minister, 3 Members of the House of Peers, 7 Peers, and 1 School-teacher. There are 8 instances given of girls serving at houses of assignation being made concubines, 18 of restaurant girls and 3 of yadoya girls. The number of prostitutes who have been turned into concubines is comparatively few, 17 cases only being given by Mr. Yamagata. Fifteen instances are given of adopted daughters who are used as concubines. The number of existing cases in which this practice is followed, Mr. Yamagata thinks to be very large. Seventeen instances are given of the keepers of chaya, gisha establishments, restaurants and houses of assignation—who are usually remarkably talented women in their line—being converted into concubines. These women are so accustomed to rule and are so strong-willed that it is said that instead of calling them concubines, which in Japanese always bears the meaning of subordination, the men with whom they consort should be called their concubines. It may not be generally known that the term Danshō, male-concubine, is actually applied in Japan to this class of persons. Seven cases are given in which widows have been made concubines.

The full list as given by Mr. Yamagata stands thus:—

Mr. Yamagata is opposed to the practice and proposes as measures for its suppression (1) The branding of the children of concubines with disgrace (surely a very unjust proceeding); (2) a public exposure of the manner in which concubines are obtained and of the objectionable features of the life they lead; (3) the ostracising of those who persist in continuing the practice.

In No. 19 of the Nippon Shugi, Mr. Yumoto Takeliko defends concubinage as an absolute necessity in Japan. He does not distinguish between the different reasons alleged for keeping concubines, but maintains that the practice should not be interfered with, as the preservation of family lines and the populating of the country are largely dependent on its observance.

The result of our inquiry then, may be stated in a very few words. Concubinage, as practised in Japan to-day, is almost universally condemned by leading writers, but there are not a few influential men, like Mr. Nishimura Shigeki, who hold that men not able to obtain children by their lawful wives are quite justified in keeping a concubine. The practice was sanctioned among the Hebrews on this ground, says Mr. Yumoto, and what was good enough for the race that gave to Christians the greater part of their Bible is good enough for us. In questions of this kind it is quite plain there is no universally acknowledged standard. Many Japanese maintain that their centuries of what we should call polygamy yielded as good results physically and mentally as our monogamy, and hence that there is no call for them as a nation to abolish a custom which, if kept within proper bounds, is perfectly harmless and is in every way superior to what actually goes on in the great cities of the West. Our own opinion, after considerable study of the subject, is that the nation as a whole is in favour of retaining the practice, but subjecting it to stricter control. This view is confirmed by the provisions of the new codes bearing on the subject, to which provisions allusion has several times been made in these columns.

STATE PURCHASE OF PRIVATE RAILWAYS

This question, so long on the tapis, seems to have at length entered the field of practical politics. The General Committee of the Constitutional Party, having decided that a Representation should be introduced on the subject in the Lower House, held a general meeting of the parliamentary members, and obtained an almost unanimous endorsement of the project. Negotiations have therefore been opened with the National Unionists, the Satsuma Section (Sap-pa) and the Hiyoshi Club, and although no immediate answer has been obtained, it is expected that the support not only of those bodies but also of a part of the Progressists, will be secured. Of course a Representation from one house, or even from both, by however large a vote it be adopted, does not bind the Government to anything. But there appears to be an idea that the leaders of the Constitutional Party can persuade the Cabinet to take favourable action, not, perhaps, to the extent of setting about the purchase immediately, but at any rate in the sense of appointing a committee to conduct preliminary enquiries. Mr. Hoshi Toru, Baron, Suyematsu and Mr. Matsuda are evidently interesting themselves actively in favour of the scheme, and their advocacy is very powerful.

* This word must not be confused with the Danshō given in Brinkley's Dictionary, which has quite a different meaning.

LAND TAX AND LAND RENT.

It has often been pointed out in these columns that the so-called "land tax" in Japan is really land rent, the land having been originally made over in perpetuity to its holders in consideration of a payment of 3 cent. of its assessed value; which payment was subsequently reduced to 2½ per cent. and has now been raised to 3.3. Our readers are also aware that, in assessing the value of the land, 25 years ago, for the purposes of this payment, the figure obtained by calculating the actual net yield of the land was divided by 2, so that the so-called tax of 3 per cent. was really only 1½, and the present tax of 3.3 per cent. is 1.65 per cent. of the value which the land had in the market a quarter of a century ago. We refer to the figures, not for the purpose of renewing the argument about the Land Tax, but in order to compare them with the legislation in New South Wales on the subject of grants of land. In New South Wales a British subject can obtain a grant of crown land for the purposes of a homestead by paying 1.25 per cent. of the assessed value of the land for 5 years; and 2.5 per cent. thenceforth in perpetuity, subject to re-assessment every 10 years. He has also to make a payment on account of the survey fee, but that is a matter apart. It is interesting to note that the New South Wales Government fixes the perpetual rent at the same figure as that which obtained in Japan up to the time of the recent change. But, whereas the Australian figure is based on the actual value of the land, which value is re-assessed every tenth year, the Japanese figure is based on one-half of the value that the land had 25 years ago, and all talk of re-assessment for the purpose of bringing the value up to the real market price of the time has ceased to be heard. The total value of the agricultural land of Japan at present in the tax registers is 1,350 million yen in round number, and the gross annual value of the produce is at least 650 millions. Hence the capital value of the land is assessed at only the double of the gross produce, or about four times the net produce. It is as though land letting for £1 an acre in England were valued for sale at £4 an acre.

THE SALARIES AND ALLOWANCES OF MEMBERS OF THE DIET.

A short time ago, there was much talk of increasing the emoluments of the members of the Diet, but the proposal passed out of hearing, perhaps on account of the hostile reception accorded to it by several newspapers. It has now come again upon the taps. The Constitutionists are said to have revived it. Their scheme, however, has undergone some change since its original presentation to the public. The idea then was a definite addition of several hundreds of yen to each member's salary. But that plan is now suggested only in the cases of the President and Vice-President, whose annual stipends would be raised from 4,000 and 2,000 yen respectively to 5,000 and 2,500. The members, on the other hand, would receive 10 yen per diem for every day of the House's sitting, and for a period of 15 days before the session and 15 days after it. The regular session lasts 90 days. Hence the pay term becomes 120 days, and the total salary, 1,200 yen instead of 800 yen as at present. These changes would mean an additional outlay of 121,500 yen for the Lower House alone on its present establishment of 300 members, or about a quarter of a million yen for both Houses. There is also talk of giving each member a pass on the railways, instead of granting a travelling allowance. One advantage of such a system from the Government's point of view would be that, in the event of dissolution, the members would receive only a part of their stipend.

The proposal to increase the salaries of members of the Diet naturally evokes some ridicule. The Nippon is particularly sarcastic. It contrasts the original scheme of increase, by which a yearly stipend of 2,000 yen was contemplated, with the sum of 1,200 yen to which the demand of the members has now been reduced, but it notes, at the same time, that 1,200 yen is a great deal to a man who has hitherto been receiving only 800. Our very sharp-tongued contemporary is conspicuous among denouncers of the corruption that prevails in parliamentary circles, and it now asks, with fine contempt, why the nation should strain at the gnat of a few hundred yen in the shape of salary increase while swallowing the camel of bribery and corruption. "If a wolf is in the way, one doesn't trouble about a fox or a badger," says an old Chinese proverb.

All this writing, however, seems to be mere embroidery. The main point, the one solid cause of objection to the proposed increase, is that it may prove to be the beginning of much more extensive changes in administrative salaries in general. If, after the House has voted for an increase of its own stipend, the Government should introduce a Budget providing large increases of official salaries all round, how could the Diet refuse its consent? That is the question now asked with considerable show of reason, for the same arguments that apply to the pay of the members of the Diet apply equally to the emoluments of officials. But the query is wrongly stated, it will be observed. What should be asked is whether the Government, if the Legislature asks for more pay, will not feel justified in giving more pay to the Executive also. For the Diet has no constitutional right to meddle with the salaries of officials. They are entirely beyond its reach, the power determining them being expressly reserved to the Sovereign. Hence, if the Lower House votes a Representation in favour of larger emoluments for its members, it will be making a suggestion which the Government is not unlikely to follow in other directions also. Despite the objections of the Nippon and other journals we venture to hope that the House will vote such a Representation, and that the Government will act upon it in the extended sense so much dreaded by our contemporary. The bulk of Japanese officials are not in receipt of salaries sufficient to tempt able men.

BALL AT THE ITALIAN LEGATION.

On the 25th ultimo, the Italian Minister gave a ball which must have seemed to the dancing folk of the capital like an oasis in the social desert of present-time Tokyo, and which delighted the old people by its picturesque features. Dancing has quite lost its temporary vogue among the Japanese. We never thought that it had come to stay, and we were roundly censured by some of our friends for employing our columns to hasten its departure. The truth is that the Japanese took it up not as a matter of choice but in self-defence. There is no form of effacement more complete than that of the diminutive non-dancing unit in a modern ball room. The dancers monopolise space and attention. The noise that they make, added to the noise that must be made for them—what is ordinary dance music but noise?—the violence of their exertions; the wide area of their gambols; the intrusion-resenting interludes, and the monopoly of pastime that they enjoy—all these things combine to obliterate the outsider. Quite a curious spectacle used to be presented at dances twenty years ago in Japan: we mean dances given by Japanese for the entertainment of foreigners, or dances which foreigners extemporized on their own account in Japanese houses. The host and hostess and all their compatriots ceased to have a recognised existence. It was as if a gale of Western garments had suddenly swept in and reduced all the small framed Orientals to the condition of fallen leaves, which were either tossed hither and thither unnoticed, or driven huddling into corners and behind doors. The Japanese never visibly resented their conversion into insignificant waifs and strays. They bore it with smiling complacence. But they saw that one of two things must be chosen: either this incongruous form of social observance must be ostracised, or they must qualify to take part in it. They tried hard to qualify. They organized a dancing club with a noble Marquis for chief promoter, and they assembled solemnly week after week to practise the exotic antics. But it wouldn't do. Heaven had not made them that way, and after some stilted struggles among the fantastic crowd of foreign prancers, they wearily fell back to their old posts as wall-flowers, and reconciled themselves to the conviction that neither waltz, polka, nor gallop would ever assist to make them socially distinguished. Then they tabooed the dance altogether, and in so doing they fell, we venture to think, into the common habit of swinging to the opposite extreme. For why should not Japan be eclectic in the matter of dancing as she has been in her adoption of all other things foreign? Why, because the round dance seems an uncounted guest, why should she not offer a home to the graceful gavotte, the stately minuet, the grand reel, the jovial Sir Roger, and some of those other Western dances which give an opportunity for displaying the music of motion in which her people are such adepts and of which they have such a keen appreciation? Why, to go a step farther, why should she not introduce modifications of her own, or devise totally new dances such as would make Tokyo socially famous? She could do it. We have not the slightest doubt that she could do it. She has failed as a mere imitator, but she might make a brilliant success as an adapter and an inventor. There is a field here which we commend to the attention of the some-time enthusiastic but discomfited weekly frequenters of the Rokumeikan. Perhaps Count d'Orfini had something of that nature in mind when he organized a gavotte as the opening feature of his ball last Wednesday. A most attractive feature it was, for the fair ladies who took part in it looked as though they had stepped down from some of the canvasses of the Regency artists, and the gentlemen were at once magnificent and picturesque, making one sigh for the terrible degeneracy of fashion which changed these glowing harmonies of aristocratic costume for the supremely ugly swallow-tail of the pillion. That gavotte with its woven paces and waving hands set the Japanese spectators thinking. It showed them a point of close contact between European society a century ago and their own immemorial civilization, and if their reflections bear practical fruit, Count d'Orfini may give his name to an epoch. We suppose that it was a wise measure to begin the ball with the gavotte, but from a literary point of view an anti-climax threatens us if we expatiate on what followed. So we confine ourselves to saying that it was a delightful party; perfectly managed, most hospitably and lavishly conducted, sustained with unflagging zest until four o'clock in the morning, and wound up with a cotillon where the favours were things to be treasured for their own valuable sakes not less than as mementoes of a bright social event.

OPPOSITION TO INCREASED POSTAL RATES.

Forty-two editors and proprietors, representing thirty-two periodicals, held a meeting in the Ko-uakamura-ro at Asakusa on the 25th instant, and decided to employ every possible means of opposing the projected increase of postal rates as applicable to magazines and periodicals. We have already explained the point. By changing the classification of publications privileged to go through the post at newspaper rates, the cost of carriage is increased from 50 to 300 per cent. At present, any periodical issued once a month or oftener travels as a journal, but the new regulations require that it must be issued at least three times a week. That effectually excludes nearly all periodicals, and places them in the rank of ordinary mail matter. We can not suppose that the drafters of the proposed amendment intended to penalize periodicals. They have probably been guilty of an oversight which can easily be corrected in the Bill's passed through the Diet.

JAPANESE IDEAS OF LORD CHARLES BERESFORD'S POLICY.

THE superficially weak points in the policy of alliance advocated by Lord CHARLES BERESFORD are noticed by Tokyo newspapers. On the whole, as our readers will have perceived from the translations appearing in these columns, Japanese public opinion favours the programme of a combination of Powers to ensure freedom of trade with China and to preserve her territorial integrity. But doubts find frank expression whether the four Powers indicated as coadjutors could reasonably be expected to work together for such a purpose. Some people, for example, are startled by the incongruity of America's figuring as a champion of freedom of trade. Commercially the most exclusive country in the world, and the least disposed to admit foreign manufactures into her markets, her claim to oppose, by force if necessary, the imposition of protective or exclusive tariffs by other States is naturally considered illogical. Thus we find it frankly asserted that if the United States is to enter a union for keeping Oriental markets permanently open to American produce and manufactures, and to the produce and manufactures of all the world, she should first correct her habit of closing her own markets to everything foreign. Germany's case suggests equal misgivings, though for a different reason. Her trade policy does not constitute a difficulty, but rather her imperial policy. Territorial expansion is believed to be her main object, and in the face of her Kiao-chow record it is asked how she can be expected to lend her assistance for guaranteeing the integrity of the Chinese empire. This point is specially emphasized by the Kokumin Shimbun, which has always been a conspicuous advocate of an Anglo-Japanese entente. The Kokumin thinks that Lord CHARLES BERESFORD'S policy is not abreast of the time. Eighteen months ago, the programme of the Open Door, pure and simple, might have been logically adopted by European States in the Far East. But since that time another element has been introduced: the element of spheres of influence. As yet the Powers have not definitely proclaimed their adoption of the latter method. They have not parcelled out China as they have parcelled out Africa. But they are on the threshold of doing so, and, at any rate, they have exchanged the theory of one universal open door for the theory of several open doors. They are willing to recognise spheres of influence provided that within each sphere freedom of trade shall be guaranteed to the occupants of all the other spheres. If any one doubts the accuracy of that assertion let him ask himself what is the difference between Russia in China and Germany in China from the point of view of the proposed alliance. Both alike are trespassers upon Chinese territory. Russia has appropriated the Liaotung Peninsula; Germany has absorbed the Shantung Peninsula. Yet Germany is counted a proper member of the open-door union, whereas Russia is regarded as its arch-enemy. Where is the ground of distinction? Is it not to be found solely in the fact that Germany has purged her aggression of any commercially exclusive feature, whereas Russia remains exclusive as well as aggressive? We are forced to conclude, then, that the integrity of China has ceased to be a real motive of the projected union, and that the Powers are quite willing to dissect her, provided only that the markets of each fragment shall remain as widely open after the operation as they were before it. Hence, when Lord CHARLES BERESFORD raised aloft in one hand the flag of China's integrity, and held out the other to Germany in Shantung, he made an impossible attempt to reconcile the obsolete with the actual; to cling to the traditions of 1897 in the presence of the realities of 1899. Other critics, whose principal representative is the Nichi Nichi Shimbun, are unable to approve a union which does not include all the interested Powers, or which is not at least framed on an inclusive basis. They fail to see why Russia and France should not join the combination, or be invited to join it. Any union, say these publicists, which is conceived from the outset on lines of discrimination, will inevitably provoke the hostility of those discriminated against.

These views are decidedly interesting, for nothing can obscure the fact that Japan, with her powerful army, is a most important factor in the Far Eastern question, and that her value as an ally will always be considerable. It appears to us, however, that the opinions we have quoted are academical rather than practical. The objection to Germany's qualifications would be paralleled by the argument of a legislator who should consider it useless to draft a law because its corrective influence could not be made retrospective. Things must be taken as they are not as they ought to be. It is quite true that Germany's Kiao-chow coup was an indication of the sphere-of-influence policy, but it does not follow that because Germany has taken one step in that direction, she is pledged to take several more. She appropriated Kiao-chow in the days when "every State for itself" was the mot d'ordre, and if her surrender of it must be a necessary preliminary to her joining an union which has for one of its objects the preservation of China's integrity, we do not see why England would not be equally bound to qualify for the union by surrendering Wei-hai-wei. If the union is to succeed in its purpose of guarding China against foreign aggression, each member of the union must have a point d'appui in the Far East, and Kiao-chow serves that end for Germany as Wei-hai-wei does for England. As to America's policy of protective tariffs, such an argument carries us into a region of sentiment where practical statesmanship is impossible. America's treatment of goods entering her own territory has nothing whatever to do with the treaty rights she possesses in China. She is entitled to protect those rights whatever be the nature of her domestic legislation, so long as no conventional stipulation of reciprocity is violated by her enactments. The Open Door which the union would secure for Western Powers is altogether independent of their own tariffs. Finally, with regard to the contention that France and Russia should be admitted to the union, the only question is, would they enter it. It would be the best of all possible worlds if everybody agreed to do the right thing by every one else, but that kind of millenium seems to be still remote.

RAW SILK OR MANUFACTURED.

ANOTHER correspondent, of long experience in the silk trade, writes with reference to the question of the manufacture of Japanese silk before export. We recently expressed the opinion that Japan's trade in exports will develop chiefly in the direction of manufactured goods, and in the case of silk we said that, by-and-by, it would probably be converted into fabrics before leaving the country. A well-known silk expert differed from us. He said that in the very light classes of silk fabrics, as habutai, where labour counts for a great deal in comparison with the value of the material, the Japanese article has a distinct advantage, but in the heavier grades of goods, as satins, velvets, and so on, the manufacturers of England and France had perfected special methods and developed special skill which would probably enable them to defy Japanese competition. As an illustration of his assertion, he added that Japanese raw silk can now be sent to France, worked up into velvet or satin, and re-exported to Japan at prices which undersell the corresponding Japanese fabrics, the advantage of quality also being on the side of the foreign article. Our second correspondent writes:—"I agree with you and not with your correspondent. The change you predict will not come this year, perhaps, or next. But eventually the naturally artistic taste of the Japanese artisan, his skill in working, and his small requirements in the way of remuneration or wages, must tend to change the export of raw silk into an export of silk piece goods. That he has not the machinery is only a temporary difficulty. He has already commenced to import weaving machinery. There are a good many Jacquard looms at work in the weaving districts, and the weavers learn quickly, marvellously quickly. They are already producing a great variety of new makes and are keen to push the business. I think they will succeed. On the other hand, the filatures of Japan, as a whole, have not made the progress that was expected. Some of them have adopted improved methods, and, in consequence, their silk is almost perfect. But these are in the minority. The bulk of the filatures have made little or no progress in the last two years. They do not reel for reputation, but simply to make money, scrambling through their work and often doing it in a slovenly manner. This has been the case to such a marked extent that many American mills which, for years past, were steady users of Japanese filatures, have given them up this year, and turned to Italian and French silk. It is only because the supplies in Europe are failing that some of these mills have again had recourse to Japan. That, however, is a pure chance, and if the demands of consumers are not more carefully considered, the sale of the Japanese product will again become difficult. Not only is it necessary that when a manufacturer ask for 14/16 silk the variations must not greatly exceed those limits, but also it is desirable that ability should be developed to reel any sizes that are demanded. Italian and French filatures are accustomed to take orders for their produce in any size. They will reel you any quantity wanted in the very finest sizes—9/10 or 9/11—, or they will deliver you a special order in 19/20/22, or 20/24, without any considerable additional charge. How many Japanese filatures will do that? Very few, and then only after bargaining for an exaggerated increase of price. Moreover, in the end they will deliver work that is far from satisfactory. That appears to me to be another reason why Japanese raw silk as an export is likely to be ultimately supplanted by the manufactured article."

It would be greatly to the advantage of Japanese sericulturists if some of the leading Tokyo journals translated the above remarks into their columns and thus brought them to the notice of their nationals engaged in the silk trade. We desire also to point out the illustration they furnish of our recent contention that Japan, by dispensing with foreign aid before she has supplied herself with proper standards, is likely to find her progress seriously checked, and even to retrograde from some of the positions already attained by her. It should not be necessary to insist that we do not write in a captious spirit. Our unique desire is to see Japan progressive and prosperous. The same is true of the correspondent whose remarks we have quoted. Even were he ill-disposed towards the Japanese—which he certainly is not—his business interests are altogether concerned in her sericultural success. That the credit of her chief staple of export declines in foreign markets, means the contraction of his operations and the diminution of his gains. The advice of such men—men with thirty years' experience in the line of trade about which they speak—is quite invaluable to the Japanese. "The bulk of the filatures," our correspondent says, "have made little or no progress in the last two years." Why have they made no progress? Is it not because they are without a higher standard than that already reached? It was in the early seventies that the Government established the Tomioka filature: imported a number of Japanese and French ouvrières and by making the place a school for the country's reelers, laid the foundations of improvement which has put millions upon millions into the pockets of the people. Had the same system been pursued steadily—not necessarily on so large a scale—, can there be any doubt that the danger which now threatens the trade, as described by our correspondent, would have been effectually averted? France and Italy gave Japan instruction twenty-five years ago, and have now left her behind in the race. There is one thing to be constantly remembered in this context. It is Japan's geographical position. Though advantageously situated for gaining access to Oriental markets, she is terribly hampered by her distance from all the centres of technical competition. In Europe the rival manufacturers live side by side, and are, moreover, always within sight of the consumers for whose tastes they have to cater. Whatever improvements are introduced by one community of artisans, speedily become known to their neighbours; each can observe the fashions of the markets at close range, and all breathe the same atmosphere of emulation and progress. Japan, on the contrary, is a veritable outsider. She sees nothing of what is happening in Europe or America. Rumour alone reaches her, filtered through many channels, and she does not realise her failures until their irrevocable effects begin to distress her. Her artisans and her artists are similarly handicapped in that respect. A Japanese painter or sculptor who is trying to catch the inspiration of Occidental art, can not frequent the studio of a great expert, can not study the traditions of a renowned school as interpreted by its modern representatives, can not inform his mind by visiting galleries where the works of celebrated masters are exhibited. He has to grope his way unaided through almost profound darkness towards whatever spark of light may be dimly reflected upon his horizon from some distant and fortuitous beacon. Men working under such disadvantages, working with brave patience and unflagging effort, present to our eyes types of a people bound to make their mark in the world. But there is all the more reason why they should compensate their geographical handicap by engaging the direct assistance of the foreigner.

That is the only way of bridging the gulf. The remarks which we recently made upon this subject evoked some criticism from the Japan Times; criticism excellent in tone and temper, if we may be permitted to say so, but quite beside the mark from our point of view. For our Tokyo contemporary, instead of dealing with our contention that Japan shows a tendency to lose her rate of progress in the near future, confined itself to demonstrating the amount of progress she has made in the past decade. As to that, however, there is practical agreement. We did not speak of the past at all. We spoke of the future. Whenever "a distinguished traveller" comes here and talks to the Japanese of the "wonderful progress" they have made during the Meiji era, we have to hope that they are too wide-awake to be lulled by these reiterated compliments into a satisfied sense of their own achievements.

JAPAN'S FOREIGN LOAN.

TOKYO contemporaries state that the news of Japan's intention to commence operations for obtaining money abroad, has brought quite a number of applicants into the field. The Asahi Shimbun illustrates the state of affairs by quoting the old proverb muko hachinin, or eight suitors for one bride. The names of some of the applicants are given, Englishmen, Frenchmen, Germans, and Americans, as are also those of the prominent Japanese through whom they are supposed to be working. According to newspaper accounts, the sum to be raised is 10 million yen, being part of the Railway Loan. We sincerely hope that the pernicious method adopted last year will not be again resorted to. Japan can not afford to enter the foreign market as a borrower of petty amounts—four million pounds sterling one year and one million the next—and she ought to work in the most open way through the most orthodox channels. We do not mean to reflect in any degree on the credit or competence of those whose services have already been employed. The chief criticism of last year's performance is that the amount was quite insignificant, and that the character of some of the go-betweens employed—quite unnecessarily employed—imparted to the affair a hole-and-corner complexion altogether unbecoming to a financially respectable Power. The amount appears to be much smaller in the present case, but we suspect that the statement is defective. Under the post-bellum programme, the loans to be floated between 1896 and 1909 aggregated 213,392,022 yen; namely, Public Undertakings Bonds to the amount of 135 millions, and Railways Bonds to the amount of 78,392,022 yen. Out of that total, the sums to be raised in the three years 1896-7, 1897-8, and 1898-9 aggregated 109,019,377 yen, and the sum nominally raised was 49,797,350 yen. We say "nominally," because, although bonds to the value of the last figure were issued, only 11,727,550 actually found purchasers in the market, the remainder being taken by the Treasury itself. Hence it follows that, if the post-bellum programme were strictly obeyed, loans aggregating 97,291,827 yen should be floated between the present time and the 31st of March, when the fiscal year ends. But there are some corrections to be applied. The enterprises contemplated in the programme have not been carried out as rapidly as was originally intended: it has been found impossible to push them at the estimated rate without dislocating the labour market. Thus, whereas 35,407,866 yen should have been spent upon railways and public works during the years 1896-7 and 1897-8, the disbursements actually made were only 29,803,096 yen, so that there is a difference of 5,604,770 yen in this account. Then again, the sums to be expended under the programme for the Army and the Navy in the same two years aggregated 121,422,479 yen, whereas the sums actually expended were only 72,875,319 yen, so that in this account there is a difference of 48,547,160 yen. We are, of course, without the figures relating to the current year, the returns not being yet available, but if we consider the accounts up to March 31st, 1898, we find, according to the above figures, that the total difference between the actual and the contemplated expenditures was 54,151,930 yen, and deducting that amount from the aggregate of the loans that should be floated before the end of next March, we find that the bonds to be put on the market represent 43,139,897 yen. That amount would, of course, be absolutely required if the Indemnity had been exhausted. But there is a considerable sum of the Indemnity still remaining and the Treasury has just received authority from the Diet to utilize that sum instead of floating loans, provided that the amounts thus taken are subsequently replaced. It is a difficult matter to determine what portion of the Indemnity is still an actually available asset. Our own calculations do not tally with the official statement, and we refrain from setting forth the figures at present. But we may say roughly that, so far as we can see, there ought not to be more than 40 million yen, approximately, in cash, all the remainder being in bonds which must be sold sooner or later. At all events it is certain that the loan to be raised—whether by selling the bonds hitherto purchased with the Indemnity or by making further issues—will reach a figure of 200 million yen, approximately, and we are persuaded that Japan could make arrangements to obtain that amount on terms much more favourable than she can get by asking for 10 or 20 millions. However, criticism at this stage is premature. Our object in writing is chiefly to help our readers to form an idea of the figures that have to be dealt with.

THE MISSING FRACTIONS OF RAVENUS.

THE most unhappy, ill-advised and retrogressive policy of raising postal, telegraphic and railway rates in order to obtain a few hundred thousand pounds of revenue, can not be too severely condemned by every friend of this country's progress. Japan has nothing to be particularly proud of in the quality of her postal service. It is not remarkable for regularity or promptitude, and it will not be remarkable for either of those essentials until the Authorities reconcile themselves to paying a fair wage for a fair day's work. Count INOUE, always an eminently progressive statesman, appreciated that fact when he recently held the portfolio of Finance, and had his measures of increased taxation been passed, he would have asked the Diet to consent to an increase of salaries all round for post-office and telegraph employés. We never could understand, indeed, why the Diet's consent was necessary in that case, nor do we understand now why the Diet should be consulted by way of preliminary to an increase of postal rates. It is within the distinctly defined range of the SOVEREIGN'S prerogatives to raise or lower the stipends of officials at will, and as for the postage rates, since they are not taxes, but compensation received for services rendered, they are constitutionally beyond the purview of the Diet. It appears to us that the Authorities would be better advised if, instead of taking counsel of the House of Representatives, which has proved itself the worst possible guardian of the national credit and the most narrow-minded of financiers, they boldly fixed the pay of postal and telegraphic employés at rates sufficient to ensure really competent service. The State has no manner of right to derive a revenue from the posts and the telegraphs so long as the important duties of these two means of communication are indifferently discharged. If, as is the case in some Occidental countries, the organization is so perfect and the service so unflinchingly excellent, that no reasonable expenditure of money could improve it, then and only then the Exchequer is entitled to apply to general uses any surplus revenue that may accrue. We believe the Japanese to be thoroughly capable of organizing and conducting the services in such a manner that they would do credit to the country, but they certainly are not a credit at present. On the other hand, Japan may reasonably be proud of her half-penny postage. It can not, we admit, be called a direct creation of her own progressive intelligence, for when she fixed at 2 sen the minimum cost of transmitting a letter, the yen had an official value of 50 pence, and a sen represented a penny. But the appreciation of gold has gradually brought her into the happy position of possessing a half-penny post, and she is the only nation in the world that can boast that distinction. It pays, too. The income of her postal service is very much larger than the expenditure. It would be a great pity if she now abandoned that unique position for the sake of a paltry fraction of increased revenue. What she ought to do is to devote a more liberal amount to the administration of the service, until it attains a standard of genuine excellence. Nobody now consider the cheapness of the post. Attention is engrossed by its defects. But if it were at once cheap and good, Japan would soon hear its merits fully recognised. The argument about the telegraphs has a somewhat different complexion. They are already much too dear. In England, the charge for 12 words is six-pence, or, say, 25 sen; and 12 words, such as are used in telegrams represent, at the very least, 40 kana syllables, which would cost 45 sen to transmit in Japan. Thus the rate is 80 per cent. dearer in Japan than in England, and we may confidently affirm that there is no comparison between the qualities of the two services. The Fiji Shimpō discusses this question with its usual practical intelligence, illustrating its arguments by tables of considerable interest. The first shows the use made of the telegraph in different countries:—

No. of TELEGRAPHIC MESSAGES ANNUALLY PER 100 OF THE POPULATION.

England	208
United States	78
France	116
Russia... ..	13
Sweden	46
Denmark	85
Switzerland	132
Italy	33
Austria	55
Norway	89
Belgium	88
Denmark	94
Germany	74
Japan	26

Russia stands lowest on the list, but she might fairly be excluded from it in view of the fact that enormous tracts of her vast empire have no telegraphs and are inhabited by people who would not use the wire if they had it. Possibly, however, the figure refers to Russia in Europe only. At all events, Japan stands second lowest on the list, yet she now talks of raising her telegraph rates. Another point brought out by the Fiji is that nearly all European countries, instead of seeking to derive revenue from the telegraph service, are willing to make a financial loss by it. Thus, for every 100 yen of gross income earned by her telegraphs, Switzerland spends 104 yen; Belgium 128 yen; Holland, 171 yen; and Denmark, 111 yen. England alone makes the service pay, but the income she obtains from it is small, being, only 6 per cent. of the gross takings. In Japan, however, the gross income is 3,480,000 yen, in round numbers, and the expenditure is 2,610,000 yen, so that there is a net gain of 870,000 yen. In other words, 25 per cent. of the gross earnings go into the exchequer. Japan might, therefore, devote 661,200 yen to improving the service and raising the salaries of its employés, and she would still have as good a financial record as England. But the truth is, as the Fiji justly remarks, the rates are much too high in Japan. People do not use the telegraph. The cost deters them. We can conceive nothing less justifiable than this recently mooted idea of raising the charges.

JAPAN & HER FOREIGN FRIENDS

SOME of these days, when the Japanese come to cast up calmly and impartially their account of the losses and gains resulting from foreign intercourse, they will have to make a pretty large entry in the column of indirect advantages. Is it likely, for example, that they would now be in possession of complete codes of law based on principles of highly civilized jurisprudence, had not the desire of qualifying to recover their judicial autonomy spurred them to extraordinary legislative efforts? Ever since the Restoration there has been a strong political movement in favour of individual liberty, but individual liberty can never be more than a shadow unless personal rights are recognised and protected by good laws efficiently administered, and it thus appears that the attainment of the ends for which the various political parties have contended, must have been considerably postponed in the absence of the Treaty-Revision incentive. Nor has the talisman yet lost its influence, for not only is it now leading to useful reforms in the realms of criminal procedure and prison management, but it is also employed as a moral corrective. The Fiji Shimpō, always quick to throw its weight into the scale of progress, asks its countrymen whether they are quite prepared to endure the close scrutiny of foreigners when mixed residence is introduced next July. In the early days, Europe and America regarded Japan merely as a possible market for their goods. But after her war with China, they changed their estimate; and began to think of her as a possible ally. That is an agreeable change, but the question now is, what will they think of her moral condition when they have a better opportunity of observing the kind of life led by her upper classes. It is rare, in our contemporary's opinion, to find a Japanese gentleman whose life is spotless. The inhabitants of Europe or America may not be much better in practice, but there is this essential difference, that whereas the European or American does everything in his power to conceal his excesses, thus proving that he recognises their impropriety and is ashamed of them, the Japanese discusses them openly and is rather proud of them than otherwise.

We ourselves certainly should not have been disposed to pen such a criticism as the above. There are some forms of vice,—one form in particular,—which do not receive condemnation in Japan; which even enjoy the sanction of custom and ethical philosophy. Judging from the openness with which they are practised, one might be disposed to infer that offences against morality in general are lightly regarded. The licensing of the social evil is a good illustration. It has the effect of giving to that special sin a degree of notoriety which suggests corresponding prevalence. Yet in the great cities of the West, on any and every night, one may witness scenes indicating extremes of depravity which are certainly not to be observed in Japan, and statistics show that, as a mere question of arithmetic, the social evil has not larger dimensions here than in Europe. The dainty, winsome little geisha is another factor of misapprehension. She makes so much noise in the practice of her art that, aided by three or four companions, she can cause a whole street to ring with sounds of dissipation. Passing through some otherwise sombre and demure quarter of a Japanese town, one suddenly reaches a tea-house whence there is poured forth into the still air of night a torrent of sounds indicating the most complete abandonment of revelry—twanging of samisens, beating of drums, snatches of rollicking songs punctuated with choruses of girlish challenge, peals of coquettish laughter, and clappings of soft hands. One imagines that vice has run riot and is courting observation. Two or three of these resonant revels in as many miles of street make the whole town echo with immorality, and create the impression of evil stalking abroad unabashed. Yet it may all be as innocent as a wine-party in college chambers whither a petticoat has never penetrated. The fact is that the Japanese does not embrace his pleasures silently. His caresses are emphatically clamorous. He cares comparatively little for Delilah alone, greatly preferring an accompaniment of samisen, song, and saké. In those respects his pursuit of vice is not secretive. Is it the more abominable for that? Who will answer confidently? Certainly if any judgment may be based on the conversation of Japanese men and on the anecdotes most apt to provoke their mirth, the fibre of their morality is not permeated by any darker thread of vice than that which runs through the disposition of the average Occidental. The one sphere in which want of concealment really aggravates the offence is that of extra-marital relations, which, having been originally based on the expediency of perpetuating the family, as was the practice of the Biblical patriarchs whose memory all Christians revere, has sunk to the level of a mere "lust of the flesh" without entirely losing its pristine sanction. It would, perhaps, be idle to expect any radical reform in that matter, so long as the example of the highest in the land may be quoted in extenuation. But at least we may hope to see a sense educated of its total inexcusability in the case of men who already have heirs, and we may also hope that a higher perception of the rights of woman will soon save Japanese wives from being wantonly exposed to the cruellest kind of torture that male despotism can inflict.

FAMILY AND INDIVIDUAL.

A VERY interesting discussion is undertaken by the Hochi Shimbun with regard to the relative importance of the family and the individual in Japan. It is customary to say that the family is the basis of the Japanese social structure, and that the individual stands upon an altogether secondary plane. But the Hochi thinks that family life in Japan is comparatively lacking in essential elements, and that the family really centres upon the individual. An European household is pervaded by an atmosphere of communism which seems to be entirely absent in Japan. The one point of importance in the Japanese family, its pivot, is the master of the house. Everything is subordinated to his wishes, his tastes, his comforts, and his caprices, and every other member of the household is virtually his slave. So supreme is his despotism that no murmur is allowed even though he introduces into the family circle that most demoralizing and harmony-destroying factor, a concubine. The life led by the units of such a household can not justly be called a family life. They are simply inferiors grouped about the shrine of a superior, where they daily burn the incense of self-sacrifice. In the Occident, on the contrary, the rights of every member of the family, from the youngest child to the father himself, are fully recognised and respected. Their joys are shared, their griefs borne, their pastimes pursued, in common. The continuity of the domestic circle is not broken by any intrusion of tyranny or any assertion of individual supremacy. There is continual recognition of the great principle so flagrantly disregarded in Japan, recognition that the exercise of rights entails the discharge of duties.

Naturally these remarks must be read as applying to the theory only of family life in the West. There are many ideals of the family. We English congratulate ourselves on possessing the "home" in its most perfect sense. Certainly our language offers the most harmonious and expressive term that human genius has discovered to describe that earthly paradise. The Japanese have no word for home. They have an expression for "home-sickness"

(renkyo-byo), but it is a term of recent manufacture, appealing only to the scholar or the philosopher. An Englishman speaking of "nostalgia" would be in as close sympathy with his subject as is a Japanese when he talks of renkyo-byo. Probably the nearest equivalent for "home," according to Japanese ideas, is the "native village" (furusato) of the middle and classes; the "country" (kuni) of the upper. A servant when he goes "home" on leave, a bride when she visits her parents' house after marriage, is said to have gone to the "village." A gentleman when, in the intervals of his official life, he returns to the home of his ancestors, tells you that his destination is his "country." Yet the Japanese are not singular in the want of a name. There is but one word in the world for "home," and that is the English word "home." We may not infer that the home does not exist in practice because it is not found in a nation's vocabulary. The French, for example, though in common with the Japanese they are without a "home" in speech, claim, and with some show of truth, that they have more of the reality than their neighbours across the channel possess. The English, they say, have the model habitation for a family, have also the melodious and exquisitely significant name for it, and have songs that celebrate it with incomparable tenderness, but they have not the close ties of the French family life and its lofty conception of the mother. That may be true or it may be altogether false. We refer to it simply as showing that in such matters the verdict of foreign critics generally differs radically from the verdict of the people criticised. When, however, a Japanese tells us that home does not exist in this country and that the pivotal position claimed for the family is a myth, we must accept his testimony with deference. On the other hand, one point strikes every foreign observer of Japanese family life: it is the consideration which children receive within the domestic circle. On the whole, their happiness seems to be better consulted and the discipline to which they are subjected appears less rigorous and more rational in this country than in Europe or even America. As to filial piety, it certainly is not wanting. The child's love for the parent is probably much the same, the world over. But the reverence paid by a family to its elders—not merely to the heads of the house but to the past heads—is a distinguishing feature in Japan. Sometimes the old folks are only tolerated, and the patience of self-effacement that they show under such circumstances is very beautiful. But, as a rule, they receive respect and kindly deference. The great blot, as the Hochi remarks, is the overshadowing position accorded to the master of the household. The abuses that result from his despotic status force themselves upon the attention of every careful observer, and find their most revolting expression in those terrible sacrifices of their daughters which still disfigure the history of Japanese parentage.

THE GWAN-YETSU RAILWAY.

This is a line running from Koriyama on the O-u Railway in Fukushima prefecture to Sakaya in Niigata prefecture via Wakamatsu. The first section of 10 miles has been opened to traffic, and the continuation to Wakamatsu will be open in two or three months. But with regard to the second half of the road, from Wakamatsu to Sakaya, a dispute has arisen, the directors and engineers being anxious to change the originally planned route in favour of one offering fewer technical difficulties, and an influential body of shareholders, headed by Mr. Kusaka, the former Governor of Nagasaki, being strongly opposed to any change. It is ultimately a question of increasing the capital (6 million yen) of the Company, for the estimates on which that sum was based have been disturbed by the appreciation of commodities; or of altering the route. We know nothing of the merits of the case, but should be inclined to accept Mr. Kusaka's view as the sounder in all probability.

THE NEW POLITICAL PARTY.

There is revived talk of forming a new political party. It is expected to be under the leadership of Messrs. Taguchi Ukichi, Shimada Saburo, and Ooka Ikuzo, and to have the support of Mr. Shibusawa Eiichi. Rumour alleges, further, that Messrs. Saito Shiuehiro and Arakawa Kimizo are likely to join the party, and to work for its interests in commercial and manufacturing circles. So far as we can see, the object of the promoters is to consolidate the political nebulae that fill the space between the Progressists and Constitutionalists, and create an element of uncertainty in every situation. It is very unfortunate for the success of the parliamentary system in Japan that any necessity should exist for forming a third party at all.

THE REASON OF CHINESE DECADENCE.

Mr. Von Brandt, formerly German Representative in Peking, has published a series of pamphlets on the subject of Chinese sociology, and in the latest of them he discusses what he believes to be the chief source of Chinese decadence. His views are thus translated and condensed by an exchange:—

He finds it in an unexpected quarter, namely, in that excessive exaltation of the family tie which has always been counted to the Chinese as their most distinctive and admirable virtue. In no country in the world as in China is the unit of the family held in such high regard. The Chinese family is a sort of civil beneficiary society, whose property is ordinarily held in common and whose members, standing solidly together, are bound to render each other mutual assistance in any way that may be required. The oldest rules, and fulfil all the functions of a governmental chief. The family possessions are commingled, the rights and duties of each member are defined by family statutes, and if internal dissensions render a division necessary, the family thus disunited is discredited, its happiness and its reputation alike are lost. Filial piety is the supreme virtue, and the only sacred thing in the world is paternal authority. The father is a sovereign surrounded by his subjects, and the sovereign is, in theory, a father surrounded by his children. Thus, China is less a nation than an immense family, and, though the flowery empire is divided into provinces as extensive as kingdoms and distinguished from each other by the widest climatic and geographical differences, everywhere throughout its immense and densely peopled area the moral and social conditions are the same.

This may be thought admirable, and so in a measure it is, but so are not all its consequences. This excessive development of the family spirit produces some unfortunate results. The family becomes a clan, and the close connection of interests established among all its members substitutes for personal independence and individual dignity the tyranny of an irresponsible combination whose exigencies operate to pervert the moral sense of the Chinese people. It does more. It renders the growth of what we know as public spirit almost impossible. The Chinaman is without any national sentiment. He can form no conception of patriotism. His thoughts and interests are limited to the circle of his family, and everything which lies beyond that circle is regarded by him with indifference. Moreover, this excessive devotion to the family organization powerfully and directly promotes the corruption and inefficiency which characterize the conduct of the public offices. So it seems that China has been reduced to a state of national impotence by an excess of that virtue which is so often and rightly lauded as lying at the foundation of civilized society. Filial piety and family affection have been the death of it.

RAILWAY ACCIDENTS.

Two railway accidents occurred on the 27th of last month, but happily and singularly no injury was suffered either by passenger or official. The first was on the Bantan (Harima-Tajima Railway). A train which had left Hakase for Himeji, was derailed at half-past six in the evening, when within about 24 miles of Shikama, owing to the line's having been broken by a fall of heavy rocks during a thaw. The engine-driver, guard, and some of the passengers were greatly shaken, but escaped unhurt. The second accident happened at 2 p.m. on the same day. A coal train travelling from Naokata in Fukuoka Prefecture to Wakamatsu, left the line near Nakawa, and the engine as well as several of the waggons were upset.

OPIUM SMOKING.

Two Chinese named Chang Wung-dak and Ma Cheong-on came up for trial in the Yokohama Chito Saibansho on Friday on a charge of smoking opium on board the steamer Riojun Maru, in Yokohama harbour, on Dec. 11th. The prisoners were returning to Canton from America and from the evidence adduced it appears they were caught in the act of smoking by a tide-waiter, Yamaguchi Shinichi, who happened to be passing through the steerage accommodation. Mr. Akiyama, who defended, endeavoured to prove that the arrests were wrongly made and that the real offender had escaped, and that as the arrests were effected at night, the witness Yamaguchi's statement of identification could not be accepted as sufficient. The court convicted, and in view of extenuating circumstances, sentenced prisoners to the minimum penalty, one year's imprisonment with labour.

The two Chinamen have given notice of appeal.

America is very proud of Mr. John D. Rockefeller, the head of the Standard Oil Trust, who is expected to be a billionaire before he dies. Now that his fortune is rapidly approaching the thousand million point, a New York journal has taken the trouble to reduce his income to the amount received per day (including Sundays), and by the hour, minute, and second. Every tick of the clock represents 64 cents, which works out at over 38 dollars a minute. Rockefeller started business as a book-keeper with 50 dollars a month.

IMPERIAL DIET.

THURSDAY, JAN. 26TH.

HOUSE OF PEERS.

ZONES OF FORTIFICATION.

The House met at 10.30 a.m., and after the Chairman of the Petitions Committee had reported in favour of 33 petitions out of a total of 146 received, the First Reading was taken of a Government Bill embodying regulations with regard to Fortification Zones (yōsai chitai). The Bill distinguishes three zones round each fortified place; the innermost having a radius of 500 yards; the middle zone, a radius of 1,500 yards, and the outer zone a radius of 4,500 yards. Within these zones no new building may hereafter be erected of a greater height than 3 feet, nor must a burial ground be formed, and various other restrictions are imposed according to the position of the zone. The places at which the law is to be operative are the Kii Strait, the Yura Strait, the Gaiyo Strait, Kure, Sasebo, Bikan, Nagasaki, Maizuru, Hakodate, Tsushima, Kailung, and the Pescadores.

Many questions were asked with reference to this Bill, and its effect upon private rights. T. a Vice-Minister of War explained that undoubtedly it would more or less impair private rights of property, but where the interests of the State were concerned, the interests of the individual must become secondary. People already living within the zones would not be disturbed, but no additional buildings might be erected. As to burial places, those now in existence might be used as heretofore, nor would any obstacle be placed in the way of tomb erecting, as such structures did not fall within the definition of buildings. In some countries compensation was made by the State to individuals under the circumstances contemplated in the Bill, but in others such was not the case, and the Government considered the latter system superior for many reasons.

The Bill was handed to a special Committee, as was also the Bill (Government) sent up from the Lower House relating to the establishment of new law courts, &c.

NINE GOVERNMENT MEASURES PASSED.

The following nine Government Bills (sent up from the Lower House), having been favourably reported on by the Special Committee, were passed without debate:—

Bill conferring discretionary power on the Government with regard to the method of floating the Railway and Public Undertakings Loans.

Bill empowering the Government to make drafts upon the Indemnity instead of raising loans.

Bill for amending the Indemnity Special Account Law.

Bill for rescinding the Special Account Law with reference to Consols.

Bill for making an addition to the Working Capital of the Mint.

Two Bills for amending the Tobacco Monopoly Account Law.

Bills for amending the Special Account Law with reference to the Hokkaido Railways.

Bill relating to the Accounts of the Iron Foundry.

PETITIONS.

The House then proceeded to consider the petitions recommended by the Petitions Committee.

Mr. Seki Yoshiomi pointed out that two of these petitions were contradictory; namely, one which prayed for the abolition of the import duty on Chinese lacquer juice, and another which sought protection for Japanese lacquer juice. The object of the former was to cheapen the article and encourage the competition of the foreign product; the object of the latter was to secure the monopoly of the domestic market to the home juice. The Committee seemed to have exercised very little discrimination when it recommended these two petitions simultaneously for the House's approval.

Mr. Okouchi, on behalf of the Committee, explained that the House's function did not extend to approval, in the case of petitions, but was limited to submitting them for the Government's consideration.

The Government Delegate strongly traversed that view. He declared that the Government attached great importance to the recommendation of the House, and considered that a petition which had received the approval of the Committee, after due examination, and which had been adopted by the House for presentation, should be treated with much greater respect than that attaching, ceteris paribus, to a petition which had not the benefit of such endorsement. Certainly it would be within the province of the Peers to ask questions if the Government took no notice of petitions which had received the cachet of the House; and, on the other hand, if the petitioners themselves found that their petitions were adopted by the House but rejected by the Government, they would make contrast very unfavourable to the latter's liberality. The House shared the Government's responsibility in this matter, and should render assistance by due discrimination.

A short debate ensued, and the House finally rejected the petition for abolishing the duty on Chinese lacquer-juice, as well as a petition for changing local boundaries (in Ibaraki and Chiba prefectures), but adopted all the other petitions for presentation to the Government.

The session closed at noon, the President announcing that the House would not meet on the 27th instant.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House of Representatives was engaged in Committee work only.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 28TH.

HOUSE OF PEERS.

The House met at 10.30 a.m.

EDUCATION AND THE INDEMNITY.

Mr. Kubota Yuzuru complained that the Government had returned no answer to his question about applying a portion of the Indemnity to educational purposes. The House, in its last session, had adopted a Representation urging that a sum of 20 million yen be appropriated from the Indemnity to form a capital fund in aid of education, but the Government had not taken any action, and although the speaker (Mr. Kubota) had formulated a question on the subject, it remained without reply. He begged the President to bring the matter to the notice of the Government.

SUGAR BOUNTIES, ETC.

The Government Bill for abolishing the system of State purchase of sugar in Okinawa Prefecture (the Rianki Islands), was then read for the first time and handed to a Special Committee, after which the House, without debate, passed Supplementary Budgets No. 2 and No. 5 for the 31st fiscal year (1898-9). The former provides appropriations totalling 737,562 yen (the Government's original demand had been 812,268 yen) to meet outlays in connexion with the collection of the Saké Tax, the re-assessment of land values, and certain judicial arrangements necessitated by the operation of the Commercial Code.

ALCOHOL, TOBACCO, ETC.

The Second Reading of the Government Bill relating to changes in the Statutory Tariff with regard to alcohol, tobacco, saké, &c., was then taken. Amendments were proposed by Mr. Suifu Kohel and Mr. Kaneko Kentaro, in the sense of remitting the import duties on phosphate of lime (which does not now appear in the Tariff and will henceforth be added after No. 526), that substance being required for fertilizing purposes, and belonging, therefore, to the same category as animal bone ash and guano, which are already duty-free; on sheet and plate metal (No. 250), on amorphous phosphorus (No. 112), on chloride of potash (No. 115), and on paraffin wax (No. 285), these four articles being necessary for the manufacture of lucifer matches, a trade now giving employment to 130,000 people, and promising to assume great importance in the future. These amendments, involving a loss of revenue to the amount of 130,000 yen, were adopted by the House, and the Bill was otherwise passed as submitted by the Government.

The House rose at 11.30.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 31ST.

HOUSE OF PEERS.

THE TOBACCO MONOPOLY.

The House met at 10.10 a.m., and proceeded to the First Reading of the Government Bill (sent up from the Lower House), empowering the Government to extend the Tobacco Monopoly to the imported leaf. In answer to questions, the Government Delegate explained that tobacco for medical purposes or for Museums would be exempted from the operation of the proposed system, and the Bill was handed to a Special Committee.

ASSOCIATIONS OF MEDICAL MEN.

The First Reading of the Private Bill (sent up from the Lower House) for organizing Associations of Medical Men, provoked numerous questions. It was shown that the measure conflicted with the existing Law, for whereas the latter confers on every diploma-holding physician the right to practise, the Bill deprives him of that right unless he becomes a member of an association. Further, the penalties prescribed by the Bill would duplicate those of the Law, and the former is greatly wanting in explicitness, since it makes no reference to military surgeons, professors of medicine at the Universities, and dentists. Dr. Hasegawa, the Government Delegate, replying to a question, said that the number of licensed practitioners in Japan at present is 39,000, of whom 1,000 have passed through the University, 8,000 have obtained diplomas by examination, 20,000 are of the old school, and the remainder are graduates of High Schools. He denied that the proposed system could have the effect of establishing uniformity of medical fees throughout the empire, and he explained that foreign practitioners were to be brought within the purview of the new law. The Bill was finally handed to a Special Committee.

A NATIONAL SHRINE.

A Representation was then introduced urging the Government to appropriate a sufficient sum for rebuilding the national shrine of Kashii in Chikuzen. This shrine marks the place whence the Empress Jingo set out to conquer Korea, and is also the place whither she returned from the conquest and gave birth to the future Emperor Ojin. It is further sacred to the memory of the Emperor Chinai. In the year 1585, during the war between Shimazu of Satsuma and Tachibana of Higo, the shrine was destroyed by fire, and, although partially restored at a later date, is now in a very dilapidated condition. The present year, being the 1700th anniversary of the Empress Kogo's return from Korea, seems a suitable time for rebuilding the shrine.

While Baron Watanabe was explaining the Representation, the House was counted out at 12.10 p.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House met at 1.30 p.m.

PAWNBROKERS.

The President announced that permission was asked to withdraw the private Bill for the better Regulation of Pawnbrokers.

INCOME TAX LAW.

The House then proceeded to consider the amendments made by the Peers in the new Income Tax Law. A motion was made to appoint Managers to consult with the Peers, but Mr. Hoashi Toru moved that the amendments be endorsed, first because they seemed proper, and secondly because a Conference of the Houses might imperil the Bill. Mr. Hoashi's motion was approved.

NEW BILLS.

The two following Bills were then passed:—
Bill for amending the Law relating to the Capital of the Tobacco Monopoly, so as to bring it into accord with the new Law empowering the Government to extend the Monopoly to imported leaf.

Bill for amending the Postal Regulations in the sense of increasing the dimensions of parcels and extending the limits of sums transmissible by post.

The Second Readings were voted of the Bill for the better Regulation of Lethal Weapons and Explosives and the Bill empowering the Government to assist the Bank of Formosa by purchasing one million yen worth of its shares, holding them for 5 years without dividend, and not disposing of them for the space of one year at least.

FORMOSA.

On taking the Second Reading of the Bill for continuing the operation of Law No. 63 of 1896, which confers a measure of legislative power on the Governor General of Formosa, Mr. Hanai strongly opposed the measure, on the ground, first that it was unconstitutional, and secondly that such power could not be safely entrusted to officials like those now serving in Formosa. Mr. Hoshi Toru inquired whether the speaker held that the Law in question ought never to have been passed, but Mr. Hanai made no reply. The House voted in favour of the Bill, and dispensed with the Third Reading.

MISCELLANEOUS MATTERS.

The Bill (sent down from the Upper House) embodying the Revised Commercial Code was then handed to a Special Committee, as were also two Bills creating and defining official power to sell or let State forests or moors, and to restore State forests or moors to their original owners, should it be found, in the course of the surveys now being carried on for the purpose of re-assessing the taxable value of land, that the said owners had been wrongfully deprived.

The discussion of the Bill for remitting import duty in the case of salt fish coming from Karatsu, was postponed.

The Bill for amending the Law of Suits Judiciable by the Administrative Court, in the sense of generalizing instead of particularizing the subjects of complaint, was opposed by the Government Delegate but passed by the House.

The House then passed the private Bill for appending to the 79th Article of the Civil Code this provision:—"In the case of conflagration the above Article shall not be applied, unless the victim of the conflagration has suffered heavy loss."

The following Bills were read for the first time and handed to a Special Committee:—

A Bill (private) providing that all sums less than one yen be omitted in assessments of Land Tax.

A Bill (private) for abolishing the Tax upon Marine Products of Hokkaido, there being no longer any reason why Hokkaido should be thus distinguished from the rest of the empire.

A Bill (private) for making the office of Member of the Board of Audit elective; each House of the Diet to choose six of its members, of whom one half would actually serve and one half be in reserve, the members thus appointed having the same life-tenure of office as members of the Judiciary, subject, however, to removal by a vote of want of confidence passed by the electing House.

A Bill (private) for abolishing all fees paid by students in Elementary Schools, the amount now collected from the students—namely, 3,370,000 yen—to be defrayed by the Treasury out of funds obtained by a tax on Sugar.

A Bill (private) for giving State assistance to Prefectural and Urban places for conducting experiments with and studying Marine Products.

The House then adopted a Representation similar to that introduced in the Peers with reference to the Kasuhi Shrine, and rose at 4.05 p.m.

Sir Claude Macdonald, says the Shanghai Mercury, goes home in March on leave. Overwork has been responsible for a not altogether satisfactory state of health. It is quite probable that his leave of six months will be extended.

HERR JUNKER'S SECOND CONCERT.

The second "grand" concert by Herr Junker's combined societies was given in the Public Hall on Monday evening, drawing a good audience. As before, this was a popular and financial success; but the programme and performance appeal to the fancier, rather than to the connoisseur, and as such we treat it.

First as to the soloists. Mrs. Clarke made a most favourable impression upon her début at these concerts and Mrs. Payne sang like the artist that she is. Mr. Seel did well in Neesler's celebrated song; and was not all disturbed by the "Orchestra Accompaniment" as per programme.

The chorns was short in numbers—about half of the boasted 80 being present. But this half did well that which they had to do (nothing very onerous on the present occasion), the ladies especially looked charming and sang delightfully. The audience were immensely tickled by a little ditty in the second part about a maritime Cupid, with his little boat, and a reference to "four stars." This had to be repeated, and was the only encore of the evening.

Turning to the band, we find the strings good and strong as before: if we might venture a suggestion, it is that the violins be increased, to balance the great preponderance of deep tone furnished by bass, cello and viola. We congratulate Herr Junker upon his performers, and his direction generally; also on the additions and improvements made in several of the numbers. The duet (tempo rubato) in the Rosamunde Overture, between cymbals and triangle, was especially fine: the addition of P.F. to Mozart's Church motet (as well as drawing the piece out to twice its normal length) was a stroke of genius, and would have been eminently satisfactory to the composer could he have heard it. (It is but fitting that he who improved Handel should himself be improved in his turn.) But the climax was reached in Meyerbeer's Coronation March, where the cymbals and pianoforte vied with each other in producing such a magnificent peroration—old Jakob never heard while he was with us.

Altogether (as friend Popsy would say) "a right merrie evening with consort of vials and so home."

STABBING AFFRAY AT KOSUGE.

A serious affray took place on the night of Jan. 30th at a Japanese drinking saloon at Kosuge, Nagasaki, a man named Neale, stoker of H.M.S. Barfleur, being stabbed in five places. His assailants were Japanese, and one person has been arrested by the police, who are enquiring into the matter. Most of Neale's wounds are on the face, and, though serious, are fortunately not of a dangerous character. He was able to return to his ship after his wounds had been attended to.—Nagasaki Press.

CORRESPONDENCE.

ANOTHER CORRECTION.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—In my letter published in your issue of the 28th inst., I state that the only representative of the historic Lutheran Church in Japan is the Evangelical Lutheran Mission in Kyōshū. Since writing that letter I have been informed that the Danish Lutheran Church has recently undertaken mission work in Japan; so our mission is no longer the only representative of Lutheranism here.

Thanking you for the privilege of making this correction I remain,

Yours truly,

R. B. PERRY.

THE REV. R. P. ALEXANDER

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

SIR,—Many friends will be interested to learn that the Rev. R. P. Alexander and child, who were so seriously burned at the Hirotsaki fire, are progressing as favorably as could be expected.

A large number of letters have been received, but as Mr. Alexander is not yet able to attend to correspondence personally, he desired me in this way to express his thanks to all the friends for their cordial sympathy, so highly appreciated at this time of severe affliction.

Yours truly,

GIDEON F. DRAPER.

THE VALUE OF DEMOCRACY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

SIR,—In your paper of to-day's issue, under the heading of "Prof. Davidson for Imperialism," occurs the following:

"All progress means more or less the abandonment of tradition. Democracy itself is the abandonment of nearly all the past political traditions of the race" (human). The generally prevailing idea that democracy is something new is clearly a mistake, as citizen-suffrage was in full force at ancient Rome, and also in the Athenian republic about 480 B.C. The radical and republican belief, or rather delusion, that anyone is qualified to be a legislator or administrator provided he is elected by manhood suffrage, has not produced good or honest government in the United States. Going back to the old-fashioned notion of citizen-suffrage, it has not been a success in the French republic, the negro republics of Liberia and Hayti, or in the various republics of Central and South America. In Australasia it has produced a second rate class of politics and politicians.

THE WINDFALLS OF 1898.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

SIR,—In the course of a year some thousands of advertisements appear in the "Agony" columns of the press inquiring for missing heirs, legatees and others. Many of these notices, apart from their monetary value, possess a curious air of romance, which renders them of great general interest. A short summary of the more important cases for the year may, therefore, interest your readers.

Information is wanted as to the descendants of Lieutenant John Eley, or Ely, who was massacred at Vellecore in 1806; and the relations of Captain Rogers, who, about 1870, with his two daughters, sailed for Java, and were never again heard of, are inquired for. Alexander Hicks, who emigrated to Australia many years ago, or his next-of-kin, are interested in freehold estates at Brighton; and the relations of Rachel Hill, who lived at Chesham-upon-Medlock in 1840, are entitled to an inheritance. The heir-at-law of George Carter, late of Earlston, Warwick, who died in 1886, is missing; £4,236 is due to the next-of-kin of F. J. Fernandes, who died abroad in 1892; and J. H. Cock who left England for America in 1873, is entitled to funds. The children of Mary Cooper, of Ipswich, widow, so described in the will of Ezekiel Taylor, deceased in 1837, are sought; also the widow of T. F. Evans, who died in a hospital in 1887. Dora Henwood, daughter of Mary A. Henwood, of Cornwall, is informed that her mother is dead, and that she is entitled to a legacy; while the relatives, supposed to be in Scotland, of a Miss Harvey, who lived at a baker's shop in the Harrow Road, London, in 1860, are wanted for their benefit. It is intimated that the property of Emily M. Hynes, who visited Paris in 1882, has much increased; and William Mackay, who left Scotland for London many years ago, or his heirs, are interested in the estate of a plumber who died intestate. Mary E. Shobolt, née Marshall, and William Marshall, who left England for America in 1852, are missing legatees; the descendants are sought of Michael How, who married Eleazer Casemore in 1787; and the grandson of William Moore, deceased, formerly Governor of Horse-monger Lane Gaol, is inquired for. T. F. Whistler, who went abroad some time ago, can hear of a sum of money standing in his name; and the children of Mary Bryan, who lived in Yorkshire in 1873, are missing. W. R. Clayton, who left Lincolnshire for America about 40 years ago, is entitled to funds; Alicia Dunne, last heard of in London in 1856, is wanted; also Richard Parker, formerly of Natal, and supposed to have gone to Melbourne. The children of Thomas Milne, coachmaker, of Long Acre, who died in 1844, are only now inquired for; H. W. Bainbridge, last heard of in Arizona in 1891, is entitled to share in an estate; and the nephews of George Bullen, of Tottenham, deceased in 1875, are missing. The relations of William Pickering, formerly of Salisbury, Warwick, who died in 1859, or of his wife, Elizabeth Bicknell, are wanted; also the children of Henry D. Osborn, livery-stable keeper, of London, in 1853; while information is desired of H. A. Slater, nephew of Anthony Slater, deceased, late of Liverpool and Philadelphia. Richard Fern, or Fearn, who was convicted of house breaking, sentenced to transportation for life, and sailed for New South Wales in 1830, is interested in an estate in Chancery; Thomas Greenwood, who left for Australia in 1853, and went into the bush, is inquired for; and W. H. F. Cross, formerly of Manchester, is entitled to freehold property.

Representatives of shareholders in the West New Jersey Society, on whose stock no dividends have been paid since 1692, are again sought; while the youngest daughters of Alice Lanham and Maria Howlett, sisters of Nathaniel Palmer, veterinary surgeon, deceased, are entitled to participate in the sale of some property. Missing relatives, supposed to have entered a work house, are interested in the estate of Elizabeth Alexander, who was born in Ireland in 1813, and who married Thomas Ashby, of Liverpool; and among several members of the Seamer family advertised for may be mentioned Walter Seamer, believed to have gone to Australia many years ago, and the children of William Seamer, who married Elizabeth Richardson in 1813.

Many persons are inquired for by the Courts of Chancery. These include Jonathan Hasans, of Hongkong in 1845; Mary A. Rowcamp, or Roecamp, the wife of a brass-moulder; W. H. Markwick, of India; A. E. Markwick, whose address is unknown; Michael Shiers, a confectioner; the nephews and nieces of Richard Sholl, late of Newton Ferrers, Devonshire; the next-of-kin of Emily C. Proctor, of Wiltshire, who died in 1884; Sophia R. Ellis, believed to have gone to New Zealand; and the next-of-kin of Charles Strong, of Exeter, who for many years was confined in a lunatic asylum.

Among numerous lucky individuals wanted for "something to their advantage" are William Purchase, who left England in 1848; Arthur Such, who, when six years of age, was taken abroad by his father; G. A. Moxon, who left England for Canada several years ago; Edwin Fife, last heard of in Queensland; Robert and Walter Hartley, formerly of Manchester, who have been absent from home for a number of years; Charlotte, Elizabeth and James Williams, of London in 1849, or their descendants; Stephen Spring, of Pembroke Dock in 1866; Henry Barton, who went to Australia about 1835; Frank Nicholls, formerly of Bristol, and afterwards of America; Jane Johnston, last heard of at Manchester in 1895; George Levick, an engineer; Ann Turner, the widow of a coachman; Nathaniel Kilminster, last heard of in Naples; and Joseph Jackson, who left for Bermuda in 1856 and proceeded to Australia.

The next of kin or representatives are sought of William Parry, who died shortly before 1815; John Queen, or Quin, and Marion Smith, who were married in Paisley in 1849; Conrad H. A. Reid, said to have died at Singapore in 1856; Mary Robinson, maiden name unknown, born in Glasgow in 1845, who died in New York; John Freeth, of Birmingham; Hannah Pitkin, deceased in 1869; Josiah Joyce, of Tasmania; Ellen A. Harrison, widow, of Kenish Town, who died in 1882; Henry Lodge, licensed victualler, of Bexley, Kent; Jane Oliver, of King's Lynn; and Delia Plomer, formerly widow of James R. Wright, and whose maiden name is believed to have been Dymond, deceased in 1888.

Among estates of persons who have died in the Colonies leaving money for their unknown heirs may be mentioned the names of the following intestates:—John Renny, £3,576; Edward Bevan Thomas, £1,995; Sarah and Thomas Wells, £502; H. W. Remy, £69; E. A. Lehman, £1,091; John C. Jamieson, £677; John Reid, or Reed, £371; George T. Ivey, £563; and Richard W. Platt, £628.

In addition to the foregoing, claimants to Chancery deposits in Jamaica are sought; several lists of officers' and soldiers' unclaimed balances are issued; certain shareholders are entitled to unclaimed moneys in the Waterloo Bridge and other companies; the Treasury Solicitor has advertised for next of kin in several cases in which intestates' estates have fallen to the Crown in the absence of heirs; and many rewards are offered for missing wills, birth, marriage and death certificates.

AFFAIRS IN THE PHILIPPINES.

OPINIONS OF AN ACUTE OBSERVER.

PROTECTORATE, NOT ANNEXATION.

A WAR OF CONQUEST IMPOSSIBLE.

Professor Clay MacCauley, of Tokyo, who has just returned from a trip to the Philippines, was interviewed by a representative of the Japan Mail shortly after landing at Yokohama. The Professor gave an interesting account of recent events at Manila.

THE GREAT CRISIS.

"I was there," he said, "during the great crisis, which began on the 5th January and came to a termination on the 12th, by which time a modus vivendi was arrived at which will probably continue until some definitive policy is announced by the United States Government. The insurgents and the United States forces were on the friendliest of terms at the downfall of Manila, and it was then the former's expectation that they would at once receive recognition by the American Government and be given a share in the administration of the islands. As no treaty of peace, however, had been signed, the United States officials were unable to hold any official intercourse with the insurgents, though at that time a very pleasant social relationship existed between the officers and the insurgent leaders. This inability to recognise them officially made the insurgents rather suspicious of what the United States people intended to do. That feeling, and the fear the Americans felt of compromising themselves, had the effect of gradually lessening the warmth of the social relations, and in October they ceased entirely, the insurgents beginning to look on the conquerors as their possible enemies. Matters continued, however, on a peace footing, although the insurgents began to import arms and ammunition in large quantities from Hongkong by way of Manila. Up to the present time they have imported about 80,000 rifles. They have enrolled a large number of men for their army, and throughout November and December were drilling to the utmost of their ability.

A MISUNDERSTOOD PROCLAMATION.

"I arrived there just at the time President McKinley, through General Otis, issued his proclamation. It was done with the most friendly intent to the Filipinos, but was unhappily very much misunderstood. In the first place, it was issued through the office of the Military Governor of the Philippines, and in the proclamation it was stated by General Otis that the regulations concerning the administration of affairs in the Philippine Islands were to be of such and such a character. The tension produced by this became so strong that Aguinaldo issued the first proclamation resenting any such scheme as Gen. Otis had put forth, or such as was assumed to follow from the President's words, and the Filipino soldiers were mustered to such an extent that Manila practically came into a state of siege. The American soldiers were under the strictest orders not to promote hostilities, and it seems the Filipino forces were also under the same orders, but while the heat of intentions appeared to direct their leaders the subordinates were very impatient and it became apparent that the slightest provocation would produce an attack. Aguinaldo afterwards issued his second proclamation, which ended by saying that the responsibility for bloodshed would be on the heads of the United States. On the 6th, the insurgent commanders issued orders to all the Filipino residents in Manila to come out of the City and take their places within the insurgent lines. That was quite a hostile movement, and on the 7th, 8th, and 9th many thousands of people left Manila for the interior, using all sorts of vehicles, from water buffalo drays to four-wheeled carriages, while I saw many poor people carrying all their possessions on their heads; at the same time the Spanish who lived in the suburbs of the city in large numbers made an opposite-going stream seeking refuge in the large citadel of Manila, while simultaneously the Americans were hurrying to their barracks and intrenchments. The crisis was indescribable. I saw the carriages on the Bridge of Spain so crowded that six of them were smashed into kindling wood in the scramble. Everybody was in a state of great excitement.

GREAT EXCITEMENT.

On the night of the 10th, there was a general alarm excited by the burning of several Filipino houses, and through the consequent confusion it seemed almost as if fighting was taking place. We were told that the attack would be made about 3 o'clock on the morning of the 10th, and the excitement through that night was very great. On the 10th, there was more excitement through a quarrel in the market, or some say it was the shooting of a dog. All the merchants closed their places of business and the regiments were called out and went with a rush for the entrenchments. It seemed as though war had actually begun. At that time I was sent down through the city in a friend's carriage, and every shop was closed as tightly as if it were Sunday. However, the conflict did not take place, and the two armies remained within a very few yards of each other for two or three hours, but no imprudent act occurred, and at nightfall everything had become quiet again. In the midst of the excitement the commanding General appointed a commission consisting of Provost-marshal General Hughes, the Judge Advocate General, and Col. Smith, of the 1st California Regiment, and asked them to meet three representatives of the insurgent forces and try to come to an understanding by which the insurgents would agree to wait until some definite policy could be announced by the President of the United States. The Filipinos did not then seem to understand that the Treaty of Paris had not been ratified and consequently no definitive policy could be announced by the United States Government. The Filipinos seemed to have become convinced that it was the intention of the United States to take away all semblance of autonomy from them; but the real root of the trouble was wounded vanity—the feeling that they were not being considered in the arrangements, and that the United States Government was holding no official relations with them. That was the course of affairs up to the 13th, when I left.

THE STATE OF MANILA.

"What was the state of the city when you were there—was the place quiet, or was business much disturbed?"

"Well, business has, with the exception of that brief period of anxiety, been going on as usual. Up to the 5th there was perfect toleration. People were perfectly free to come into the city provided they had no arms. I saw groups of Spanish soldiers, Filipinos, and American soldiers standing and talking together. But during the three days I spoke of there was such tension that it was like living in a besieged city. The night of the 9th an incident occurred that made matters much more serious. A South Dakota man was on his beat as sentry when two native's sprang upon him with knives, cut him a gash in the face, another on the chest, and another on the left arm. However, he bayoneted one and shot the other. Both were killed. This incident induced a very tense state of feeling. A couple of nights before that, a United States sergeant was killed by one of our own men because he did not answer the sentry's hail when he was near an important part of the magazines."

THE CULTURE OF THE FILIPINOS.

"What impression did you form of the Filipinos?"

"Well, they struck me as being very serious determined men, but of course I could not give any proper judgment of them. Evidently they are not under very good discipline as yet. Their upper classes are very much more intelligent and better educated than people give them credit for. They are very like the people of Japan in this—that they have a large ignorant peasant class, but they have many thousands of men as merchants, plantation owners, literary men, &c., who have had a good deal of education in Hongkong, Spain, Germany, and England, and some in the United States. There is thus a large class who could probably under proper control take part in government, but their traits of character are such that nobody could entrust them with entire self-government with any safety. Here is an instance which indicates the weakness of organization among them. When Admiral Dewey captured Cavite, there were in a very short time seven bands each claiming to establish a Government, and for a time it seemed as if the whole country would be given over to chaos. The only man who could restore order was Aguinaldo. He was brought over from Hongkong as a peace measure, and he, with the help of the prestige he had enjoyed before, organized all these parties into one body. He is carrying on the internal administration of the islands very well now. The Filipinos have a very good postal administration, for example. I saw some handsomely engraved postage stamps just issued; they are available for postage throughout the country. The business men in Manila place every confidence in the Filipino postal service; in fact, it is the habit of the merchants to send their correspondence five miles to the country to the Filipino post office and post them there. They have been gathering their taxes in the interior and during the last few weeks they have sent nearly one million dollars from the Philippines to Hongkong to their agents."

MUCH LIKE THE JAPANESE.

"What do you think of the natives generally?"

"Well, they are as much like the people of Japan as I can imagine any country, except that they are on a little lower level. There is a great deal of wealth and intelligence. I do not consider Aguinaldo, personally, a strong man, but as chief of the Junta he has great power. He is not supposed himself to have written the proclamations he has issued."

NATIVE VIEWS OF A PROTECTORATE.

"Do you think the natives would be favourable to a protectorate?"

"Well, I have already sent to the New York Herald my views on that matter. I said that as a result of a study of the situation at Manila, I think there are now only three ways open to the United States for the solution of the Philippines problem. In the first place, the Islands might be annexed by force of purchase. The use of force means that the United States will be plunged into the most disastrous foreign war in their history, a war that would entail great loss of life and treasure and the violation of our national honour. Purchase means the recognition of the insurgents as our allies during the war with Spain, the reward of the leaders with high office and salaries, the employment of insurgents in military and civil offices, with back pay as allies for some months, &c. Such purchase would secure a compromising gain of doubtful tenure. Generally speaking, the Americans in Manila are opposed to annexation in any form. The second way open to us is to make a complete transfer of the sovereignty in these islands from Spain to the Philippine Republic, the United States retaining for its own use Manila Bay and ports—like Hongkong by Great Britain. This solution means the defenceless exposure of the Philippine Islands to the greed of the world's Powers, with a consequent acute crisis in Europe over its Far Eastern question. This way is neither honourable nor wise. The third is to recognise the autonomy of the Philippines under an American protectorate. This means independence for the Philippines Republic in the administration of its own internal affairs, the United States taking charge of the supreme judiciary and the Republic's foreign relations, such as the power to declare war or to enter into treaties with Foreign Powers, the control of the Customs, etc. This solution might bring about intelligence towards absolute independence in the future or voluntary annexation to the United States. Only by the third way can there be peace and prosperity for both the United States and the Philippines. Immediate action is imperative."

THE AMERICAN ADMINISTRATION.

"We have read a good deal as to discontent about the American administration. There was a letter in a Singapore paper abusing the Americans in very strong terms. What were your own impressions?"

"That letter was certainly a gross exaggeration, though it is true that the Americans have incurred some unpopularity through their continuing the old Spanish laws in regard to customs, &c. The Americans have revived a great many regulations which are oppressive but which under the late administration could be evaded by bribery. Bribery is unpardonable with the Americans as administrators, and consequently that makes things appear very oppressive to merchants. Some seven bills have by the Spanish regulations to be taken out for cargo, but by a judicious use of money they used to be reduced to one or two. Now the whole seven have to be adhered to, which makes things very onerous. But the police administration of the city is admirable. It is conducted by the Minnesota Regiment, and I saw men whom I know to be professional men and business men acting as military police. It is not true that the American soldiers are addicted to drunkenness or rowdiness. Nor are they overbearing in manner, though certainly they have the bearing of being possessors of the place. However, they do not subject the natives to any insult. The only serious thing I heard is that they have got into debt with some of the saloons and storekeepers, but as a notice was issued by the Government warning the latter, it is their own fault. The health of the troops is much better during the dry and winter season, though the weather is still exremely hot. The soldiers have discontinued their foolish practice of eating all kinds of foods and drinking a large quantities beer and strong liquors."

AGAINST ANNEXATION.

"What is the general feeling on the future of the Islands?"

"Among the Army and Navy it is very strongly against annexation. Among the common soldiers there is a feeling that it is impossible for them to stay there and live and work, consequently they have no use for the country. The other people who look on it as a commercial affair think that under the wise proterate of a friendly Government capitalists will have as many advantages as under annexation. Annexation is not considered necessary by any one."

NO TRANSFER OF GREAT BRITAIN.

"Is there any idea of an ultimate transfer to Great Britain?"

"No, the feeling is that the United States would best solve the question by guaranteeing complete internal autonomy to the people, reserving for themselves the control of the Supreme Court for final appeal and judgment in process of law and controlling perhaps the foreign relations of the Republic so far as treaty-making and war-making powers are concerned, taking not exactly control but supervision of the regulation of customs duties, and reserving a certain portion of the revenue for their own use. I did not find a General Officer there who is in favour of annexation. The general sentiment seems to be gathering decidedly towards autonomy with a United States protectorate. I think that would prove acceptable to the people. I think almost anything but absolute subjection will be acceptable to them, as long as they feel that they have the sympathy and goodwill of the American people. To my own mind much of the irritation so far has been caused because they think they are regarded as an inferior people and not worth considering in the matter of the disposal of the Islands."

"It is quite untrue," continued the Professor, "that murders are of nightly occurrence and that the administration is rotten. Manila is as safe as Japan."

MANILA'S OLD WORLD CHARM.

The Professor waxed eloquent on the charm of Manila as a city, which he described as more like Florence than anything he had ever seen. The dome of the Cathedral, the big Churches, the great fortresses and medieval embellishments and bastions, the great walls and bridges, the clean well-paved streets, the fine stores with large plate-glass windows, the stately Government buildings, the beautiful residences of the rich Spaniards and Filipinos—all these, Dr. MacCauley said, were "finer than anything you could see in Japan." It was, he added, an eye opener to the soldiers from small inland American "cities." The cathedral is at present occupied by Spanish prisoners, and is sadly desecrated. Mr. MacCauley saw soldiers gambling under the altar, and there were at least 150 playing cards in the aisles under the eyes of two American sentries. The Governor-General's Palace is a magnificent structure, for the Spaniards knew how to make their surroundings splendid. It possesses a most beautiful marble staircase and a fine statue of some person famous in Spanish history. The Court of Justice has magnificent hangings, the roof is supported by splendid columns, and beautiful paintings adorn the walls. A very large portrait of the Queen Regent still hangs there. The whole place is like one of the great cities of Southern Europe.

THE PRIARS' DELINQUENCIES.

Turning to the question of the grievances of the Filipinos Professor MacCauley said there was no doubt the Friars had been cruel, tyrannical, and extortionate. Their fees for burials and marriages were very high; many natives preferred to live together out of wedlock rather than pay the excessive cost of the marriage ceremony. In many other ways, the ecclesiastics need their position to plunder the people, and this accounted for the murderous hatred in which they were held. The Archbishop of Manila had a very bad name; he was described as a man who would improve vastly by hanging.

THE ILOILO AFFAIR.

Referring to the Iloilo affair, the Professor said: "It is believed the tension there was brought about by the treachery of General Rios, who was in command of the Spanish forces. He promised the United States authorities that when he was no longer able to hold the place and had to evacuate it, he would notify them. Towards the end of December, he informed General Otis he was ready to hand over Iloilo to the American force. Gen. Otis prepared an expedition and sent it down under the convoy of the Charleston, but when it arrived it was found that, some days previously, the Spanish had turned the place over to the rebels in the expectation that the Americans would demand possession and proceed to hostilities. When the American forces came, the business men of the place requested them not to land. General Miller agreed not to do this and sent back to Manila to report the state of affairs. The result was that the Charleston was ordered back to Manila and some of the troops were afterwards ordered back, leaving things in status quo. The general impression when I left was that the crisis was past and both parties would wait."

With regard to the supply of arms to the insurgents, the Professor said they were chiefly bought in Hongkong ostensibly for shipment to Macao and China. The Hongkong Government would probably take steps to stop the export, in which two Americans among others were engaged.

A CHANGE OF POSITION.

Mr. MacCanley described interestingly a visit to the great prison at Manila, where the United States received from Spain charge of some 1,600 prisoners. Among them is the former commandant of the prison. He was left in charge at the time of the surrender, and there were then in the safe of the prison some 23,000 dollars of money for the prisoners. A few days after there were only 9,000 dollars in the safe. Hence the commandant's change of position.

PROSPECTS FOR CAPITAL.

Asked his opinion as to the prospects of business in the country, the Professor said: "It offers a fine opportunity for exploitation; for while it is under a good deal of cultivation the country is in a very large extent a virgin country still, and the opportunities for the growth of sugar, hemp, and tobacco and for the development of mines, are I am told, very great. But while it is a good country for capital there is no opening for labour. The only chance is for capital lists and their immediate assistants. As for the subjugation of the Islands, it is told to talk of a war of conquest, for the reason that the climate, so good physicians tell me, would place sixty soldiers out of 100 hors de combat in 60 days. For a long distance back of Manila the country is as flat as it is round Tokyo, and composed of swamp land cleared here and there to the extent of four or five acres but surrounded by bamboo thickets and tropical jungle. There are no roads over which wagons could be taken, and transportation is extremely difficult. If soldiers went into the country they would have to camp amid the swamp, and malaria would disable them in a very short time. The Filipinos would have hundreds of miles of country to fight over, and their tactics would be a guerrilla warfare. Every bamboo thicket and jungle would be a shelter for their rifles, and the loss of life and expense of such a war would be terrible. In fact, it is hardly to be thought of."

THE CLIMATE.

In conclusion the Professor spoke of the climate. Though it is now mid winter the weather is extremely hot, so hot that sleep at night is not comfortable, and exercise in the middle of the day intolerable. In March the hot season begins, and lasts till July. The heat is then intolerable, the skies being cloudless and the sultriness tempered with no refreshing winds. In July and August, though still intensely hot, the moisture and winds make things a little more bearable. Mosquitoes of an exceptionally blood-thirsty species flourish all the year round, and detract much from the enjoyment of life.

A HUMOROUS THIEF.

The premises of Messrs. Herb and Co., Yokohama, were entered early on Monday morning by a thief of catholic tastes and humorous temperament. He entered by the window of a small sample room at the back of the ground floor, taking out a pane with the dexterity of an expert glazier. He ransacked this room and another on the upper floor, both filled with samples; selected a great number of miscellaneous articles; opened a bottle of whisky and a packet of cigarettes; and apparently spent a pleasant time before leaving. He was a man of devices. He brought his own candle, but, being without a candlestick, improvised one from a sample salt cellar. He apparently had no boy to carry off his booty, but his genius rose to the occasion, and he neatly denuded the windows of their curtains for packing purposes. His tastes, while catholic, were luxurious. He opened nearly every box and drawer in the rooms, but only selected a few valuable articles here and there. A few boxes of carved ivory appealed to his artistic instincts, and were annexed wholesale. He appears to have hesitated over some rolls of high class woollen suitings, and apparently only left them behind with regret as too heavy, consoling himself with some vividly coloured neckties, two or three handsome silk shawls, and some blankets. He scented his handkerchief liberally with choice perfume, but after opening several cases of toilet soap left them behind with disgust. Altogether he secured a few hundred yen worth of things. Having packed up his bundles he sat down and wrote a polite note to the occupants, couched in classic Japanese. In this he stated that he was a gallant Samurai and full of love for his fellow men; that his motives were excellent; that he intended to sell the goods he had taken, and give the proceeds to the poor. The exact wording of the letter was as follows:—"I am a chivalrous man who undertakes the task of collecting money and property from the rich and distributing them among the poor as well as using them for the purpose of elevating myself in society. Fortunately I have secured some prizes here and so I tender my thanks to the firm. 2 a.m., Jan. 30th, 1899. Shinko Kozo ('godly fox fellow'), a chivalrous man of Meiji." The police are investigating the little joke.

CASUALTIES TO N.Y.K. STEAMERS

At 8 p.m. on the 26th January, Captain Allen, of the Yamaguchi Maru, discovered fire among the cotton cargo on board and headed for Oginohama at once, arriving on Friday. The Yamaguchi was on a voyage from Seattle to Yokohama. Every effort was made when the fire was first discovered, to extinguish the flames, but without success, and when the vessel arrived the fire was still un subdued. She was at once beached and measures were taken to put out the fire.

The Nippon Yusen Kaisha on Wednesday, stated:—The fire is in No. 2 hold, and is still burning. The contents are cotton for Yokohama, Kobe, and Shanghai, and flour for Hongkong. Every effort is being made to extinguish the fire, but work is very difficult through the ship's plates being hot. Latest advices from Oginohama report that the cargo from No. 2 hold has already been discharged, partially damaged by water.

A cablegram has also been received from England to the effect that the N.Y.K. Bingo Maru, Capt. G. E. P. Cook, has been in collision on the Tyne. The accident is serious. The Yokohama office of the Nippon Yusen Kaisha is not in possession of detailed information, but has received a telegram from the Tokyo office confirming the news that a collision has taken place.

A London despatch which has reached the Government confirms the report that the N.Y.K. steamer Bingo Maru (tonnage 6,241) collided on the 22nd ultimo with a foreign steamer—the Ural—on the Tyne during the voyage from Middlesbrough, having left London on the 17th ultimo. She will have to go into dock for repair. It is believed that the collision was caused by the heavy fog, and took place while the pilot was on board.

CHINA NOTES.

Under the heading, The Yangtze Valley, the N. C. Daily News gives utterance to the following leading article:—"Mr. A. R. Colquhoun writes from Kueichowfu, on the Upper Yangtze, that unless we assert our right to maintain order in the Yangtze Valley, which by every right we claim as our sphere of influence, that you will slip away from us as the north of China has done and is doing. The policy in which we are joining at Peking is to weaken the authority of the Provincial Governments, and favour the concentration of all power in the hands of the Manchus at Peking, which means in the hands of Russia. For this reason we regret the withdrawal of the Hermione from Nanking, as her presence there tended to strengthen the hands of Viceroy Liu. Our position is becoming more and more precarious, and we want a Kitchener or a Noel with a free hand to straighten things out. There is little doubt that serious trouble may be anticipated in this Valley unless we stiffen up the Viceroys, and the public at home should understand that chaos in China may suit every other Power but ourselves and the United States. Lord Salisbury seems to be relying on some vague promise from Germany that she will not interfere with us in the Valley, and probably our Foreign Minister will endeavour, when Parliament meets, by some such assurance to quiet the public at home, unless the China party in the Commons are on the alert. It is no longer a question, says Mr. Colquhoun, whether the proposed railway connecting Burma with the Yangtze through Yunnan will pay; it must be made, and as soon as possible, for the protection of our sphere of influence. Preparations should be made also for continuing it to the Tungting Lake and to Hankow; so as to put the future Chicago of China—Shanghai being the New York—in railway connection with Burma. Unless everything possible is done to strengthen our moral hold on the Yangtze Valley, we may be by and find ourselves edged out of China altogether."

Augustus Barrier, lately second officer of the China Merchants' steamer Feiching, has died in the General Hospital at Shanghai under circumstances of the saddest character. The deceased was one of the victims in the disgraceful affray which occurred on board the Feiching in Shanghai river on Christmas night when the second engineer, in a state of intoxication, ran amok and shot three men. Barrier received a bullet wound in the head, and his condition was such that, after being once released from the Hospital, it became necessary to re-admit him. Afterwards he appeared against the engineer referred to, a Chinese Islander named Tounney, at the British Court at the preliminary investigation, where he undoubtedly presented evidences of acute suffering. The N. C. Daily News learns that Tounney will be put forward on the capital charge, but on the other hand it is stated that the death was actually due to suppressed small-pox. Barrier who had been employed on the China coast for some considerable time, was generally respected by his shipmates.

The Editor of the Peking and Tientsin Times gathers from sundry indications at Peking that the Empress Dowager is inclining to join the ranks of the Reformers.

The Kuowtnpao says that it is in contemplation to substitute women for the eunuchs in the Imperial Palace at Peking.

According to a Soochow dispatch, printed in a Shanghai contemporary, the water route between that city and Quinsan has, since the 1st of January, been the scene of no less than seven cases of piracy, in two of which the pirates cut down five men. The last piracy was on the night of the 17th Jan., when two boat-loads of pirates robbed a passenger boat near Quinsan of nearly $500 in cash and six leather trunks of winter fur and silk clothing belonging to some of the passengers, who were well-to-do natives of Quinsan returning from Soochow to spend the Chinese New Year holidays in their homes.

The North-China Daily News contains a stirring tale of the sea, the adventures of the C. N. Company's steamer Ningpo, Captain Phillips, on a voyage from Otaru to Shanghai. She left port on the morning of Jan. 14th under somewhat favourable circumstances, the wind being variable and moderate. At five o'clock that evening the wind shifted to the westward, and at six to the north-east and blew a whole gale from 8 p.m. until noon. The following day a perfect hurricane was encountered, and Capt. Phillips judiciously hove the vessel to. At 1 p.m. the barometer was at its lowest, namely, 28.95, with a temperature of 5° Fahr. The ship was covered with masses of ice, the riggings were frozen into solid blocks, the ropes were a foot in diameter with ice, and the weather cloths on the upper bridge were walls of the same cold and cheerless substance. At half-past two the wind veered to the northward and commenced to moderate, although still blowing a gale. By half-past nine the wind had fallen considerably, and the sea became less rough, when one independent, almost perpendicular, wave of gigantic proportions came rolling along into which the vessel plunged up to the foremast. The huge body of water breaking aboard swept the heavy ice chest over the side, smashed the main derrick in halves, and completely stove in the steel bulkhead of the saloon, flattened down the rails both of the upper and lower bridges, and even carried away the awning spars of the former. Fortunately Mr. Pennel, the chief officer, who was on watch, escaped without injury. The bridge ladders which were triced up were also carried away and the commodore's room stove in. All the boats were thrown out of the chocks and two on the starboard side were stove in. Soon after daylight on the 16th, the weather having moderated, Capt. Phillips bore away for Hakodate Roads and anchored in Satsukari Bay at 1.50 a.m. on the 17th. During all the time they were visited with heavy snow and hail squalls. At noon on the 18th, having done all that was possible for the safety of the ship, a fresh departure was made, the wind blowing fresh from the north-west and west and then veering to north-west with moderate gale force as far as Okishima, thence moderate N.N.W. winds and nasty beam sea to Woosung.

The following Imperial edict concerning the disturbances in Central China was issued on 22nd January, says the N.-C. Daily News:—"The other day, when we received news of the rising at Kuyang, Anhui province, we issued repeated instructions to Liu Kun-yi, Viceroy of the Liangkang provinces, and Teng Hua-hai, Governor of Anhui, to act in concert in crushing the disturbances there. We now learn that desperadoes in Haiyai district, Honan province, have also risen up in discontent, and it is to be feared that they will join the rebels of Kuyang and spread trouble in various directions. Having in mind, however, that of late years the districts joining the two provinces of Honan and Anhui have been the scene of crop failures and much consequent suffering amongst the inhabitants thereof, it may be that the risings above noted were due to a famine-stricken people seeking for food, and then, fearing lest the authorities call the delinquents to account, they were led to raise the flag of rebellion in order to prevent capture and punishment. Although such practice in theory is perfectly unpardonable, there is yet an element in the present instance which calls for our pity and clemency. And, lest, in sending forth the Imperial armies to crush these rebellions, no distinction be made between those who voluntarily rebel and such as were forced to do so through lack of food, whereby the innocent and the guilty will suffer together—a proceeding at the thought of which our heart revolts—we hereby issue this edict calling upon our people to avoid the serious crime of rebellion. Furthermore, a short time ago, when the Governor of Anhui reported to us that the prefectures of Fengyang and Yenchow were suffering from drought as well as floods, we graciously commanded the Board of Revenue to remit funds at once to the distressed districts, and the Viceroy Liu and Governor Teng were also commanded to investigate the extent of the distress in order that when the funds arrived immediate aid could be dispensed. This shows that we think day and night concerning the welfare of our people; it may be, however, that the local authorities concerned are in fault this time, and the people have suffered through their avarice and dishonesty and have so been forced into rebellion. If such be the case then not only the local authorities but also the high provincial officials cannot be free from blame. All should, therefore, at once seek to redeem their faults and while on the one hand be prepared to grant every relief to our suffering subjects, issue proclamations, on the other hand, calling upon the rebels to lay down their arms and come and accept the relief the withholding of which caused them to take up arms. Again, should it be discovered that the misconduct and avarice of the local authorities were really the cause of the above-noted troubles, we hereby command the said Viceroy and Governor to denounce such men with the greatest severity in order that the true delinquents may be punished. Care should also be taken to give every protection to the numerous missionary chapels, missionaries, and converts scattered throughout the disturbed districts. Finally, strict discipline should be kept among the troops sent to crush the rebellion so that innocent people may not suffer from their outrages, while no mercy should be shown to rebel leaders and those who willingly join them against the government.

Three large steam launches have been bought in Hongkong by the U.S. Government for service in Manila, and they will steam over immediately.

The N.-C. Daily News understands that the new first-class cruiser Bertha will relieve the German cruiser Arcona on the Asiatic station.

The Universal Gazette's Peking correspondent telegraphs that the secret edict reported to have been sent by the Empress Dowager to the Governor of Chinese Turkestan the other day was, after all, not meant to recall the exiled Chang Yin-huan, but that, if it is any comfort to his friends to know, the edict merely cancelled the sentence of banishment for life to imprisonment for life. This looks the same, remarks our senior Shanghai contemporary, but really absolves the exile from working on the post-roads.

The Honan rebel chief whose name is Huo Ming-yen has made his stronghold in a hill village, two miles from the T'ang Hill, where 21 centuries ago Liu Pang, the founder of the powerful Han dynasty, first made his attempt for the Dragon Throne. The families of the rebel chief and his adherents have all been housed in this village, and Brigadier-General Ch'en of Hsichow has ordered a cavalry force now at Suchow to reconnoitre the stronghold. Most of the Honan rebels are, however, in Anhui assisting the rebel chief Niu.

Mr. J. S. Fearon, Chairman of the Shanghai Municipal Council, was returned at the head of the poll in the recent annual election.

A Japanese travelling recently in a junk with a cargo of cloths, etc., whilst in Tungshan, met with pirates who took the vessel and cargo but released him. On returning to Amoy he sought protection from his Consul, who addressed the Chinese commander of the port, the loss being stated at 400 bundles of cloth, 30 bundles of hemp, and a wooden box containing 120 odd dollars. A military officer was then sent in a launch to Tungshan, where he found the junk and cargo with no one in it, so it was towed back to Amoy and handed over to the Japanese. Some of the cloths were missing, and the owner requested the commander to recover them. Later on the Tungshan military station sent about 30 bundles of cloth which were recovered from one of the pirates, who was trying to sell them. The pirate, however, made his escape.

From the China Gazette:—

The letter of a gentleman occupying an official position in the British service at Peking, which has been shown to third parties, gives an official version of the coup d'état in China in September. It states:—

At a dinner party Sir Claude Macdonald explained to us the present situation; therefore what I am writing is not confidential. The Emperor, according to Sir Claude, is a quiet, sympathetic man in bad health. Kang Yu-wei was an enthusiastic dreamer, who believed that the whole of China could be reformed by edicts. When, however, it came to the question of adopting Western ideas to the extent of cutting off pigtails, the Conservative party, headed by the Empress, stepped in and decided that the Emperor was too ill to manage State affairs. The Reform party then decided to do away with the Empress, but she seized the ringleaders and cut their heads off. Kang fled to an English gunboat, and claimed British protection, and is now making out that the men were executed because they desired reforms, ignoring all mention of their rebellious designs.

The Chinese then got it into their heads that the foreigners were assisting the rebellious reformers, and as the latter were being led to execution through the streets of Peking the populace shouted, "Down with the men who want to cut off our pigtails and the foreign devils who are supporting them." Hence arose the assaults on Europeans. The T'ungli Yamen, anxious to conciliate Europeans, asked Sir Claude Macdonald how they could stop the absurd rumours that had got abroad to the effect that the Emperor had been poisoned. Sir Claude advised them to avail themselves of the Legation doctors. They asked for the English one, but he being absent, Sir Claude recommended the French doctor, who saw the Emperor and reported on his condition. He found the Emperor suffering from acute Bright's disease, and quite unable to do any work at all.

The Empress, who is a clever woman, by no means bigotedly opposed to reforms, simply stepped in and managed the affairs of State which the Emperor was unable to do. The reformers are crying out against the Empress on the ground that her private life is not all that it should be, but European Sovereigns have not always been paragons of virtue in that respect—witness Catherine of Russia.

The T'ungli Yamen is desirous of keeping peace at all price, and the Empress guiding affairs with every wish to introduce reforms gradually so as not to hurt the old-time prejudices of the people.

Regarding the general situation, the writer remarks that Sir Claude Macdonald told him that "The whole Corps Diplomatique have never, during the time he had been here, been on more cordial terms as regard co-operative work in China." The greatest difficulty he had to contend with was the effect of canards supplied to certain papers to create a sensation. These absurd reports are translated into the Chinese papers, and do more harm to British interests than all the intrigues of Russia and France. From another portion of the correspondence we learn that Sir Claude Macdonald believes "that matters must some day reach a crisis."

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

A court martial was held on board the Narcissus at Hongkong, on Jan. 22nd when Edward Bullen, seaman of the Powerful, was sentenced to three years' penal servitude for striking a superior officer.

The Prince of Wales, as Grand Master of English Freemasons, has appointed Earl Amherst Deputy Grand Master and Provincial Grand Master for Kent, to succeed the late Earl of Lathom as Most Worshipful Pro Grand Master.

The London and China Express says:—Captain Swinton Holland, Commodore at Hongkong, will obtain promotion to Rear-Admiral by the retirement of Admiral of the Fleet Sir J. E. Commerell, V.C., G.C.B., on 13th January. But for the unexpected promotion of Captain Pelham Aldrich, Captain Holland would have been retired under the age clause on the 8th February next. Captain F. A. Powell, C.B. of the Mars, is to succeed Commodore Holland at Hongkong.

An anti-Semitic Theatre has just been started in Vienna as a joint-stock enterprise, enjoying active municipal support.

It is stated in home papers that the new Chinese regiment will be for general service, and will be available wherever required, and not for Wei-hai-wei alone. Mauritius has been mentioned as one of the first destinations of the regiment outside China.

From Kobe comes news that Gilbert and Sullivan's "Gondoliers" is to be put into rehearsal and given by the newly resuscitated Kobe Choral Society. We hardly like to count the years since Yokohama gave a light opera; perhaps when the Y.C.S. comes to life again next autumn something in this line may be attempted.

A new school, which ought to commend itself to Japanese students, has been opened at the University of Chicago. It is the School of Commerce and Politics, in preparation for which no dead language is required in the case of Japanese, as their proficiency in Japanese and Chinese is credited in place of Latin, usually required. The course of study in the school is excellent.

The British and Chinese Corporation have secured, through the Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation, a concession for working the extensive coal field at Nanpiao, on the line of the railway from Shanhaikwan to Newchwang. The corporation are sending out an engineer to report upon the concession, and he will have the assistance of Mr. Kinder, Engineer in Chief of the Imperial Railway of North China and the benefit of the great experience he has gained as the engineer who developed so successfully the Kaiping coal mines.—London and China Express.

Dr. John Henry Barrows has announced his acceptance of the presidency of Oberlin College.

The Hongkong Maru, the latest of the new vessels of the Toyo Kisen Kaisha, made an average run of 17.12 knots on her trial the other day.

Prof. Droppers, who recently returned to the United States after a nine years' sojourn in Japan, has been chosen by the regents to succeed Mr. John W. Mauck, resigned, as President of the State University of Iowa. Senator Pettigrew met Prof. Droppers on his recent tour in the East and recommended his election.

PRINCE BISMARCK'S AUTOBIOGRAPHY.

A REVIEW.

Biographical literature is becoming gradually one of the most important departments of belles-lettres—indeed, if judged by the intrinsic value of the books published during the last two years, the most important department. If we recollect rightly, it was Lord Beaconsfield who advised his young Lord in one of his novels to "read biographies." Biography, especially that of a great man, takes us into a world full of ideas where we see them impressed in their encyclopædic form upon the mental retina of a recognized authority. It is quite surprising to see that the English make far better writers of biographies than the Continental nations. This faculty may be attributable to the encyclopædic nature of their mental characteristics. The English have the natural facility of collecting and arranging their materials and possessions in an attractive, hence durable, form. Whatever be the cause, the fact remains uncontested that the English have produced more valuable biographical literature than the rest of Europe. It is not because England has produced more heroes than Europe. Voltaire was a greater literary genius than Johnson, but while the former is being gradually forgotten except as the leader of a revolt against superstition and religious intolerance, the latter, thanks to his biographer, will for ever stand as the great monument of 18th Century English literature. The best biographies of Angelo and Goethe were written by Englishmen. While Hugo, Alfred de Musset, the genial Renan, and scholarly Taine have passed away without even a short memoir, we have seen volume after volume coming out to commemorate the deeds of Arnold, Macaulay, Pusey, and Tennyson, not to mention Manning, Dean Church, Dr. McCosh, and a host of others. Judging from the life and character of the subject, the coming biography of Mr. Gladstone by Mr. John Morley will be the greatest book of the age of its kind. It is true that Mr. Morley hitherto has not produced anything of permanent value, still he is a man of undoubted literary abilities, as his "Critical Essays" show, and in Mr. Gladstone's Life he will probably conceive and bring out his magnus opus. The apprehension is expressed by many that the author, being an unbeliever, will not be able to comprehend, or rather see, the beauty of Mr. Gladstone's religious life, which always manifested itself in such a wonderful intensity during his long career, and which was the basic foundation of his ideal character. For this feature of the biography we have to wait with patience before uttering any word of criticism.

Prince Bismarck's "Autobiography" as we now have it, is in my opinion, nothing but a short outline of his long and wonderful career. It opens with the words: "I left school at Easter, 1832, a normal product of our State system of education; a Pantheist, and, if not a Republican, at least with the persuasion that the Republic was the most rational form of government," and it ends with a letter of the Emperor Frederick. It does not touch, as it was expected, upon his relations to the present Emperor, nor refer to his dismissal. The rumour is that another volume, the 3rd, will soon follow.

Bismarck, like Goethe (Autobiography Book I), ought to have told us in this book the date of his birth, and the part which the Cosmic bodies, Saturn, Mars, Mercury, the Moon, etc., played on the grand occasion, so that we common clay could find out the ways, at least, of a smiling fortune, notwithstanding our inability to control its movements and operations.

In his early youth Bismarck encountered many liberal tendencies, and he tries to show that a predilection towards a liberal form of Government was inherited from his ancestors, and was not the outcome of a shifting and shaky opportunism. "My father was free from aristocratic prejudices. My mother was the daughter of Mencken, Privy Councillor to Frederick the Great, who sprang from a family of Leipzig professors, and was accounted in that days a liberal," (Vol. I p. 16). Although in process of time he greatly modified his earlier views, and is considered by many as the worst type of monarchical conservative, still his views concerning the advisability of a constitutional monarchy, that is, a dual government, by a King and an elective representative parliament, never underwent, during all his life, any material change. He says:—"The unlimited authority of the old Prussian monarchy was not, and is not, the final word of my convictions..... Absolutism primarily demands impartiality, honesty, devotion to duty, energy, inward humility in the ruler. These may be present, and yet male and female favourites (in the best case the lawful wife), the monarch's own vanity and susceptibility to flattery, will, nevertheless, diminish the fruits of his good intentions, inasmuch as the monarch is not omniscient and cannot have an equal understanding of all branches of his office." (Vol. I. P. 17).

Then follows a record of Bismarck's gradual advancement from an insignificant office to the first place under the monarch—Chancellor. Wherever Bismarck went, whether to foreign countries as ambassador, or when he was at home recuperating his health, he seems to have possessed a prescience of coming greatness, and was quite impatient to attain it, like a child whose mother has promised to give him a piece of cake if he keeps good and quiet. He is constantly writing to Roon, "I am still prepared to enter (the Cabinet) without a portfolio," and so on; till finally he got in "with a portfolio."

After becoming the first minister of the Prussian Cabinet, he gives a "Retrospect of Prussian Policy" (Chap. XII.), a masterpiece written by a master mind. This is a chapter that requires special study, and minute investigation.

The rest of the book is occupied mostly by a description of the causes and issues leading to the great three wars which Bismarck recommended and carried on—that of Schleswig-Holstein with Denmark, 1864, that with Austria, 1866, and that with France in 1870, and their final outcome in an enlarged and united Germany. With these events of a past history we do not intend to deal to-day; there is one point, however, which will always remain interesting to posterity, the Ems telegram. To this the author has devoted one whole chapter. Both telegrams are given in extenso. The King's runs as follows: "Count Benedetti spoke to me on the promenade, in order to demand from me, finally in a very importunate manner, that I should authorize him to telegraph at once that I bound myself for all future time never again to give my consent if the Hohenzollerns should renew their candidature. I refused at last somewhat sternly, as it is neither right nor possible to undertake engagements of this kind à tant jamais. Naturally I told him that I had as yet received no news, and as he was earlier informed about Paris and Madrid than myself, he could clearly see that my government once more had no hand in the matter." This telegram was sent from Ems to Berlin to Aheken, who, after deciphering, sent it to Bismarck, who reduced it by striking out words, but without adding or altering, to the following form:—"After the news of the renunciation of the hereditary Prince Hohenzollern had been officially communicated to the Imperial Government of France by the Royal Government of Spain, the French Ambassador at Ems made the further demand to His Majesty the King that he would authorize him to telegraph to Paris that His Majesty the King bound himself for all future time never again to give his consent if the Hohenzollerns should renew their candidature. His Majesty the King thereupon decided not to receive the French ambassador again, and sent to tell him through the aide-de-camp on duty that His Majesty had nothing further to communicate to the ambassador." This second form was given to the public press and led to the furor culminating in war. That the two telegrams are radically different no one can deny. After the "concentrated" telegram had been read to Roon and Moltke, the latter remarked:—

"Now it has a different ring: it sounded before like a parley; now it is like a flourish in answer to a challenge."

If judged by a moral and rigidly ethical standard, whether Bismarck was culpable in mutilating and changing the King's telegram, is a question which had better be left to the decision of that great tribunal before which he is perhaps now standing. However, it cannot be doubted that the drift of affairs had been for many years towards an inevitable conflict between the two Powers, whatever be the part which this telegram played in that terrible tragical drama. Napoleon had been publicly speaking of the "readjustment of the frontiers," for many years, and the Prussians also had been for years preparing for the coming struggle and when it came they went into it with an enthusiasm unparalleled in the history of war. The King and the rest of the Cabinet had full authority for arresting the consequences of the "condensed" telegram even if Bismarck was for war, but they did not; on the contrary the mobilization of the whole army, through the influence of the Crown Prince Frederick (See Emperor Frederick's Diary P. 48), was at once ordered. "I pushed for the immediate mobilization of the whole army and navy, there being no time to lose. This is approved, and I tell it to the public. The King embraces me in the deepest emotion, both of us feeling what was at stake. Enters carriage with me; enthusiastic cheering." (ibid P. 49) "July 18, Universal enthusiasm; Germany is rising like one man" (P. 50). We are not endeavouring to present a brief justifying Prince Bismarck's action; but simply to show that he was not the sole agent in bringing about this terrible war.

We must say, however, that this action of Bismarck's was in conformity with his fundamental ideas of statecraft. Bismarck was not an idealist like Plato. He did not believe that the state has to be governed by the immutable ideas of justice, of righteousness, and of equity which float in the infinity of space, and which shape and mould everything. On the contrary, he laughs to scorn the "Platonic" sympathy and humanitarianism of the Empress Augusta and of the English Court. To Bismarck the political arena of the whole world was analogous to a chess-board where each one has to watch his own gains and losses. Pity or morality have nothing to do with the case. In fact their very existence betrays the weakness, if not the immorality, of the agent. Selfishness, when manifesting itself in the individual, is extremely reprehensible, but selfishness, where seen in a state, has to be placed in some other category and judged accordingly. If Victor Hugo praises the nun for speaking something that was not truthful in order to save Jean Valjean from being arrested, why should Bismarck be condemned because he altered the tone of a telegram and thereby brought a great victory to his native land? All these are matters which will come before a higher and final tribunal.

The two Chapters which are most important are 29 and 30. "The Triple Alliance," and "The Future Policy of Russia." In these two Chapters, especially in the latter, the Prince has propounded his views in regard to the attitude which Germany should assume in the future towards Russia. The proposition is that Germany should give a free hand to Russia in Western Turkey, that is, "a Russian control of the Bosphorus," provided that "Russia, as soon as she is sufficiently ready, if necessary, to fall upon and overrun the Sultan and the Bosphorus by land and sea, makes a personal and confidential proposal to the Sultan to guarantee him his position in the Seraglio and all his provinces not only against foreign countries but also against his own subjects, in return for permission to erect sufficient fortifications and maintain a sufficient number of troops at the northern entrance to the Bosphorus." (Vol. II, p. 287.) This is the most extraordinary proposition of the Prince, and it shows that after all he was not an infallible being. Supposing that Germany acquiesced in this, what would be the ultimate outcome of it?—simply her being outflanked from the East as well as from the North. Of course Russia would not be satisfied by acting merely as a sentinel on the Bosphorus. Once well established there, and Turkey as an element of resistance obliterated, both Austria and Germany would find themselves under the tender mercies of Russia and France. Once convert the Mediterranean Sea into a Russian lake, and not only will the future colonial expansion of Germany come to an end, and with it her gradually increasing foreign commerce, also but the very existence of the empire as an independent and progressive element in the world's history may be threatened, and we may see another China in the midst of Europe. That this view of the situation is not taken by the present Emperor we have ample proof, and reason and foresight prompted by the instinct of self-preservation, are more on the side of the Emperor than on that of the Prince. The whole book does not contain a single word, as far as we can remember, about the colonial expansion of Germany, showing that Bismarck cared nothing for it: a fact sufficient in itself to have caused his dismissal after the great task of his life—the unity of Germany—had been finished. That this way of solving the Eastern Question cannot be conducive to the future safety of the German Empire we do not entertain the slightest doubt; and that the Emperor William II. does not consent to that way of solving it his recent visit to Constantinople and Palestine is a convincing proof. The ways of solving the immediate question of the Turkish possessions in Europe and Western Anatolia are varied, and many of them less suicidal to Germany than that suggested by Prince Bismarck; either to have the status quo preserved, or at least, for a few more generations; or to have the ancient Byzantine empire restored under the paternal care of the "Great Powers" of Europe; or to have Austria proclaim a sort of protectorate over the Balkan principalities and cut off Russia altogether from becoming a Mediterranean Power, and turn her direction towards Asia completely; she and England, then, would have to fight out the supremacy of the continent, Russia already has found an outlet for her commerce in Liaotung; and if she extends her transian railway to the Persian Gulf she will have another valuable outlet there also. Hence the necessity of a Russian outlet in the Mediterranean is not acute now as it used to be a few decades ago. By acquiring such valuable possessions Russia will be more vulnerable, and consequently less aggressively warlike.

Before closing this short review the question often arises in one's mind: Was Bismarck really a great man? An editorial article in Harper's Weekly, which bears the undoubted traces of Carl Schurz's genius, says Bismarck was not a great man because he did not move with the progressive tendencies of mankind. It put plainly, it means that Bismarck was not a great man because he was an ultra-conservative statesman. Whether such a contention can be made a universal standard for judging the comparative greatness of all historic heroes, is very questionable. The maxim, "Ye shall know them by their fruits," appears more catholic, more universal, and more rational, and to have a better applicability to the case of Bismarck at least. Judged by this standard, Prince Bismarck is not only one of the greatest personalities Germany has produced, but its greatest. From prehistoric times, as the Roman historian Tacitus tells us, Germany had been divided into small tribal principalities which carried on perpetual wars between themselves. The Christianization and civilization of the country, while it redeemed most of this internal evil, still did not succeed in unifying the country till the time of Frederick Barbarossa A.D. 1123-1190. For a short time the personal valour and activity of the Emperor succeeded in forming an ephemeral unity; however, the natural instinct was too strong for this weak bond of union, and very soon asserted itself, and the nation lapsed again into its primitive habits of feudalism. The Germans somehow like to have a large number of Kings. Bismarck tells us that once he overheard two soldiers quarrelling with each other. One with great contempt said to the other one: "Why, you haven't got even a King in your part of the country!" Bismarck came at a time when his fatherland was altogether exhausted by a long chain of foreign wars and internal jealousies; when the country was divided into almost innumerable petty khanates and dukedoms. He took up this conflicting and inharmonious mass of humanity and by his wonderful genius welded it into a unique whole and brought it out again as one of the greatest powers of history. Whatever were the elements gravitating towards the making of the German Empire, we must not forget that the very idea originated in the Prince's brains, and when the auspicious moment came his birth was attended with no throes. It was Bismarck who ushered into the world the "German Empire," and with it German culture and German civilization, as a distinct and progressive factor. A man who has achieved so much for the human race in general, and for the land of his birth in particular, we call Great

What was the secret of Prince Bismarck's success? Two words can amply answer this question: prevision and perseverance. From the very beginning of his career he foresaw his pathway step by step, and what he foresaw he persevered to reach. Sometimes we find him standing alone contra Germany, but he neither wavers nor budge one inch, and finally prevails upon the vacillating king. Of course, the results always justify his firm action. Oftentimes we wonder how a human being made of flesh and blood could have resisted all the influences arrayed against him; then, of course, we remember that the great Chancellor was not made, like other mortals, of flesh and blood, but of solid steel.

Let us not be misunderstood. We do not mean to exalt Bismarck to the altitude of a demi-god. He also had his own human limitations and shortcomings. He did not possess that acrobatic nimbleness which Gortchakoff and Beaconsfield possessed to a wonderful degree; nor was his ken of observation broad like that of Bonaparte, on the contrary it was very limited; as we have seen in his views on the final settlement of the Turkish Question. Neither can we for a moment contrast him with that ideal Christian Statesman, William Ewart Gladstone. Bismarck's greatness was of a different stamp: slow, grim, heavy, crushing—but more abiding.

One characteristic of his unpleasantly obtrudes itself almost on every page of this autobiography: namely, his inability to get on with anybody. There is a species of insanity which comes either from a disordered brain, or sometimes from the last stages of consumption, in which the patient thinks that every human being extant is his enemy. Bismarck seems from his early life to have been afflicted with similar hallucinations. Somewhere he tells us that perhaps, it was a sort of inborn natural defect in him, that he could only see the weak and bad side of the people and not their good side! A very queer confession indeed for a man of Bismarck's capacity and position to make! He lets no opportunity slip away without saying something unpleasant about the Empress Augusta and her "Roman Catholic and French proclivities." Eulenburg, Arnim, Gerlach, Geyken—every one has his own full share of abuse. Sometimes he even searches after insignificant personages in order to cover them with opprobrium and reproach. He tries to convince us that the principal motives of Prince Gortchakoff to ask the Emperor for a Parliament was not the improvement of the conditions of the Russian people, but in order to show in that great body his own oratorical powers! Was ever such empty nonsense put into type?

His character sketch of the Emperor William I. (Chap. XXXII) is the best ever published about that great monarch. We think it a sober and faithful picture of the first Emperor of United Germany. Would that he had given us another Chapter on the Emperor William II!

THE BOOKSHELF.

"The Resident Councillor," by Mrs. Egerton Easton; published from the Straits Times office.

"THE RESIDENT COUNCILLOR" is a pretty and well-told story of Eastern life, which is much the same as life in all latitudes and in all degrees of temperature. The scene in this case is Malacca, and the story tells of the love passages of the official head of the community, some of his relatives, and an adventure. It is narrated with some force, and the style is not without distinction. The local colour is laid on with more discrimination than in most novels of the kind; not in blotches of native names and pidgin English, but in a manner which unobtrusively but vividly depicts the mental background of the story. The Resident Councillor is himself an interesting figure, sympathetically drawn, and the characters of the adventures and her boy admirer are not without life. It is a story which will appeal to Eastern readers chiefly for its Eastern atmosphere. If the mise-en-scène were an English village the book would have no claim above that of the ordinary novel, but, dealing as it does with the life of European exiles in Asia, it possesses an interest of its own for all who have had an experience of the Treaty Port or the Crown Colony. We can recommend the book.

THE FILIPINOS AND THE TARIFF.

We are asked—says the China Mail—to state that the reason why the Filipinos will not surrender to the United States the Customs in the Philippines, apart from its being the principal source of revenue, is that it would be a guarantee that the Americans could not introduce their preferential tariffs in the inter-ocean trade of the islands. The Filipinos wish all nations to share alike, a fair field and no favour, and they are already alarmed at the unequivocal indications that the United States intended to introduce the McKinley tariff of protection. They have seen the benefits of the English policy in the neighbouring Colonies of Singapore and Hongkong, and are determined to have no preferential distinctions in their country in favour of any one nation. The only guarantee of enforcing this is a control from the very outset of the Customs and all fiscal arrangements. The same thing applies to the supreme judiciary. This, in American hands, might entirely clash with their own Code. No doubt sufficient guarantees would be given to foreigners if required on terms to be arranged hereafter. What the Filipinos require is a real autonomy and not a fictitious one, like the Malay protected States, where it is well known the real power is the British resident who actually wields more power than the Crown. At the same time, it must be said that if the Philippine Islands were as ably ruled as the Malay States, under a Protectorate of the same nature, it would be the best thing for the Islands and the Islanders.

COMMITTEE.

President.—Mrs. Irvine. Vice-President.—Mrs. Eldridge. Hon. Treasurer.—Mrs. Isaacs. Hon. Secretary.—Mrs. Thomas Thomas. Managers.—Mrs. J. Walter, Mrs. Whitall, Mrs. Meier, Madame de Micheaux, Mrs. Mitchell, Mrs. James. Hon. Secretary. Tokyo.—Mrs. McMillan.

Your Committee have much pleasure in laying before you, the 26th Annual Report of the Association. They are glad to say the funds of the Society are at present in a fairly satisfactory condition; but in such a cosmopolitan community, in which constant changes occur, and where all in want of help are assisted, without any distinction as to creed or nationality, it is impossible to foresee, when large demands may not suddenly be made on the funds of the Association, which has to be prepared for all such emergencies. The case of every person desiring assistance, is enquired into by members of the Committee, and all cases are helped according to their need.

The sincere thanks of the Ladies' Benevolent Association, are tendered to the kind friends who have sent donations, either from themselves personally, or by giving entertainments, for the benefit of the Funds of the Society, and to the Editor of the Japan Herald for printing last year's report free of expense, also for the donations of clothing, any further contributions of which, especially men's clothing, are greatly needed at present, and will be thankfully received by the President, at the Parsonage.

The Committee gratefully acknowledge the kind help of the King's Daughters' Circle, towards the maintenance of a destitute sick woman at the General Hospital.

The work done by the Ladies' Benevolent Association, during the past year, will be seen by the Hon. Treasurer's Report.

Geo. CHARLESWORTH, Secretary.
We have examined the foregoing accounts and compared them with the books and vouchers of the Company, and certify them to be correct.

O. KEIL,
C. H. FRARON, } Auditors.
Yokohama, January 24th, 1899.

A SATISFACTORY YEAR.

The CHAIRMAN said—Gentlemen, as you are aware we are not called upon to lay before you a report or accounts by the articles of association. Nevertheless for the last three years your directors have caused to be prepared a statement of assets and liabilities as on the 30th November every year. It is a very convenient arrangement, as you all have before you the actual figures, the amount of work that has been done, and the position of the company at that time, duly and properly audited. I think you can read this statement of figures very much better for yourselves than I can do for you, but I shall be pleased to answer any questions on points that may suggest themselves. You will see that on the 30th November we carried forward a balance of 8,498 yen odd, but I am happy to be able to announce to you that since then the balance to our credit has so materially increased that we are able to declare an interim dividend of 10 yen per share. We are enabled to do this because of the continued prosperity of the company. I have before me the amount of work that has been done during the year 1897 and during the year 1898. The work done during the former year amounted on the average to 18,000 yen a month. The work done during the last year, 1898, including December, averaged about 24,500 yen per month. The work done during 1898 was about 80,000 yen more than in 1897. That shows a very satisfactory condition of affairs, certainly satisfactory to us as directors and it ought to be satisfactory to the shareholders. I will take this opportunity of saying that we feel that a great deal of our success is due to the excellent and efficient services rendered us by our manager, Mr. Tresize, and by all who are at work in the works. We as directors have very little to do with the actual working of the company. We exercise a discretion and a supervision, and that is all we do. For the accounts we are responsible, but for the work we have to trust to others who have practical knowledge of the work, which we have not.

On the proposition of Mr. Langfeldt a hearty vote of thanks was passed to the directors and to Mr. Tresize.

THE DEATH OF MR. KEIL.

INQUEST AND VERDICT.

The inquiry into the circumstances of the death of the late Mr. O. Keil was held at the American Consulate on Wednesday afternoon before Mr. J. McLean (Vice-Consul General), sitting as Coroner, and Messrs. August Langfeldt and T. L. Brower as assessors.

Mr. G. H. Scidmore, at the request of the Court, examined the witnesses on behalf of the people of the United States.

Dr. Stuart Eldridge deposed—I was acquainted with Mr. O. Keil, whom I last saw alive on the 31st ult. Just before 11 o'clock I was called by a messenger who told me Mr. Keil had shot himself at the Saw Mills at Ishikawa, and was alive at the messenger's departure, and they were bringing him to town along the canal road. I immediately proceeded to meet the injured man and did so at Jizozaka. I found that he was fatally injured, and, directing the bearers to follow me to the German Hospital, I proceeded there to make arrangements for his reception and there awaited the arrival of the bearers. When the patient reached the hospital, assisted by Dr. Koch, I made a thorough examination. We decided that the case was absolutely hopeless. The injury was a gunshot wound inflicted through the roof of the mouth passing upwards, backwards, and a little to the left of the median line; emerging to the left of the brow of the head. The brain was destroyed to a very large extent, a considerable portion protruding from the wound. When I met the cortège bringing the body, a European employed at the saw mills who accompanied it handed me a pistol which he stated was picked up by the side of the injured man, which I now produce. It is a Smith and Wesson revolver. All the five chambers had been loaded and one was discharged. The pistol was one of a large calibre, a .38, and the injuries were such as would have been inflicted by a weapon of the kind. Mr. Keil survived until a quarter to twelve. I was not present at his death. I received an official notice from Dr. Koch regarding his death.

Witness added that deceased had been his patient and intimate friend for many years; he thought 20. When he first knew deceased he was suffering from symptoms of brain disorder, really of no great importance, but which he interpreted as threatening insanity. From these he speedily recovered under treatment, and until about four years ago enjoyed a fair degree of health, though he suffered occasionally from attacks of depression. Four years ago, as the result of very severe and special strain, he was temporarily insane, and witness removed him to hospital on that account. Since that time his fits of depression of spirits had been more frequent and severe sleeplessness had been the rule rather than the exception, and witness thought he had been able to detect more or less failure of mental power as time went on. The fear of mental breakdown into insanity or imbecility was never absent from his mind. Witness considered that for several years deceased's mind could not be considered perfectly sound, and there was a tendency to melancholia—the most depressing of all mental afflictions.

Mr. Scidmore—Do you think his mental condition was such as to unfit him for the transaction of business?—No, I can hardly say that, for with a great mind like his the ability for business might exist with some mental injury, but there were times when he was unfit for business. He was not the able man he once was. I have heard him use the expression himself that he was losing grip of the complicated matters he had on hand. He was worse at one time than another, but I think he was steadily deteriorating all the time. He overworked himself for years, and I warned him again and again of the inevitable result. When witness last saw him alive he was in much the same condition as for some months past. He had often expressed the feeling that sometime he could not endure his burden any longer, and since his death witness had received a letter from him written two days before the suicide in which he expressed the intention of destroying himself at once. Witness considered the act of suicide was due to mental unsoundness taking the form of melancholia, and he did not consider that the evidence of deliberation and intention given by his having written farewell letters and arranged his business militated against that conclusion, for deliberation and capacity in some directions might be accompanied by a most serious form of mental disease in others.

By Mr. McLan—He was satisfied that the wound was effected by the deceased, it could scarcely be other than suicidal.

Mr. John W. Hall said he was acquainted with deceased. He last saw him just after he died at the General Hospital, about 11.50 a.m.

Mr. Jessie S. Day, employed at the Yokohama Woodworking Company's Works at Nakamura, said he was at the works on Tuesday morning. He saw Mr. Keil there. Witness was at the side of the Creek taking some lumber from the godown of Ahrens and Co., having it put on a pontoon, when one of his employes came to him and said Mr. Keil was on the other side of the Creek. Witness had deceased taken across in a sampan, and shook hands with him. Deceased enquired what use the lumber was to be put in, and witness told him. He enquired about some beer box stuff, and the quality of the wood. Witness said he would show him the stock. He immediately replied, "No, you boys go ahead with your work here; I'll be back presently." Witness spoke to him, and told him it was pay day, and asked as to getting money for the men. He said, "Very well," and then crossed the Creek again. Witness next saw him between some piles of kerosene "box-shocks" about twenty-five minutes afterwards. He was lying prone on his left arm grasping a revolver in his right hand. He was not conscious. Witness looked round to see if anybody was near, and saw Mr. Martin 200 feet away from him, standing looking at him. Witness called to him that Mr. Keil had killed himself. Mr. Martin seemed to be unable to move. Witness went into the mill proper, and called for Mr. Upton to come out and help him. He could not realise the fact, and asked witness why he was fooling. Witness told him he was not, and to come quick. They then both ran out, Mr. Upton being ahead of witness. With the assistance of Mr. Martin they carried Mr. Keil to the office door, placed him on a board, and ordered the coolies to take him to the German Hospital. Witness noticed then the position of the wound. He had been shot through the roof of the mouth and the bullet had passed through the head, the brain oozing out. Witness had not heard any shot. Witness had noticed when deceased was speaking to him a troubled expression on his face, but he had noticed such an expression before. Possibly it was a little worse this time. He was very quiet, and had very little to say. Witness did not go to the German Hospital.

Antoine Martin said he was employed in the godowns of Ahrens and Co., at Nakamura. On Tuesday deceased came to the Saw-mill and witness spoke to him about various business matters. Some time after he heard the last witness cry, "My God, he has killed himself." Witness could not move; the shock was so great, for Mr. Keil for two years had been more than a father to him. He described the position of the body. Deceased was much depressed when witness spoken to him.

Franklin Nelson Upton, employed at the Saw-mills, was the next witness. He said when deceased left the witness Day, witness asked him if he had seen Langfeldt, or Kildoyl, and he said "Yes," and everything was arranged very satisfactorily. Some time afterwards Day told witness that Mr. Keil had shot himself. Witness at first thought that Day was joking, but, finding that he was serious, witness went to the kerosine oil "shocks," and there found deceased lying face downwards with his head on his left arm, and his other hand stretched out holding a revolver. Witness suggested that they should get him up, but Day proposed that they should wait till they had notified the Consul. Witness, stooping down, heard deceased breathe, and then proposed that they should take him to a doctor. Witness took him by the shoulders and lifted him up, and then saw a large wound at the top of the head from which the brains were oozing. Witness, Day, and Martin carried him to the office, and then ordered some coolies to convey him to hospital. Witness did not have much to say to deceased on the day in question, and did not notice any peculiarity in his manner. The day before witness saw him on business, and he then said that Day would see about it, adding, "You don't know, Frank, the trouble I am having." He appeared more troubled and depressed than witness had ever seen him.

Mr. Scidmore said these were all the witnesses who were at present available.

The witness Day, however, was recalled, and said some three weeks before deceased's death he saw a revolver in one of the pigeon-holes of the desk in deceased's office.

The Court retired and after a short absence returned with the following verdict:—

We find that Oscar Otto Keil, a citizen of the United States of America, died at Yokohama, Japan, on the 31st day, of January, A.D. 1899; that the cause of his death was a gunshot wound in his head; and that the said wound was inflicted upon himself by the said Oscar Otto Keil, while suffering from temporary mental unsoundness.

THE LEOPOLD CASE.

PROCEEDINGS IN BANKRUPTCY.

In H.B.M.'s Court for Japan on Friday morning, before His Honour Judge Wilkinson, a petition was heard on behalf of the Chartered Bank of India, Australia, and China praying that a receiving order in bankruptcy should be made against the estate of Charles Emil Leopold, a convict now under sentence in H.M.'s prison.

Mr. R. J. Lowder appeared in support of the petition, and Professor Terry represented the debtor.

Mr. Lowder read the petition, which was as follows:—

IN HER BRITANNIC MAJESTY'S COURT FOR JAPAN, KANAGAWA.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

re-CHARLES EMIL LEOPOLD.

as parte THE CHARTERED BANK OF INDIA, AUSTRALIA AND CHINA, a CREDITOR.

I, Edwin Manifold Janion, an Attorney for the Chartered Bank of India, Australia, and China, hereby petition the Court that a receiving order may be made in respect of the Estate of Charles Emil Leopold, a convict now undergoing imprisonment with hard labour in Her Britannic Majesty's Gaol at Yokohama, and lately carrying on business at Number 59-D, Yokohama, and say:—

1. That the said Charles Emil Leopold has for the greater part of six months next preceding the presentation of this petition carried on business at Number 59-D Yokohama, within the jurisdiction of this Court.

2. That the said Charles Emil Leopold is justly and truly indebted to the Chartered Bank of India, Australia, and China in the sum of yen 49,295.80 on a judgment debt.

3. That the Chartered Bank of India, Australia, and China hold security for the payment of the said sum, and I estimate the value of such security at the sum of yen 30,000.

4. That Charles Emil Leopold within three months before the date of the presentation of this petition has committed the following act of Bankruptcy, namely, the Chartered Bank of India, Australia and China, having on the 13th day of June last obtained a final judgment against him for yen 49,295.80 and execution thereon not having been stayed, has served on him by leave of the Court of Bankruptcy notice under the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, requiring him to pay the judgment debt in accordance with the terms of the judgment or to secure or compound for to the satisfaction of the said Bank or the Court, and he has not within the time limited by the order giving leave to effect service of the said notice either complied with the requirements of the notice, or satisfied the Court that he has a counterclaim, set off, or cross demand which equals or exceeds the amount of the judgment debt, and which he could not set up in the action in which the judgment was obtained.

Dated this 17th day of January, 1899.

The Chartered Bank of India, Australia, and China, by the Attorney:

(Signed) E. M. JANION.

Signed by the petitioner in my presence.

(Signed) J. H. LOWDER.

ORDER.

This petition having been presented to the Court on the 17th day of January, 1899, it is ordered that this petition shall be heard at Yokohama on the 27th day of January, 1899, at 10.30 o'clock in the forenoon.

And you, the said Charles Leopold, are to take notice that if you intend to dispute the truth of any of the statements contained in the petition you must file with the registrar of this Court a notice showing the grounds upon which you intend to dispute the same and send by post a copy of the notices to the petitioner three days before the date fixed for the hearing.

Mr. Lowder also read the affidavit of Edwin Manifold Janion, accountant of the Bank, and attorney for the petitioners, stating that the statements in the petition were true; and the affidavit of the Usher of the Court, George Kircher, that he had served a copy of the petition on the debtor in H.M.'s Gaol at Yokohama.

Mr. Lowder said but for the case of In re Lindsey ex parte Lindsey, he should have considered the affidavits put in as sufficient, but in view of the ruling in that case he should put in another affidavit proving the debt and the act of bankruptcy alleged.

The following affidavit of Mr. Janion was then read:—

I, Edwin Manifold Janion, British subject, Attorney for the Chartered Bank of India, Australia, and China, make oath and say as follows:—

1. Charles Emil Leopold, the debtor in these proceedings named, is justly and truly indebted to the Chartered Bank of India, Australia, and China, in the sum of yen 49,295.80 and interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum on the said sum from the 13th day of June, 1898, upon and by virtue of a judgment recovered by the Chartered Bank of India, Australia, and China against the said Charles Emil Leopold in this Court and dated the 13th day of June, 1898.

2. The paper writing marked A now produced and shown to me is an office copy of the said judgment, which still remains in full force, unreversed and unsatisfied.

3. And I, speaking positively for myself and to the best of my knowledge and belief as to other persons, say that I have not, nor hath nor have any other person or persons by the order or to the use of the Chartered Bank of India, Australia, and China, received any security or satisfaction whatsoever for the said sum of yen 49,295.80 and interest, or any part thereof respectively, save and except the said judgment.

4. On the 17th day of January, 1899, I, as attorney for the Chartered Bank of India, Australia, and China, filed in this Court a petition in bankruptcy, praying that a receiving order might be made in respect of the estate of Charles Emil Leopold. The several statements in the said petition are within my knowledge true, and the said Charles Emil Leopold has been duly served with a copy of the said petition.

5. The said Charles Emil Leopold, within three months before the date of the said petition, committed the following act of bankruptcy, that is to say, the Chartered Bank of India, Ausralia, and China, having on the 13th day of June, 1898, obtained a final judgment against him for yen 49,295 80, and execution thereon not having been stayed, served on him by leave of the Court a bankruptcy notice under the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, requiring him to pay the judgment debt in accordance with the terms of the judgment, or to secure or compound for it to the satisfaction of the said Bank or the Court, and he did not nor hath, within the time limited by the order giving leave to effect service of the said notice, either complied with the requirements of the notice or satisfied the Court that he has a counter claim, set-off, or cross-demand which equals or exceeds the amount of the judgment debt, and which he could not set up in the action in which the judgment was obtained.

His Honour said under the special circumstances he thought Mr. Lowder should tender the witness for cross-examination if necessary.

The witness was accordingly tendered for cross-examination on his affidavit, but Mr. Terry said he did not propose to ask any questions either of him or as to the service of a copy of the petition on the debtor.

His Honour pointed out that there was a discrepancy in the matter of security mentioned in the petition. The full judgment was 49,000 yen and the amount of 30,000 yen was mentioned in the petition as the security. It seemed to him that in order that the petitioner could obtain the proportion of what was due he must prove for the whole sum.

Mr. Lowder pointed out the judgment itself was mentioned as the security and it was valued at 30,000 yen.

His Honour questioned whether that was sufficiently explained without the verbal explanation of counsel—whether it was made clear by the affidavit itself.

Mr. Lowder said he was of course subject to his Honour's correction, but he had given the matter some thought, and he believed that was the proper way of presenting it. He believed the judgment could be regarded as a security. It would not in any case make any difference as to making the receiving order, and at the proper time he thought he should be able to satisfy his Honour on the point.

A lengthy legal discussion of the matter followed between Mr. Lowder and His Honour, and eventually the latter said that his difficulty was with regard to the notification of the security; he was anxious to remove an apparent discrepancy. Was Mr. Terry satisfied with the statement that the security referred to in the affidavit was the judgment?

Mr. Terry—I understand Mr. Lowder's explanation. I don't know that it concerns me at present.

Mr. Lowder—All we have to prove is that we have a debt of over £50.

Eventually the Judge made the receiving order asked for, appointing Mr. C. D. Moss as receiver.

H.B.M.'S COURT FOR JAPAN.

Before His Honour Judge WILKINSON.
TUESDAY, JAN. 31st.

EBRAHMBHOY PABANEY V. THE CHINA FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY.

This was a claim for yen 11,244.55, with interest and costs, for indemnity in respect of a fire at Kobe in March last.

Mr. Litchfield appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. Lowder represented the defendant company, and Mr. Wallford watched the case on behalf of the China Traders' Insurance Company, Limited.

Mr. Litchfield, in opening the case, said the plaintiff's name was a firm name rather than an individual one, and the firm was represented by its local manager. This was a claim for compensation for loss occasioned by a fire which occurred at the Pier compound at Kobe on the night of March 2nd or the morning of March 3rd last. The fire was very extensive in its scope and caused heavy damage to the property then lying on the Pier, among which was some cotton which was consigned to the plaintiff and in respect to the loss of which this claim arose. Learned counsel then read the petition for the plaintiff, which set forth that the goods were insured with the defendant company, for 25,000 yen, but the defendants in their answer to the petition contended that they were not liable, but that if any persons were liable, it should be the China Traders' Insurance Company, or persons or companies other than the defendant.

Mr. Litchfield then put in the policies taken out by plaintiff with the defendant company and a number of other documents which were admitted. He then proceeded to submit that the statements made in the answer to the petition were demurrable, and even if true did not constitute a defence to the suit. They did not allege that there was any misrepresentation on the part of the plaintiff; there was no allegation of fraud; and there was nothing in the answer which went to prove the annulling of the contract, though it was attempted to add to the contract. The defendants sought to show that the policy they granted was one which should cover only such goods in the Pier Company's compound as were not covered by a marine policy having a clause of insurance against fire. He submitted that the evidence to be called by the defence to support that contention was inadmissible. That evidence consisted of a slip written by the plaintiff's agent which he (learned counsel) contended by previous rulings was inadmissible as evidence. Taken at the best their allegation came to this—that the plaintiff told them that he only wanted a policy of limited scope, and that they thereupon gave him a policy of full scope extending over all goods of his own or held in trust by him—which they now sought to limit or explain.

His Honour asked Mr. Lowder whether it would be convenient to him to argue that point now.

Mr. Lowder—It would be very inconvenient. His Honour said the matter would stand thus. If the point were decided against Mr. Lowder he would be prevented from tendering the evidence; if decided in his favour he could tender it. Supposing this case should go to appeal, which was probable, it would perhaps be better that the evidence should be introduced before objection was taken.

Mr. Lowder said he did not intend to ask quite so much latitude as that, but he thought the objection could be taken at the point when he was about to introduce the evidence, and he would then argue it.

Mr. Litchfield proceeded to deal with other points in the defendants' answer to the petition.

After the adjournment foriffin Rihantulla Verseybhoy was called, and sworn on the Koran. Witness said he could not speak English well, and was afraid there might be some mistake.

Mr. Lowder said he understood the witness spoke English very well, and it was decided that an attempt should be made to take his evidence without the aid of a medium.

Witness said he was a British subject, and was a resident at Kobe, where his position was that of a merchant. He traded in the name of Ebrahmbhoj Pabanej, which was the name of the firm. He was manager of the firm, but not a partner. He held a power of attorney for the firm. In Sept., 1897, he applied to the agents of the China Fire Insurance Company for a policy of insurance, which he received. The document produced was the policy. In February, 1898, he applied to the agents to change the policy. The application (produced) was made in writing. He afterwards received the policy back from the agents with an endorsement on it.

Mr. Litchfield read the endorsement as follows: "It is hereby declared and agreed that the within policy is transferred to cover a similar risk contained in the Pier Company's compound in Kobe to the extent of 25,000 yen only."

Witness, explaining the reason for changing the policy, said he wanted to do because the firm's goods which were coming by the steamers and remaining on the wharf were not covered by any clause in the marine policy. Shipments from Bombay were advised to witness by letter. They were accompanied by invoices. Witness knew that his principals in Bombay had taken out policies of insurance for consignments of cargo that reached him in February. The goods were insured in the China Traders' Company. The policies remained in the hands of the Bank. The cotton arrived in Kobe the 25th or 26th of February. Five hundred bales arrived by the Maria Valeria and 500 by the Idzumi Maru. Out of the former 144 the got 420 bales in sound condition, 24 were damaged by fire, and 49 were destroyed by fire. Out of the 500 by the Idzumi Maru 169 were received in sound condition, and 331 were destroyed by fire. The fire occurred on the morning of March 3rd. It was a very big fire. About 9,000 bales were destroyed altogether. Witness went to see the fire himself. It continued about three days. The Insurance Company through their representative, inquired whether witness had any claim. He saw the representative on the 3rd or 4th March. It was a Mr. Teverson. Witness told him that the goods were insured in the China Traders' Insurance Company, but that he had not received any marine policies, so that he could not say positively whether the China Fire Company were liable or not. Witness afterwards got some marine policies.

After looking at them he wrote to the China Fire agents. He pointed out in the letter that by the marine policies the goods were covered up to 10 days after landing in Kobe unless already covered by a fire policy, and he pointed out that the China Fire Insurance Company were thus liable under their policy. Witness received a reply from the company (produced). It read as follows:—

We are in receipt of your favour, to which we are to reply that as you have not yet taken delivery of cargo ex steamer Maria Valeria and steamer Idzumi Maru we cannot entertain your claim for loss or damage under the policy. Moreover, the above policy was transferred to cover a risk not already covered by marine insurance, as we understood that you held and do still hold such policy and that was the reason you wished us to make the transfer.

P.S.—Please point out the above to the agents of the China Traders' Insurance Company Limited, as it is important.

Witness had an interview on the 5th March with the agent, Mr. Edwards. He pointed out that he had some bags of saffron flour which had been injured, and which were insured in the North China Insurance Company, whose policy contained no fire clause with regard to wharfage. The agent said he would pay for the saffron flour, but the company was not liable for the cotton. Witness, however, thinking that they were liable for both, declined to collect for the saffron flour alone. The saffron flour was stored in the Pier Company's compound as was also the cotton landed from the Maria Valeria and the Idzumi Maru. There were only 24 bales salvaged, and they were sold by auction. On April 26th, witness wrote to the China Fire Insurance Company's agents sending in a formal claim. The total claim was 24,700 yen. On April 28th, witness wrote the agents enclosing duplicates of several insurance policies.

At this point the Court adjourned till 10.30 this morning.

WEDNESDAY, February 1st.

Counsel in this case, which is a claim by a firm of Indian merchants at Kobe for yen 11,244.35, compensation for loss by fire, had a consultation before the Court assembled, and on the Judge taking his seat Mr. Litchfield, for plaintiff, rose and said:—Under the circumstances of an order made by your Honour in chambers by consent—

Mr. Lowder here rose and made a negative sign to Mr. Litchfield.

Mr. Litchfield—You make the application.

Mr. Lowder—After a consultation of counsel we have to ask your Honour to adjourn the further hearing of the case until ten o'clock to-morrow morning.

His Honour—Very well; I agree. Adjourned till ten o'clock to-morrow.

THURSDAY, February 2nd.

The case of Ebrahmbhoj Pabanej v. The China Fire Insurance Company was down for hearing at ten o'clock, but counsel asked for leave to continue their consultation, and remained in Chambers till shortly before noon. His Honour then took his seat, and Mr. Lowder rose to make the following application:—May it please your Honour, it has been agreed upon by all the counsel before you that it is advisable that the China Traders' Insurance Company should be joined as a party in this case. To accomplish that object we have agreed upon an order which we will ask you to make. It is in these words:—

Upon the application of Mr. Lowder, the counsel for the China Fire Insurance Company, Limited, and with the consent of Mr. Wallford counsel for the China Traders' Insurance Company Limited, and of Mr. Litchfield, counsel for the plaintiff, it is ordered that the China Traders' Insurance Company, Limited, be added as defendants for the determination of the question as to whether the China Traders' Insurance Company, Limited, should be liable for the payment of the sum claimed in the petition or of any and what part thereof, and further that all amendments necessary for this purpose be deemed to have been made before the beginning of the hearing and that the hearing continue without further pleadings and that all necessary orders may be made as if the China Traders' Insurance Company Limited had been joined as defendants from the institution of the suit.

Mr. Wallford—I consent to that.

Mr. Litchfield—And I, my lord.

The Judge—I make the order, then, in the terms of the application.

Mr. Lowder—Following that it will also suit the convenience of counsel, if it suits your Honour's convenience, that the hearing should be adjourned till the 14th of this month at 10 o'clock.

His Honour—I make an order to that effect.

A FIRM AND ITS BANTO.

The trial of Nacumo Kinjiru, aged 37, formerly in the employ of Messrs. Berrick Bros., No. 75, Settlement, Yokohama, commenced on Wednesday afternoon before Judge Ketsu-ura and Judges Ichikawa and Mori.

Accused, who pleaded not guilty, acknowledged to having been sentenced previously to three years' imprisonment with hard labour. He was employed by Messrs. Berrick as head banto at a salary of 150 yen a month, but resigned the position in August to join a new company. On the 13th September he sent out a number of letters to clients of Berrick Brothers, informing them that Berrick's business had been transferred to the Toyo Kaisha, and that all orders might be placed in the hands of the new company. The accused contended that this was done by consent of Berrick Bros' representative. Accused had made a verbal, though not a written, agreement with Mr. Rice, of Berrick Bros., to establish a separate company. The establishment of a company was in the interests of both parties, as the firm of Berrick Bros. was in straitened financial circumstances, as both the Hongkong and Shanghai Bank and the Specie Bank had refused to issue any letter of credit on behalf of the firm.

The Judge—It appears in the affidavit that Mr. Rice denies the fact stated by you that the despatch of letters to different clients saying that the transfer of business to the Toyo Kaisha, was done with his consent, had been duly authorized. Was it not so?

Accused—On the 2nd and the 7th July Mr. Rice wrote letters to a customer to the effect that all orders hitherto given to Berrick Bros. should be transferred hereafter to the Toyo Kaisha, as the business referred to had been entirely transferred to the hands of the new company. The letter dated on July 2nd was written by Mr. Rice himself and the second letter dated July 7th, was written by me and signed by Mr. Rice (letter produced). The terms were that the Company should receive one per cent. of the value of the goods ordered from Berrick Bros. when the orders were collected by the Company, to be placed in the letter of credit issued by the Specie Bank in favour of the Company. The rate of commission, however, was afterwards altered to 2 per cent., the agreement, so far as commission was concerned, being concluded with Mr. Rice and approved by Mr. Berrick. It was about May 26th.

The Judge—Are you unable to state any reason which induced Berrick Bros. to charge you with the offence of forging the firm's name and stamps?

Accused—From the month of February to May, orders were obtained by me to the amount of yen 1,000,000, nearly all of which were afterwards cancelled by the firm without giving notice to me. On August 31st I asked for the payment of the commission due to me, but was refused by the firm, as all the orders collected by me were cancelled. I did not receive my salary even at that time. Some other reasons were also furnished by the accused.

In further answer to the Judge, the accused deposed that he paid yen 3,000 in cash in Berrick Bros. on Oct. 16th when a compromise was made between the parties.

The accused asked that a number of witnesses should be called and documents examined, and his request being granted, the Court adjourned for a fortnight.

THE REBELLIONS IN HUPK AND ANHUI.

The N.-C. Daily News translates the following telegrams from Chinese sources, some of which are official:—

Colonel Wu and Prefect Chu, the military and civil Commandants, respectively, of the Viceroy Chang's disciplined K'ai regiment (800 men), operating against the Hupai rebels in Changlo district, report that they captured the second of the fortified villages near Changlo on the 24th instant, and then, closely pursuing the fleeing rebels, followed them pell-mell into the city itself, which they subsequently captured after some fierce street fighting. The Changlo magistrate Chou, who had not been murdered as at first reported, was rescued from prison and was accordingly replaced in office pending instructions from Viceroy Chang in the matter. A large body of rebels are still collected on the Hunan-Hupai border near Changlo, which must be dispersed before that portion of Hupai can be pacified. In the fighting before the two fortified villages, following with their capture the recapture of Changlo, the quick-firers and magazine rifles of the K'ai regiment simply swept the rebels away wherever there was the least indication of their presence. By this means nearly 700 rebels lost their lives. The backbone of the Hupai rebellion is now considered at Wuchang to be crushed and that before long peace will be restored, owing to the death of the three principal rebel chiefs, who were killed while fighting the K'ai regiment on the 21st, 23rd, and 24th inst.

Nanking (capital of Anhui) telegrams reporting the rebellion in that province state that on the 22nd instant General Lin, commanding a body of 600 cavalry and a battery of six mountain quick-firing guns, had a desperate fight with a strong body of rebels who held a fortified village called Changchiang, near Shuchou. The battery having occupied without opposition an elevated position commanding the village, one half of the cavalry was dismounted, while the other half was sent round to the rear of the village, hidden from the eyes of the enemy by high dunes, in order to cut the latter down as soon as they should begin to evacuate the village. As soon as everything was ready, not a shot being to the meanwhile fired in answer to the pattering volleys of the rebels which fell much too short, the signal was given, and a storm of shells began falling into the doomed village, exploding right and left and setting fire to not a few houses. The rebels, who had never seen the like of this before, however, stood bravely to the defences awaiting the advance of the dismounted troopers who were to scale the mud ramparts of the village. But soon the fire became too hot for the rebels, and they had to run. The fire of the battery was then slackened in order to enable the troops to mount. The rebels, perceiving this, again rushed to the ramparts to meet the soldiers and a fierce fight ensued, the rebels being finally driven out of the village only to fall victims to the horsemen on the outside. No fewer than 500 fighting men, women, and children, killed by the bursting of the shells inside the houses, lost their lives in that fight, including one of the rebel chiefs named Liu Tsun-yuan. Only some 250 men and their families were left in the village to surrender to General Lin; but it is stated that two other leaders with 80 men succeeded in cutting their way through the cavalry lines lying in wait for them. Several hundred head of cattle and a quantity of grain were captured in this village. Everywhere the troops met the rebels, the latter fought most bravely and recklessly and gave way only owing to the great superiority of the arms of the former.

The Universal Gazette publishes also the following:—A Tsingkiangpo telegram of the 29th instant reports the capture of the Hunan rebel chief Hui Ming-yen with ten of his men by the cavalry troops of General Chen of Hui hou. It is further stated that between 3,000 and 4,000 rebels have been killed in the several battles in the vicinity of Kuyang, while numbers have fled into that city. Hence it is anticipated that with the capture of Kuyang the rebellion in that part of the country will be easily crushed. A mounted courier from Shuchou came into Tsingkiangpo this noon (19th) reporting the alarming news that Shuchou was in great danger owing to the capture by the rebels of an important market town near that city named Shuchikou. This last-named is just on the Anhui-Kiangsu borders, and by this means the rebels will be able to attack Tsingkiangpo itself if they are not driven northwards. So far Kuyang and Miao-cheng, two district cities—and about seventy-five walled villages are held by the rebels. Shuchou is on the point of being besieged and Kauchou is on the point of capture by the rebels. The rebels seem to be rising everywhere in North Anhui. A man of the Chou Clan of the large market town of Shuangkaucha, near Shuchou, has also risen, and with 3,000 followers is about to attack the latter, which is a district city of some importance but utterly unprepared to resist the rebels.

Following the above telegrams is one from Nanking to a local mandarin privately stating that there are grave charges against the various Generals sent by the Viceroy of Nanking and the Governor of Anhui and Hunan to make a combined movement and crush the rebellion in Anhui, to the effect that there is no combination or cordiality at all amongst them, that each is waiting for the other to make the forward movement, and that owing to this dilatory action the rebels are gathering strength every day and will soon be too formidable to be attacked singly by either of the Generals sent against them. The want of a very high official to take supreme command is sincerely felt and Viceroy Lin may ask the Throne to send Governor Teng of Anhui to take the field in person.

Notes (abridged) by Emil Kameny, in The Ledger, Philadelphia.

(a) The position thus arrived at is similar to the King's Gambit Declined—Black's usual continuation is 6, B to K Kt 5, and if White answers P to K R 3 then B takes Kt and Kt to Q 5. White then sacrifices the exchange, but he obtains an attack which fully makes up for it.

(b) Necessary, to prevent White's Kt to Q 5 play. The move weakens the Q P.

(c) With the intention to continue Kt to R 5, which could not be played at once, on account of Black's Kt takes K P reply.

(d) He could not play P takes P nor P to K K 3 on account of Q takes K R P winning at once. The text move as well as the Q to Q sq play on previous turn were exceedingly strong for the defense.

(e) Much stronger than P takes P, which would have been answered by B to K Kt 5.

(f) Which enables Black to play Q takes P and the attack is neutralized. A quite promising play for White was Kt to K 5 ch, which, however, by correct defense would not have proved satisfactory.

(g) Which opens the diagonal for the adverse Q B and gives Black a powerful if not winning attack. White at this stage of the game had the inferior position.

(h) White's game at this point was pretty hopeless, for he could not guard against the powerful attack his opponent has established. He thus was quite justified in selecting this continuation, which, though unsound, gives some chances of escape.

(i) Brilliant and sound play, which virtually decides the game.

(k) He could not play R to Q 2, for R takes Kt P would have followed, Black winning easily.

(l) B-tter perhaps was B to B 4 in order to guard the Q P. Black then might have continued R(Kt 7) to Kt 3 and R to R 3.

(m) He could not play R takes R, for Q takes P ch and Q takes R would have given White a winning game.

(n) He had no better play. Q to K 5 ch would have been answered by P to B 3, while R to R 6 could not be played on account of B to Kt 8 mate.

(o) Forces exchange of Rooks or wins the Q B P.

Game No 475.

The New York Sun prints the following letter under the caption: "Plagiarism or Fraud Extraordinary in Chess?"

Sir,—Allow me to draw the attention of the readers of the Sun to the following extraordinary occurrence: About four or five years ago La Monda Illustra of Paris arranged an international chess tournament, in which all the games had to be contested by correspondence. The players were divided in sections, and Janowski, at that time not very well-known in European chess circles, was pitted against a certain Hungarian amateur of the name of Meyer of Temesvar. Their game happened to turn out such a gem of brilliancy that all the leading European chess periodicals reprinted the game from La Monda Illustra, in which the game at first appeared. Wochenachsch, La Nouvelle Revue, Dagbl Schach, La Strategie and other publications were among the number printing the game, with copious notes and diagrams. In its issue of November 29th of this year, Wochenachsch prints the game again, stating that it was recently played at the City of London Chess Club between H. H. Cole and W. Ward. Here are the moves:

White—H. H. Cole. Black—W. Ward.
WHITE. BLACK. WHITE. BLACK.
1 P K4 P K4 9 Kt QB3 Kt K-q
2 Kt KB3 Kt QB3 10 P QKt3 P QB3

6 KtP Kt Kt 14 BxRP ch Kx B
7 R x Kt ch B K2 15 R x RP ch K Kt3
8 B Q3 Castles 16 Kt B4 Mate.

To make a long story short, it is sufficient to say that this game, with all its moves, from beginning to end, is the game contested between Janowski and Meyer four or five years ago, and that Janowski detected the Cole Ward game in Wochenachsch when looking through that paper at the Manhattan Chess Club the other day.

Cole is a well-known London amateur of the first class. Ward is also known as a player of strength and good repute. It is difficult to explain it. Either Cole arranged with Ward to play the game with him, in which case Ward deliberately submitted to defeat in order to enhance his friend's reputation, or each played from unconscious memory. In the latter case it will prove to be an instance of plagiarism of that sort which casts all previous well-known cases utterly in the shade.

NOTES.

The Brooklyn Chess Club has adopted a new plan by which the team for the next cable chess match with Great Britain may be selected. A circular has been prepared and addressed to the leading chessplayers and all persons who have taken a prominent position in the game in the United States, requesting them to name the strongest ten players, in their opinion, in the country. This ballot will be carefully examined by the officers of the club.

Janowski gave a simultaneous exhibition of play at the Cosmopolitan Chess Club on 31st December, and in two hours and eleven minutes finished eighteen games, winning sixteen and losing two. This is a record performance.

The following from the Nashville Star is of special interest:—

"The betterment of Chess-notation is a matter of frequent comment in these days. It is admitted that the Germanic naming of the squares is superior to ours. With us each square has two designations, with them but one. Thus, White's Q R square is A 1 in the German code, in the English it is for White Q R square and for Black is Q R8 losing in distinctiveness and also the number of letters used. On the other hand, our notation of the moves is a little simpler than theirs, as, for instance, our move P—K4 is recorded by them E 2—E 4. When we have to note moves on the King's or Queen's wing, we save nothing; thus our move, P—Q R 4, is marked by them A 2—A 4.

"A blending of the two would produce a perfect system. A German and American, residents of this city, on coming together and having a few informal games, agreed to a more formal match. But there a difficulty occurred. The German didn't know the English method and the American didn't know the German, so they agreed on a new code based on each. The German plan of naming White's first row after the first eight letters and the other squares by figures, and the English method of naming the piece moved, was adopted. Thus P—K4 in the English and E 2—E 4 in the German code became P—E 4, and P—Q R 4 in English and A 2—A 4 in German became P—A 4. The simplest notation ever used in English is Lowenthal's edition of Morphy's game. Besides other forms, he dropped the dash between the letters, which if misplaced, as it often is by the compositor, will stop any but an experienced player." This notation is the one used by the Japan Mail.

END GAME.

By W. B. Mason, Tokyo.

We gave the Diagram in a previous issue. This is how White draws:—

WHITE. BLACK.
1—P to B4 1—B takes P.
2—R to K R 7 ch!

If K takes R, stalemate immediately follows; if K moves, White continues, R to Kt 7 ch; and similarly stalemate whether the R is taken by K or R. Should Black decline to capture the proffered Rook, White draws by perpetual check. A pretty and instructive variation arises from Black playing: 1—B to Q3, when the play proceeds as follows:—

2—P takes R 1—R to Q3
3—P takes P. 2—B takes R.
3—B takes P.

and White can draw even after the loss of his pawn at R3, Black being unable to dislodge the K from R 2 in order to Queen his pawn. The other variations require lengthier play, but White should draw in every case.

YOKOHAMA: SATURDAY, JAN. 28TH, 1899.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

With this number of the Japan Weekly Mail is issued the index for Vol. XXX.—July to December, 1898.

OVER 500 emigrants left Yokohama for Honolulu by the steamer America Maru.

HIS MAJESTY THE EMPEROR on the 25th sent a gift of money to the family of the late Count Kato.

THE Official Receiver in Bankruptcy reports Mr. Hoolay to be guilty of fraud and misconduct.

PRINCE LI CHUNG YAN, of Korea, who has been in England, returned to Yokohama on the 20th by the steamer Hitachi Maru and put up at the Nishimura hotel, Bentendōri.

A FIRE which broke out in Shimbashi station yard on Wednesday did damage to the extent of 4,000 yen.

THE trial trip of the steamer Hongkong Maru took place on the 20th off Kisarazu. Her speed was 17.25 knots.

A HEAVY fall of snow occurred in Yokohama on Tuesday night; the weather has since been bright and clear.

THE birthday of Kaiser Wilhelm II. was festively observed by the German community of Yokohama on Friday.

THE Yokohama Dock Yard Association held a general meeting on the 20th, and declared a dividend of 10 per cent. per annum.

TWO postmen belonging to the Hongo Post Office, Tokyo, were arrested on the 21st on a charge of stealing letters and newspapers.

THE Osaka traders have organized a guild in opposition to the Chinese traders in the City, whose business morality is complained of.

IT has been decided to build a detached palace at Nikko, for the summer residence of the Crown Prince. It will cost about yen 80,000.

IT is said that Lord Charles Beresford's fee from the Associated British Chambers of Commerce was £1,000, exclusive of all travelling expenses.

A WOMAN named Asami Ishi (40), living at Agano, Chichibu, Saitama Prefecture, has been arrested on a charge of murdering her child.

THE amalgamation of the Nara, Osaka, and Kansai Railway Companies is almost settled. The Imari Railway Company has wound up its affairs.

THE sittings of the Diet are marked by much placidity at present, all Government measures being adopted or revised by the various Committees.

WORK on the proposed electric railway between Koza and Oiso will commence within a few days. It will join with the Odawara electric railway.

ON the 21st instant, a Saiki named Kuroda Heikyu was arrested in Yokohama and sent to jail on a charge of threatening voters in the Municipal election.

AN aeronaut named Kajihara Kichijiro (34) fell from a balloon on the 21st at Muko Yanagihara in Tokyo. He was killed instantly, his skull being fractured.

THE Temps says the Sudan convention will entail the protectorate of Egypt; and counsels France not to quarrel over the inevitable, but to seek compensation.

THE decision of the Court of Cassation on the Dreyfus Case is expected shortly. The newspapers state it will report that the proofs of Dreyfus' guilt are insufficient.

AT the annual meeting of the Yokohama Amateur Rowing Club, Mr. H. C. Litchfield was re-elected President, Mr. F. J. Hall, Captain; and Mr. Levedag was made Secretary in place of Mr. Schellenberg, who is going home.

THE convention signed by Lord Cromer and Suttos Pasha, defines the limits of the Sudan; includes Wady Halfa and Suakin in an administration which is distinct from that of Egypt; excludes the Sudan from the jurisdiction of the mixed tribunals; and provides for the supreme power being vested in the Governor-General, to be appointed by the Khedive with the consent of Great Britain.

PRINCE TOKUGAWA KEIKI and others are stated to be contemplating the erection of a bronze statue of the late Count Kato in Ueno park, Tokyo, by the side of Saigo Takamori's statue.

THE application of Mr. Fukui Naokichi and others for permission to construct an electric railway at Enoshima was granted on the 23rd inst. The railway will probably be extended to Fujisawa Railway Station.

AN engagement is announced between the grand-daughter of Count Hijikata, ex-Minister of the Imperial Household, and Mr. Tanaka Ginnosuke, younger brother of Mr. Tanaka Heihachi, a wealthy merchant of Yokohama.

THE Mitani firm contemplate building a large Dock-yard in Kyushu. It is announced that the cost will be about yen 30,000,000, and a part of the capital will have to be supplied from abroad, and Government aid will probably be solicited.

ACCORDING to the report of the Financial Department, the exports during December amounted to yen 19,037,597.35, and the imports to yen 26,034,371.75. The export of bullion amounted to yen 1,458,422.99 and the imports to yen 1,373,899.82.

MR. W. F. MITCHELL, Chairman of the British dinner to Lord Charles Beresford, emphasized the fact that the British community were as anxious as the Japanese Government to smooth the way for the easy working of the new treaties.

IN consequence of the dispute over the Kingdom of Samoa, wherein the German Consul opposes the candidate proposed by Great Britain and America, three British warships from Australia and one American, from California, have been ordered to Samoa.

ON the 23rd inst. the Osaka Chamber of Commerce decided to make representations to the Government for the establishment of a bank to assist trade between Japan and China, and also for the abandonment of the proposed tax on dwelling houses. They elected a committee to push these objects. On the 24th the Nagoya Chamber of Commerce decided to resist the proposed tax on houses.

COUNT MURAVIEFF, Russian Minister for Foreign Affairs, in a circular to the European Cabinets, states that although the horizon has been somewhat overclouded since his first communication, the convocation of a peace congress is still advisable. The proposals include the prohibition of submarine torpedo boats, of new and more powerful weapons or explosives or other new warlike inventions and also of ships with prohibited arms. The Times regards the scheme as visionary and impracticable.

LORD CHARLES BERESFORD was entertained in Tokyo last week by Mr. Okuma and by the Oriental Society; and was received in audience by the Emperor. On Monday he was the guest of the British residents of Yokohama, speaking at a dinner given at the Oriental Hotel. On Tuesday he went down to Yokohama on the cruiser Takaraka Maru, specially sent to convey him. On Wednesday he was entertained by Mr. Otani Kahei, Chairman of the Japanese Chamber of Commerce at Yokohama, at a farewell breakfast, and he left for America at noon.

THE PEACE CONFERENCE.

The world seems to have made up its mind pretty conclusively as to the Czar's proposals for a Peace Conference. According to the best intelligence obtainable, the attitude of the Western Powers towards the scheme may be described as one of either ridicule or reticence. Mr. W. T. Stead's intrusion upon the scene does not tend to increase its air of reality. Mr. Stead, however, has been the first to present to the public a succinct statement of the Czar's proposals. It is true that nothing coming from the author of "Modern Babylon" can be implicitly credited, for though no one doubts Mr. Stead's honesty of purpose, every one has learned to regard him as a man whose emotions are apt to take charge of his judgment. Still, when reporting the facts of an interview with the Czar, he may probably be trusted to speak accurately, and these are the proposals which he professes to have been told by the Emperor himself:—(1) That there should be declared a truce of God for five years; (2) that during that period the Governments should not increase their expenditure on armaments beyond the figure stated by them at the conference as the maximum of their needs; (3) that some international agreement should, if disputes arise between the signatories of this pact, bind them always to invite the mediation of neutral powers before appealing to the sword. "Now nothing in the world is easier than to read sinister or self-seeking motives into all the acts and sayings of others, and nothing in the world is commoner. The more despicable a man's instincts, the more disposed is he to suspect others of evil purposes and contemptible designs. It is not surprising, therefore, that many critics should have professed to see in the Russian Sovereign's project nothing but a subtle scheme to gain breathing time for Russia until she can put her finances in order and consolidate the huge additions that she has recently made to her empire. But no one has any right to impugn His Majesty's motives. We ourselves believe him to be perfectly sincere in his desire to find some means of lightening the cruel burden under which the nations of Europe are labouring to-day. That would certainly be a greater triumph for him in the eyes of historians than any victory he could win in war. But we have to consider His Majesty's proposals by the light of the interests they affect, and it must be confessed that to people in the Far East the project of "a five years' truce of God" bears a peculiar aspect just at present. For a peace lasting five years is precisely what Russia wants to consolidate herself in Manchuria. She has planted her foot there, and if she could be assured of five years' undisturbed possession, she might thereafter defy the world to put her out. We do not suggest that any such consideration influenced the Czar when he conceived the plan of a Peace Conference, but we do say that the position which Russia has just taken in China makes a coincidence most unfortunate for the credit which His Majesty seeks to gain for his project. On the whole, however, there is not much occasion to discuss the question. It will never enter the sphere of practical politics, and all that the Czar will gain is the honour of having made a noble effort in the cause of humanity.

LORD CHARLES BERESFORD AND HIS ENTERTAINERS.

The Chairman of the Yokohama General Chamber of Commerce, Mr. R. D. Robison, gives in our correspondence columns, a timely explanation of the arrangement made for welcoming Lord Charles Beresford. His lordship's wishes were not definitely known in Yokohama until Thursday morning. Long before that time, the management of the affair had passed out of the hands of the General Chamber of Commerce, and the British residents having decided, at a meeting held on the preceding Monday, that the welcome should take the form of a dinner, it was found that no time remained for a change of programme, since such a step must have received the preliminary approval of another meeting which could not have been held before Friday evening at soonest. There can be no doubt that the British residents would most gladly have sought the co-operation of other nationalities had the idea of a reception only been originally entertained, but from the moment when a dinner was decided upon, an inevitable limit imposed itself, there being no hall in the Settlement large enough, or even approximately large enough, to accommodate a dinner party including all nationalities. It is a pity that the objects which Lord Charles has in view could not have been better served, and it would be doubly a pity if any impression were created that a sentiment of exclusiveness animated the British residents. With reference to the complaint that a French hotel was preferred to an Anglo-Saxon, we understand that there was no opportunity for choice. The Grand Hotel, however excellent its cuisine, does not offer sufficient accommodation for a dinner party of the size contemplated, and to overcome that difficulty it would have been necessary to resort to very inconvenient expedients, whereas the new salons of the Oriental Hotel lend themselves excellently to such a purpose.

A paragraph appears in the Japan Herald charging us with "dishonestly changing the direction of the letter" from the Chairman of the Yokohama Chamber of Commerce, published in our issue of the 24th instant, "in order to make it appear that the letter was addressed to ourselves," whereas in reality it was merely a copy of a letter addressed to the Japan Herald. The charge is entirely baseless.

DEFICIENCY OF REVENUE.

The Government has submitted two Bills to the House of Representatives providing for a part of the deficiency of revenue caused by the latter's reduction of the proposed rate of the Land Tax. One is a Bill for imposing a house tax; the other a Bill for increasing the tax on soy, and the estimated proceeds are 2,860,000 yen and 1,500,000 yen, respectively, making a total of 4,360,000 yen. It is stated that the remaining deficiency will be made up by augmenting the rates of postage, and that the revenue thus obtained will be 1,900,000 yen. At present the postal charges for letters are 2 sen for 2 momme, and 2 sen for every additional 2 momme; 1 sen for post cards and 5 rin for newspapers up to 16 momme. The minimum charge for letters under the new scale will be 3 sen, which will carry a letter up to 4 momme, and 3 sen must be added for every additional 4 momme. Post cards will be 1½ sen, but the newspaper rate will be cheapened to 5 rin for 20 momme. All this, it must be noted, is only rumour. Another statement is that the railway and telegraph rates will be raised so as to produce an increased revenue of 1,800,000 yen and 300,000 yen, respectively, which, however, will be used not for general purposes, but for developing the two services. The present cost of telegrams is 15 sen for the first 10 characters, and no charge is made for the names and addresses of the sender and recipient. The new rate will be 10 sen for 5 characters, the name and address of the recipient being free, but the name and address of the sender being charged for if it exceeds 5 characters.

AN INVENTOR.

Another inventor is claimed by Japan in the military field. We have heard of Mr. Shimose's smokeless powder and Colonel Arisaka's quick-firing field piece, and we now hear of a new kind of pontoon bridge, devised by Captain Suwa Chikayoshi of the Imperial Artillery. It is claimed that the bridge can be thrown across a river at the rate of 240 yards in less than two hours, which is certainly a remarkable feat. We gather that the excellence of the system has been recognised for some years, and that it was practically proved in the war of 1894-5, though few opportunities of testing it on a considerable scale offered during that campaign. The matter seems to have been brought to public notice at the present juncture by a formal act of recognition on the part of the Fortification Bureau, which has forwarded to Captain Suwa a letter of thanks and a present of 300 yen.

PROPOSED INCREASE OF TELEGRAPH RATES.

In Japan the minimum charge for a domestic telegram is 15 sen, the message not exceeding ten Kana syllables plus the addressee. In England 12 words can be sent across the wire for 24.6 sen; in Germany, 15 words for 23½ sen; in France, 10 words for 20 sen; and in Italy, 15 words for 20 sen. It is not easy to make an exact comparison between the charges in European countries and those in Japan, as words are the units in one case and syllables the units in the other. Some estimates assign five Kana syllables as the equivalent for one English word, but that seems to us an extravagant calculation. A Japanese is careful to use the shortest possible combinations of syllables in telegraphing, and it is probable that the words in his messages do not average more than four Kana syllables, if as much. On that hypothesis twelve English words would represent 48 Kana syllables, for which the charge would be 45 sen at least, or nearly double the English rate, and much more than double the German or the Italian. Yet there is talk now of increasing the Japanese rates. To be sure, the additional revenue thus obtained would be devoted to improving the service, but the Fiji Shimpō appears to have full warrant for its criticism that no margin offers for raising the rates, and that their reduction should, on the contrary, be considered.

JAPAN'S EXPORT OF SILK.

An expert whose opinion is of the highest value takes exception to the view recently expressed in these columns with regard to the export trade in Japanese silk. We stated our opinion that, in consequence of the establishment of filatures in China, the silk of that country is likely to supply a large part of the demand which would otherwise have turned to Japan, and that the market for the latter's product will thus become comparatively limited. Our critic admits that our forecast would probably be correct if the Chinese understood how to work their filatures, and if they made a really intelligent and resolute effort to improve the quality of their silk. But they have neither understanding nor earnest purpose. The filatures within reach of foreign supervision from Shanghai may turn out an article superior to Japanese silk, but the produce from the provinces will probably continue to show the old defects, and there is consequently no apparent reason why the export of the Japanese staple should not reach a hundred million yen annually. As to the idea that Japan will by-and-by work up her silk instead of exporting it in the raw state, our informant thinks that many a year must elapse before anything of the kind occurs. In the very light classes of silk fabrics where manual labour counts for much, Japan has a great advantage, which has already asserted itself in the rapid growth of her export of habutai; but with regard to heavier grades of fabrics the case is different. There the English and French manufacturers have developed processes of which the Japanese are still ignorant, or which they are still unqualified to practise, and it is consequently possible at present to export the raw material, work it up into satins, velvets, and so forth in Europe, re-export the fabrics thence to Japan, and sell them in this country at cheaper prices than those charged for the inferior satins and velvets made in Japan from the same silk. It is not easy to believe, however, that the clever, nimble-fingered Japanese will experience any insuperable difficulty in acquiring technical processes which are calculated to increase their profits and improve their industrial status. Possibly the first step in the new movement will be the establishment of factories under foreign direction in Japan. It is easy to conceive some American capitalist, for example, setting up the necessary machinery in Kyoto where cheap labour waits to be employed and where the raw material can be had at the door. The Japanese may be said to owe their present export trade in raw silk mainly to foreigners—a trade which puts about 50 million yen annually into their pockets. The Government's wise and far-seeing policy in establishing a filature at Tomioka and converting it into a training school, where silk-growers from various districts received practical instruction from French and Italian industrialists—that policy did much to improve the quality of the country's product and has been the means of adding immensely to the nation's wealth. There is still great room for improvement, and we discover little hope that the necessary progress will be made until fresh recourse to foreign assistance establishes the standard which the Japanese lack in this field, as in so many others. Possibly the opening of the country next July may induce foreign experts to engage in this enterprise also. If so, there would be little occasion to regard Chinese competition with serious apprehension. Foreign coöperation is, indeed, Japan's great desideratum, but unfortunately her mood is to be prematurely self-sufficing.

THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The conduct of the House of Representatives at present is in striking contrast with its behaviour in any previous session. The Opposition seems to have abandoned the field altogether. There are virtually no debates. A monotonous unanimity is the attitude of the members towards every measure proposed by the Government. One or two Bills have been passed despite the condemnation of the Government Delegate, but they were measures of trifling importance. None of the lively scenes of former days is repeated. There is no badgering of the Government Delegate; no attempt to compel the attendance of Ministers of State; no presentation of frivolous questions for the sake of the opportunity they afford to make violent anti-Cabinet speeches. Docility and discipline are the order of the day. The Special Committees examine, with apparent diligence, the Government Bills entrusted to them and amend them more or less, but never present hostile reports. The majority in the House accepts the Committees' recommendations approvingly and endorses them without fail. In the session on the 25th instant a member seemed to awake suddenly from the general torpor of acquiescence. He rated the committee-men for want of originality, and called them mere slaves of officialdom. But the speech elicited no rejoinder or protest. The House was evidently quite content with its own gentleness.

MR. OKURA'S PARTY TO LORD CHARLES BERESFORD.

Mr. Okura's dinner-party in honour of Lord Charles Beresford on the 19th instant was a very brilliant affair. Several Ministers of State, the Governor of Tokyo, many of the leading business men of the capital, some prominent bankers of Yokohama, the President of the Foreign Chamber of Commerce in Yokohama and Her Britannic Majesty's Consul at that port were among the guests. Dancing performances of various kinds, on quite a magnificent scale, took place after dinner, and the entertainment may fairly be called unique as an example of Japanese hospitality in its most refined sense. Lord Charles doubtless congratulated himself on being relieved from a task which, however great his aptitude for discharging it, must have become by this time somewhat irksome—the task of delivering a set oration. There were indeed some more or less formal deliverances. Thus Mr. Okura spoke a few words of welcome, to which Lord Charles replied, expressing his pleasure at meeting Mr. Okura, of whom he had heard much; Mr. Shibusawa also spoke briefly, saying how sorry he was that Lord Charles' stay could not be prolonged, but comforting himself with the reflection that since such a man could see and understand things in a shorter time than ordinary mortals, his visit would be practically much longer than it seemed arithmetically, and finally Mr. Bevis, of the Hongkong and Shanghai Bank, speaking on behalf of the Yokohama guests as well as of himself, thanked Mr. Okura for the delightful evening he had enabled them to spend. But there was nothing that could be called a set speech. It must be confessed that Mr. Okura does a great deal towards bringing foreigners and Japanese together. It is not given to every man to be a millionaire, nor is it given to every man to have the knack of carrying his hospitable instincts into graceful practice. The majority of us must be content to form units of a pleased and appreciative audience, and to express our admiration for a disposition which sees in wealth not a mere instrument of selfish enjoyment, but a means of promoting useful ends.

VICEROY CHANG AND EDUCATION

The Viceroy Chang Chih-tung has applied to the Japanese Government for the services of two experts to prepare a system of elementary education for the districts under his jurisdiction. Tokyo newspapers say that Mr. Furuyama Tsunesaburo, now connected with educational work in Saitama Prefecture, and one of the staff of the High Normal School in Tokyo will probably be sent, and that they will start at the end of this month or the beginning of next. Such a measure on the part of the Viceroy can not be reconciled with recently circulated reports that his progressive tendencies are bitterly resented by the Throne, and that his impeachment is imminent, if not already resolved. It must seem to any thoughtful Japanese an extraordinary subversal of immemorial conditions that China should come to Japan in search of an educational system; China, at the feet of whose literati Japan sat fourteen hundred years.

The 21st was certainly the coldest day in the year, though it was one day too late for that distinction, according to the Japanese almanack. A bitter wind blew in Tokyo, and wherever the sun's rays could not penetrate, the thermometer marked several degrees of frost. It was an inauspicious day for the thirty-seven Chinese students to make formal entry into the institutions where they are to receive their education, and very miserable the youths looked as they drove through the streets, their jinrikisha, with those of the three gentlemen sent to take charge of them and their Japanese friends, making a formidable string of vehicles. These youths, as our readers may remember, have been sent to Japan by the Viceroy Chang Chih-tung, and among them is the grandson of the Viceroy himself. Thirty-three of them are to be taught strategy, tactics and military science in general, for which purpose they have entered the Seijo Gakko, under the presidency of Viscount Kawakami. Two have received admittance to the Normal School to receive a scientific education, and four are to be specially instructed in jurisprudence and politics. The Viceroy's grandson has been placed in the Nikkwa-gaku-do at Koishikawa, from which we infer that the study of language will be his first care.

"NICHU NICHU SHIMBUN" AS A CONSERVATIVE.

We observe with regret that the Nichu Shimbun lends its powerful voice to support the argument in favour of denying to foreigners the privilege of holding shares in railroads, or owning land or engaging in the coastwise trade. Briefly summarized, our contemporary's view is that, although countries like the United States, Australia, and so on may find their account in extending these privileges to aliens so as to attract immigrants without whose coming the resources of the land could not be developed, the case is quite different with countries already fully populated, above all when there exist conditions of which foreign capitalists might take advantage to obtain a dominant voice in spheres that should be strictly under national control. England herself, the Nichu Shimbun adds, did not rescind the veto upon alien ownership of land until a date less than 30 years ago, nor throw open her coastwise trade until comparatively recent times, and it is much wiser for Japan to move slowly and circumspectly, so as to avoid the embarrassments that America and Australia are now experiencing as a result of ill-considered liberality in the past.

Stated in these general terms the argument sounds plausible, but we suggest to our contemporary the advisability of a detailed analysis, showing what particular form of disadvantage might result from permitting foreigners to own real estate, or hold shares in railways, or engage in the coastwise trade. No one has ever succeeded in demonstrating the precise nature of the risk which Japan's timid conservatives warn her to avoid.

The Nichu Shimbun's immediate object is to insist that foreign capital must not be introduced on the strength of a general pledge, such as the removal of all the restrictions alluded to above, but that it shall be obtained by a special pledge of the nature contemplated by Mr. Kaneko Kentaro's scheme for the establishment of an industrial bank. We believe that there is only one way of obtaining foreign capital at present, namely, on the Government's security.

A BANK TROUBLE.

The Heian Savings Bank is said to be in difficulties. "Heian" is the old name for Kyoto, and it will therefore be rightly inferred that the Bank has its head quarters in that city. Beginning with a capital of only 50,000 yen, half of which was paid up, it established branches in 16 localities, and managed to win the confidence of the public, so that its deposits gradually rose to 170,000 yen. Recently, however, it fell into difficulties of some kind—no clear explanation is given—and on the 17th instant the shareholders decided to wind up the business. Their decision appears to have led to some complications, and a good deal of disturbance is said to have been caused in financial circles in Osaka. Tokyo, however, is not affected, and in view of the petty nature of the Bank's transactions we do not see that Osaka can be much hurt. Most of the depositors seem to have withdrawn their money before the end came.

KYOTO CHAMBER OF COMMERCE AND LORD CHARLES BERESFORD

The Chairman of the Kyoto Chamber of Commerce has been as good as his word. He promised to invite from the Chamber an expression of opinion about the project that Lord Charles advocates, and it appears that he did so at a meeting of the Chamber on the 19th instant. The meeting was held with closed doors, but is said to have passed resolutions recommending, first, an Anglo-Japanese alliance, and secondly an alliance of the four Powers, Japan, America, Germany and England. Copies of the resolutions have been sent to the Ministers of State, and presumably to Lord Charles Beresford also. It is much to be desired that other Chambers should adopt the same course; not Japanese Chambers alone, but foreign Chambers also. Newspapers express chiefly the views of their editors, but a vote of a Chamber of Commerce represents the opinion of a body of business men, who, of course, carry great weight collectively. We are all ready enough to find fault with what we call the laissez-faire policy of the Home Government, but when the opportunity arises to take some action ourselves, we do not show much greater activity than the Government.

FRANCE AND JAPANESE SILK FABRICS.

It is alleged by the Fiji Shimpō that the Japanese plenipotentiary who negotiated the Revised Treaty with France, was informed by the French Government that discrimination would have to be exercised against Japanese manufactures, inasmuch as the cheapness of labour in Japan constitutes an unfair advantage for its products, and that he addressed to the Cabinet in Paris a letter admitting the justice of the principle contended for by the latter. Hence the action recently taken by the French Government with respect to raising the import duty on silk stuffs other than habutai from Japan. The Fiji severely condemns the negotiator—Mr. Sone, now Minister of Agriculture and Commerce—and declares that there could scarcely be a greater diplomatic blunder than that made by him. It asks, also, what was the use of such a farcical procedure as the insertion of a most-favoured-nation clause in the Treaty, if the Japanese nation was to be subsequently shocked by the discovery that a secret arrangement existed exposing Japan to be made the victim of discrimination.

Our own information is very different from that on which the Fiji relies. The French Government did indeed propose, we believe, to insert in the Protocol a statement in the sense that, in view of the great difference in the cost of French and Eastern labour, special rates might have to be imposed on extra-European silk fabrics. To that proposal the Japanese Government consented, provided that it was supplemented by a declaration that nonewrights were thereby created; in other words, provided that the principle of the most favoured nation was not disturbed. Subsequently the Treaty was concluded, and the proposed statement did not appear in the Protocol. Hence, so far as concerns Japan, she is in no way bound by pledge or promise. Mr. Sone's alleged "admission of the justice of the principle asserted by France" is limited to a despatch in which he simply "notes" the assertion. He did not endorse it, unless to acknowledge the receipt of a letter is to endorse its contents. As to the general question, it appears to be beyond all discussion that, by concluding a treaty which promises to Japan most-favoured-nation treatment, and provides that no departure can be made from that promise without twelve months' notice, France completely incapacitated herself to take the action now ascribed to her. The Treaty was concluded, it must be noted, after her proposed insertion of a special clause in the Protocol had elicited a conditional assent from Japan, and the insertion of the clause, when thus modified, was not pressed and did not take place. The question has no margin for doubt that we can perceive.

CONSTITUTIONAL PARTY AND THE NEW TAXES.

The parliamentary members of the Constitutional Party held a general meeting on the forenoon of the 21st instant to consider the new taxes proposed by the Government for making up the deficiency of 5,700,000 yen that still remains in the revenue for next year. The House Tax was first discussed and pronounced unsuitable. The increased tax on Soy was then debated, and accepted as a proper measure. The meeting also declared in favour of increasing the rates of postage, and suggested that they might be still further raised if necessary. Concerning the Government's project of raising the charges for telegrams and the fares on railways, it was noted that the Diet's consent need not be sought as a preliminary to such measures, the Administration being competent to take them on its own authority. Moreover, the object is not increased revenue for general purposes, but to obtain funds for the improvement of the two services.

THE TROUBLE IN KOBE ABOUT RECEIVING LORD CHARLES BERESFORD.

We have received several communications with reference to the treatment given to Mr. C. Pfoundes by the local English press in Kobe in connexion with his attempts to organize a public welcome to Lord Charles Beresford. The matter is not one to which we have paid much attention, but it must be confessed that, even accepting their own version of Mr. Pfoundes' action, the journalistic utterances of his assailants were somewhat rough. On the other hand, no member of the foreign community, whether in Kobe or Yokohama, is entitled to arrogate the position taken by Mr. Pfoundes. He appears to have assumed his own right to act as the whole Settlement's representative and spokesman, and of course no such assumption was likely to be tolerated. The initial mistake was his, a most tactless and exasperating mistake, and such being the case, the public is not likely to concern itself though the measure of his punishment may have been a little excessive. It is not our business to offer advice, but we venture to say that the wisest course Mr. Pfoundes can now take is to efface himself as quickly and thoroughly as possible.

FORESHORES.

The reclamation of foreshores is becoming a fashionable enterprise in Japan. Several works of the kind have been undertaken of late years, and their financial results are understood to have been generally successful. The latest reclamation project concerns the Kanagawa foreshore. An area of about forty acres will be recovered from the sea, at the expense, of course, of some of the bluffs of Kanagawa-dai, and there can not be much doubt that the operation will bring large gains to the projectors. The outlay should not exceed 15 yen a tsudo, and the land will be worth 30 or 40 yen. The Yokohama community may well feel a little thrill of expectancy as it sees these enterprises coming to the threshold of its sanctum. If anything be certain, it is that the present Bund will cease, one of these days, to mark the dividing line between sea and shore. The facilities for reclamation at the Bund are not great. They do not bear comparison with the facilities at Kanagawa, where practically nothing need be done except to tumble a few of the hills at the back into the sea in front. But the question at the Bund is simply one of some additional expense. Most assuredly the harbour will not be left in permanent possession of land which, if reclaimed, would be worth at least a hundred and twenty thousand yen an acre. By whom is the enterprise to be undertaken? If it is not undertaken by foreigners it will certainly be undertaken by Japanese in the not-very-distant future. Some people think that the owners of the present Bund lots have a right of water frontage, and could successfully oppose any work of reclamation that did not amply compensate their claims. We should not like to see the question submitted to a practical test, and the best way to dispose finally of such troublesome problems as well as to secure to foreign residents a part, at any rate, of the profits resulting from the enterprise of reclamation, would be the formation of a mixed company of foreigners and Japanese to carry out the work. If it be left until the Settlement barriers are swept away next July, the strong probability is that Japanese projectors will take the initiative.

AN INCIDENT OF THE TOBACCO MONOPOLY.

An extraordinary story comes from Iino in Yamana-shi Prefecture. According to newspaper reports, Mr. Kawara, the Manager of the Tobacco Monopoly Station in that town, announced that tobacco would be sold to only a limited number of dealers. The consequence was that, from the evening before the sale, which was announced for 8 a.m. on the 18th instant, people began to flock to the station, 1800 collecting there at sunset, and the crowd swelling to 3,000 by 1 a.m. It seems incredible that such a multitude of dealers should be present in so small a place, but that is the story. At 6 a.m., 300 of the waiters were admitted to the station, and the rest were informed that no sales could be made to them. Naturally they lost their tempers, and from shouting and yelling took to stone-throwing and smashing furniture, fences and windows. The police and gendarmes interfered, but were unsuccessful. Several more or less severe injuries were suffered, and how the riot ended we have no information.

PROJECT FOR A NEW EASTERN CABLE.

In the Yokohama we find a strong article urging that the time has fully arrived when an alternative line of telegraph should be laid for bringing the West and the East into communication. Such a line is projected, and an American agent recently spent some time in Japan endeavouring to secure the co-operation of the Japanese Government. The scheme he had been instructed to promote was a cable from the United States, via Hawaii and Japan, to the Philippines, and he seems to have been tolerably successful in his endeavours. Our contemporary gives an interesting table showing the annual development of the outlay on account of cablegrams from Japan to the Occident since 1891:—

	Yen
1890	355,750
1891	307,601
1892	434,625
1893	524,505
1894	556,070
1895	1,012,064
1896	1,126,633
1897	1,379,945
1898	1,639,433

There is a curious feature in this table. The sudden leap from half a million in 1894 to a million in 1895 is perhaps, accounted for when we remember that the war with China broke out in July 1894, though the same cause ought to have produced a proportionate expansion in 1894 as compared with 1893. But how is it that the increase has continued ever since? In 1895 as compared with 1894 we have a growth of nearly 100 per cent., and in 1898 as compared with 1895 we have a growth of over 50 per cent., whereas from 1890 to 1894 the growth was only 56 per cent. of a much smaller figure. We presume that the explanation is to be sought in the remarkable expansion of Japan's foreign trade during the past four years.

PAWNBROKERS IN JAPAN.

One of the Bills introduced in the House of Representatives on the 19th instant illustrates a curious phase of every-day life among the lower orders of Tokyo. The Pawnbrokers' Law now in force forbids a pawnbroker to levy a higher interest than 1 sen per month for a loan not exceeding 25 sen. Thus a pawnbroker may obtain 12 sen a year for a loan of 25 sen; or he may even obtain 12 sen a year for a loan of 12 sen. Such charges seem high enough, in all conscience. Nevertheless the Bill to which we allude denounces the restrictions of the present Law as unduly limiting the pawnbroker's gains, and consequently tending to prevent the people obtaining useful accommodation. The explanation of an objection so singular at first sight is to be found in the circumstances under which these small loans are made. Many folks, men and women, who subsist by manual labour in Tokyo, find themselves constantly without sufficient funds to buy their dinner. They can pay for their breakfast, but money to get a dinner is wanting. It is their habit, then, to put some of their cooking utensils in pawn, thus obtaining means to pay for their dinner; and when they receive their day's wage in the evening, they are able to redeem the pledged article and also to procure their supper that night and their breakfast and bath the following morning. The pawnbroker, therefore, has to perform thirty transactions monthly in the nature of taking pledges and paying and receiving money. The sum involved each day is very small, and the interest, as we have seen, may be anything from 100 to 48 per cent., but, on the other hand, a charge of one sen per mensem for such troublesome services is certainly not exorbitant.

NEW POSTAL RATES FOR NEWSPAPERS.

There is likely to be some agitation against the Government's proposal to change the postal rates for newspapers. At present, the minimum charge for a newspaper or periodical is 5 rin, which sum carries it to any part of Japan provided that the weight does not exceed 16 momme, or a little over 2 ounces. According to the new schedule the minimum charge remains unaltered, but the weight is raised to 20 momme, or over 2½ ounces. Moreover, there is a new provision which allows several newspapers to be sent in the same wrapper for 1.5 sen, provided that the weight does not exceed 30 momme, or 4 ounces. For single copies every additional 20 momme of weight requires an additional 5-rin stamp, and for a parcel of papers every additional 30 momme requires an additional 1.5 sen stamp. Against all that there can be no objection. But now comes a peculiar feature. At present, for postal purposes every publication issued at least once a month is regarded as a newspaper or periodical. If issued less frequently, it becomes ordinary mail matter. The new law, however, defines a newspaper or periodical to be a publication issued thrice a week or oftener. If it does not satisfy that definition, it becomes ordinary mail matter. Nearly all periodicals are thus excluded, and it is against that discrimination that Tokyo editors are now beginning to agitate. The question is of great importance to weekly papers or ordinary magazines, for, as ordinary mail matter, they would have to pay much more than they do as journals.

CALENDARS, &c.

We have received a particularly artistic calendar and also a very useful and handy little pocket book, from Messrs. Charles Wilkinson and Company, for whose celebrated "gold medal liqueur whiskey" Mr. John Hall is the Yokohama agent. Prettily designed calendars have also reached us from the North German Fire Insurance Company of Hamburg, represented in Yokohama by Mr. H. Grauert; from the Palatine Insurance Company Ltd., whose Yokohama agents are Messrs. Hutchison and Company; from the Caledonian Insurance Company, whose Yokohama agent is Mr. W. J. S. Shand; from the Ocean Accident Company of which Mr. F. Kiene is agent; and from Messrs. Samuel Samuel & Co., agents for the Alliance Marine and General Assurance Company, which was founded in 1824 and has a capital of one million sterling. Finally, we beg to acknowledge the receipt of a very serviceable calendar and diary combined from the Yokohama Piano and Organ Warehouse (Mr. J. G. Doering).

THE LATE COUNT KATSU.

With the demise of Count Katsu, which took place on the 19th instant at his residence in Tokyo, Japan loses the last of the brilliant band of men whose names were on everybody's lips in the time of turmoil and trouble immediately before the fall of the Tokugawa Regency and the resumption of administrative power by the Emperor. We are not using a mere figure of speech. If any Japanese, versed in the modern history of his country, were asked to indicate the greatest figures on that stage of stirring events, he would have no hesitation in naming Okubo Ichio and Katsu Awa on the side of the Bakufu; Mitsuoka Hachiro and Haseba Kanyemon in Yechizen; Yokoi Heishiro in Higo; Komatsu Tatewaki and Saigo Takamori in Satsuma; and Katsura Kogoro and Takasugi Shinsaku in Choshu. Death has now carried off the last of these celebrities. The great Saigo, hearing of Katsu's reputation, went to measure moral swords with him, and in describing, in a letter to his friend, Okubo Toshimitsu, the result of the encounter, said, with characteristic honesty:—"I have had my first meeting with Katsu and am astounded. I went with the intention of smashing him, but had to bow my own head. The ability of the man is not to be gauged. To far greater capacities than those of Sakuma Shozan he adds the demeanour of a hero." Beside Saigo's testimony that of any other Japanese will sound small, but it is now recalled that the afterwards renowned Sakamoto Riuna of Tosa, when he became Katsu's pupil, thus announced the fact in a letter to his elder brother:—"I have become the pupil of the greatest man in Japan." Yet with these high qualities to distinguish him, Katsu Awa-no-Kami retired at a comparatively early stage from public life. It is now exactly a quarter of a century since he held his last administrative post, Kaigun Kyo, or what we should to-day call, "Minister of State for the Navy." He was then only 52 years of age, and being a hale man, should have had a long spell of useful life before him. We shall probably know, by and by, what considerations induced him to turn his back upon the world and become thenceforth a mere name, "the Sage of Hikawa." It will be said, doubtless, that the changing of the old order was too abrupt for his fancy. We think it far more likely, speaking from personal knowledge of the man's character, that he found it hard to stand high among the ranks of an officialdom from which his former patrons and friends were excluded. Count Katsu did not come of a noble family. His father was a farmer, and his great-grandfather, Otani, was little better than a mendicant. The career of this Otani is recalled with interest. A blind youth of 17 or 18, he found his way from Echigo to Yedo, his whole worldly possessions represented by 300 cash. Caught in a violent snow-storm, he sank exhausted at the gate of a doctor's residence, who had compassion on him and took him in. Gambling was an amusement in the household of this Ishigaki Sotetsu, and Otani soon had occasion to lend his 300 cash at high interest. In a few days, he amassed a sum of 14 ryo, and Ishigaki admired his financial capacity so much that he doubled the amount. Otani went on from little to big, and after a time his transactions had assumed such dimensions that he could lend 700,000 ryo to the Daimiyo of Mito; a sum representing from 4 to 5 million yen of modern money. It is related of this Otani that he never wore a silk garment, nor ever used a cotton one for more than a day, giving it away thereafter to the poor. On his death-bed he summoned his children, and in their presence burned all his debtors' notes, so that the young people might work their way as he had done himself. Among the men thus left without heritage was Katsu's grand-father. Katsu himself was adopted into the house of a Hatamoto, and succeeded, at 17, to a load of debt which all his early years were devoted to discharging. It is related of him that he used afterwards to class as his three greatest friends his creditors, who spared him, a merchant of Kuramaye, who lent him two ryo, and the man who taught him military science. In youth he had the name of Tsusho Rintaro. Of his early life we know nothing, but in 1855, when he had reached the age of 32, he was ordered to Nagasaki to learn navigation, and on his return to Yedo he became a teacher of gunnery, having studied it under the Dutch. In 1859 he took command of the first ship sent abroad by Japan in modern times, the Kanrin Maru. In 1862 we find him appointed to the post of Gunkan Sojusho, which would correspond with the Vice-Ministership of the Navy at present, and shortly afterwards he was raised to be Gunkan Bugyo, or Minister of the Navy. We need not, however, follow his career from point to point, but may pass at once to the act which won for him undying fame, namely, his solitary opposition, in 1866, to the idea entertained by all the other Tokugawa leaders that the entry of the Emperor's forces into Yedo must be resisted to the death. It is generally believed that the Tokugawa would have had French assistance had they adopted a fighting policy, but however that may be, there can be no doubt that Katsu, by an extraordinary display of courage and foresight, averted a sanguinary war and saved Tokyo from destruction. In 1887 Count Katsu was raised to the peerage, and the Emperor subsequently bestowed on him the Grand Cordon of the Rising Sun, promoting him to the First Grade of the Second Official Class just before his death. His end was comparatively sudden. A slight cold which developed gastric symptoms, and an apoplectic stroke brought him to the "valley" in a few days. Just before sinking into unconsciousness from a state of apparent health and strength, he recognised that the end had come, and said to the Countess:—"The old man is going to die." Count Katsu is said to have been very careless in the management of his affairs. He habitually impoverished himself to support his former clansmen, and he died without making any formal arrangements as to his successor, though he had lost his only son. He had, however, expressed a wish to be succeeded by the twelfth son of the last Shogun, Keiki. This Mr. Tokugawa Sei is a lad of 12 years, and it has been arranged that when he comes of age he shall marry the grand-daughter of Count Katsu.

The funeral took place on the 25th, leaving the Hikawa residence at 9 a.m., and proceeding to the Aoyama cemetery. The Count's will was characteristic. He desired that his obsequies should be of the simplest character, without flowers or display of any kind, and the money thus saved is to be given to the poor.

FATAL FIRE IN HIROSAKI.

About midnight on the 18th inst. fire broke out at the rear of the residence occupied by Rev. R. P. Alexander, at Hiroasaki. By the time the servants were aroused by the noise of the conflagration, it had assumed such proportions as to render escape difficult. The cook's wife, hastening to the upstairs room where Mr. and Mrs. Alexander, with their little boy, were sleeping, roused them with difficulty. They thought there was time to dress, but this proved a fatal delay. Before the devoted couple were aware of it, escape by the staircase was impossible. Mr. Alexander, in the darkness, put the little boy out on the roof of the portico and went back for his wife. She did not answer his call and in searching through the smoke he fell out of the window to the ground below. Though bruised and burned he climbed up the portico post and rescued the child, but his wife had evidently made an attempt to escape by another way and succumbed to the flames. Both Mr. Alexander and the child were badly burned about the head, neck and hands; the father's left hand being in an especially bad condition, while his back was bruised by the fall.

Everything was consumed, even to the most necessary clothing, though Mr. Alexander succeeded in breaking through his study window and saving two drawers, filled with important papers. It is a terrible disaster, but the stricken one, in the midst of severe suffering and grief, is sustained by an unwavering trust in God. The faithful servant, to whose warning it is due that any of the family escaped, jumped from a second story window, seriously injuring her back. Her recovery is doubtful.—GIBSON F. DRAPER.

On the 20th fire broke out at Otake village, Uda gori, Kumamoto Prefecture, and destroyed 80 houses. Three lives are known to be lost, and three infants are missing.

On the 19th fire broke out at Kurohane village, Gumma Prefecture, and destroyed the whole of the buildings in the place.—Asahi Shimbun.

On Tuesday, at 1.50 a.m., a fire broke out in a goods car at Shinbashi Railway Station, Tokyo. The car and the goods contained in it, valued at over yen 4,000, were destroyed. The cause of the fire is not known.

SERIOUS CHARGE AGAINST A SHANGHAI RESIDENT.

On Thursday afternoon, Jan. 19th, in the British Police Court, Shanghai, before Mr. Burrows, sitting for the first time as Police Magistrate, Mr. J. W. H. Burgoyne, formerly of Messrs. Dodwell, Attil & Co., was brought up on a charge of obtaining from the Russo-Chinese Bank the sum of Tls. 85,000 on false pretences. Mr. A. P. Stokes (Messrs. Johnson, Stokes, and Mayer) appeared for the prosecution, and from his statement, and the evidence called, it appeared that the false pretences counted in the accused having obtained the sum stated on four godown orders, which he gave to the Bank, representing that the cargo mentioned in the godown receipts was in certain godowns, whereas during that period and up to the present time there was not and had not been since any such cargo. The witnesses examined consisted of Mr. M. Speelman, of the Russo-Chinese Bank, who proved that the accused obtained the sum of Tls. 85,000 on the representations; Mr. O. Messer, of the firm of Messrs. Dodwell and Company, Ltd., and two god. women, who were called to prove that Mr. Burgoyne did not have between the 26th of March and the 10th of October, 1898, the dates in question, or up to the present time, any such cargo as was referred to, which was represented as being skins and piece-goods.

In answer to the statutory caution the accused replied he had nothing to say beyond the fact that he was guilty. He was then committed for trial. He was admitted to bail in the sum of Tls. 10,000—himself in Tls. 5,000, and two other sureties in the sum of Tls. 2,500 each.—N.-C. Daily News.

LORD CHARLES BRESFORD AND THE REVISED TREATIES.

IN the speech delivered by Lord CHARLES BRESFORD at the meeting of the Oriental Society on the 21st instant, the following statements occur:—

In England, we had our personal liberty long before we got our political liberty. I do not know how it is with you in this country. If we arrest a Japanese for some offence in England we endeavour to allow him counsel, let him see his friends, and render him assistance, especially if he cannot speak a word of the English language. In England we hold that a man is innocent until you have proved that he is guilty. I don't know exactly what your rules are in Japan, but if you arrest a man and do not allow him the advantage of counsel, do not allow him to see his friends, then you are holding him guilty until he has proved himself innocent. It is the English and Americans who are in predominant numbers among the foreigners in Japan, and it is English and Americans who hold those principles of justice which I have referred to. I may ask—I put it forward only as a suggestion—would it be possible for the Japanese Government—not to alter the treaty—but to take the case into consideration whether there should not be some reciprocity with regard to the matter, so that Japanese should pursue towards English and Americans in this country the course English and Americans pursue toward them in their own. (Applause). I say this most respectfully, gentlemen. I find no fault with the treaty, but I merely say I want to do all that within me lies to make this country and the country I have the honour to belong to cement a strong friendship for each other, and I find there is this feeling, and after the extraordinary kindness and courtesy I have received from you I don't think it would be honest and straight for me if I did not tell you this feeling exists.

There appears to be a slight misapprehension in the above. It is true that Lord CHARLES says, "I do not know exactly what your rules are in Japan," but his interpretation of the rules is evidently based on information furnished to him in this country, and as his numerous speeches have proved that he possesses remarkable accuracy of observation and exercises great care in collecting facts, we must presume that, in this instance, the error is on the side of his informant. The criminal procedure of Japan does not altogether deprive a person of the advantage of counsel or cut him off from his friends during preliminary examination. The 85th Article of the Code provides that "an accused person, unless he is in secret confinement, is permitted to receive, in the presence of an official, visits from his relatives or connexions, his friends or his counsel, in conformity with the prison regulations." A Bill now before the House of Peers proposes to elide the words "unless he is in secret confinement," but the elision has no practical importance for the purposes of our present argument, inasmuch as the same Bill proposes to add a clause empowering the judge to order the prisoner into separate confinement and to segregate him, while so confined, from his relatives, his friends, and his counsel. However, under any circumstances the fact remains that, as a general rule, a prisoner is allowed to receive visits from his relatives, friends and counsel. In that respect Lord CHARLES BRESFORD seems to have been misinformed. But a prisoner is not allowed to have the advantage of counsel while actually undergoing preliminary examination. That is an inevitable restriction so long as the law is based on the French system; in other words, so long as the procès verbal constitutes the chief feature of the preliminary examination. The great difficulty under which we labour in discussing this question is that, when we condemn the criminal procedure of Japan, we are condemning the criminal procedure of some of the most civilized countries in Europe. On the other hand, reason and humanity alike concur in endorsing the English procedure as superior to the French, and we fail to see why Japan should be content to have reached a higher plane than that on which she formerly stood while a still higher remains to be attained. All prejudice apart, the procès verbal must be pronounced a cruel, even an inhuman, system. Looked at closely, it is seen to rest on the vicious doctrine of mediæval times that the confession of an accused person must precede his conviction. From that to torture is only one step. Japan has abolished torture so far as the use of instruments for inflicting pain on the body is concerned. But the procès verbal is essentially a form of torture. To many people it is the worst kind of torture, and when it is supplemented by the power of ordering a prisoner into solitary confinement, and thus inducing a condition of nervous prostration which quite unfits him to support the ordeal of subtle and insistent questioning by a trained judicial expert, we find ourselves in the presence of a system which is only one degree better than the rack and the thumb-screw. The spirit of the English procedure is, "better that two guilty men should escape than that one innocent person should be convicted," and it assumes every prisoner innocent until his guilt is proved. The spirit of the procès verbal system is, "better the conviction of two innocent persons than the escape of one guilty," and it assumes every prisoner guilty until his innocence is established. Can there be any doubt as to which system is the more enlightened, the more civilized? Lord CHARLES BRESFORD made an adroit and moving appeal to the Japanese. He urged that as the Anglo-Saxon element largely preponderates in the foreign community, and as Japanese subjects visiting Anglo-Saxon countries receive the benefit of the humane procedure of Anglo-Saxon criminal law, some corresponding concession should be made to Anglo-Saxons in Japan. That is a most reasonable suggestion, but, for our own part, we do not venture to endorse it. We can not pretend to think that any invocation of sentiment will persuade the Japanese to do for strangers what they are not prepared to do for themselves. What we say, therefore, and what is said by the foreign resident in general, is that the Japanese nation, for the sake of moral principles and for the sake of its own reputation, should aim at the highest standard of jurisprudence, and should not rest at the half-way house which it reached seventeen years ago. Innumerable amendments of laws are submitted to the Diet year after year by the Government, and in every case it is considered a sufficient argument that the original law, having been enacted ten, twelve, or fifteen years ago, has ceased to be in touch with the progressive spirit of the time. Is the Code of Criminal Procedure alone beyond the range of that argument? We may be answered that the question is unjust, since the Government has just proposed certain amendments. We give the Government full credit, but we find that its amendments are half-hearted and inefficient. What is the use of abolishing the mise au secret if a judge is endowed with power to order the accused into a segregated cell, where he is cut off from intercourse with everybody? That seems to us like taking away with one hand what is given with the other. May we not hope that the House of Peers will evince a genuine spirit of reform by depriving the Judge of all competence to subject to the ordeal of solitary confinement a man who may be wholly innocent of crime? If the House takes that step, it will earn the nation's gratitude. Then there is the matter of bail. Yokohama has heard a great deal of talk about the habeas corpus, and some habitual critics of ours persist in asserting that because we do not acknowledge the necessity for that particular method of procedure, we condemn the principle underlying it. As justly accuse us of denying the superiority of cooked food to raw if we said that turnspits were not an essential article of kitchen furniture. Our claim is simply that the objects contemplated by the framers of the habeas corpus statute may be fully achieved by some other expedient of criminal procedure. The compilers of Japan's Codes thought that they had achieved those objects. But experience has proved that they were mistaken, and the House of Peers has now an opportunity of correcting the defect. The Government suggests giving to an accused person the right of appeal from a refusal on the part of an examining Judge to grant bail. That is something. But there is a good deal more wanted, and without venturing to make any definite suggestion, we entertain an earnest hope that in one House or the other of the Japanese Legislature, some solid reforms of the Code of Criminal Procedure will be effected, not for the sake of foreigners, but for the sake of the Japanese people and of the Japanese nation's reputation. The abolition of the procès verbal, and its replacement by the system of open examination relying on witnesses only, the accused being entitled to testify on his own behalf if he pleases, would be one of the most signal steps of advance ever taken by Japan. We do not see why she should hesitate. She ought to be able to trust herself; for the transition, which she made without any difficulty, from her own old system to the new Criminal Code of 1881 was even more radical than the further change she might now make with so much advantage.

FINNIKIN FINANCE.

THE Government's proposal to put a tax on houses in order to make up a part of the deficiency of revenue, is evidently destined to encounter much opposition. Even the Chuo Shimbun, the organ of the National Unionists, condemns it as an impost of vexatious character and difficult to collect. The Chuo thinks that a better plan would be to raise the postage rates, which are cheaper in Japan than in any other country. In proof of that assertion our contemporary gives the following table, which is not without interest:—

RATES FOR LETTERS.

Germany	Up to 4 momme in weight.....	5 sen.
Belgium	do do	4 sen.
Switzerland	Irrespective of weight	4 sen.
France	Up to 4 momme	4 sen.
Austria	do 5.3 momme	5 sen.
Spain	do 4 momme	6 sen.
Portugal	do do	5 sen.
England	do 7.5 momme	4 sen.
America	do do	4 sen.
Japan	Per 2 momme	2 sen.

RATES FOR POST CARDS.

Germany	2½ sen and 5 sen for return cards.
Belgium	2 " 4 " "
Switzerland	2 " 4 " "
France	4 " 8 " "
Austria	2 " 4 " "
Spain	4 " 6 " "
Portugal	2 " 4 " "
England	2 " 4 " "
Japan	1 " 2 " "

In the matter of post cards Japan is certainly cheaper than any other country, but her charges for letters, weight for weight, are not cheaper than those in Belgium, Switzerland and France, and are not so cheap as those of England and America. It is an important point, however, that the minimum charge for a letter in Japan is fifty per cent. lower than the minimum charge in any other country, the facilities of the post being thus brought within reach of the poorer classes. That is a point upon which Japan may fairly congratulate herself, and nothing could be more regrettable than a change in the sense of higher rates. But the unpractical and emotional conduct of the House of Representatives is driving the Treasury to expedients of a distinctly retrogressive character and is also having the effect of greatly impairing Japan's credit. The Asahi Shimbun shrewdly contrasts England's condition with that of Japan. In England the House of Commons trusts the Cabinet to exercise the utmost economy in all branches of the administration. If waste of public money or other financial abuses are suspected, careful scrutiny is exercised, but the House never approaches the Budget in a bargain-driving spirit, nor does the Government, on its side, think of putting the estimates at a higher figure than is absolutely necessary. In Japan, on the contrary, the Budget has come to be treated as a kind of trade transaction, one party beating down prices as a matter of course, and the other protecting itself by adding a reducible margin. A result of this is that the credit of the country is gradually becoming impaired in the eyes of foreigners. The House of Representatives will not consent to any increase of taxation unless the Treasury's condition can be shown to be almost desperate; the Government is therefore obliged to represent the financial situation in its worst light, and the Opposition, when any bill for increasing the revenue comes up for discussion, does not hesitate to declare that the people's burden is already greater than they can bear. At the present moment we have the Government in apparent perplexity to find an additional income of five or six hundred thousand pounds sterling, a veritable bagatelle; and we have the House of Representatives treating this paltry question as though it were some great economical problem. No wonder that the public learns to consider Japan at the end of her resources; no wonder that a prominent London banker recently compared her financial condition to that of Italy. How much justice there is in such a comparison we can see at once from simple arithmetic:—

AMOUNT OF PUBLIC BURDENS PER HEAD OF POPULATION.
Army & Navy Expenses.		Administrative National Expenses.		Total.
Yen.	Sen.	Yen.	Sen.	Yen.
Italy	4,177	9,902	6,633	20,712
Japan	1,467	1,999	0,771	4,237

In truth the assertion, so freely made of late by correspondents of home journals and by foreign writers in this country, to the effect that Japan is in economical straits and can not see her way ahead, is emphatically contradicted when we come to examine figures. Here, for example, is a very simple forecast, the figures being millions of yen:—

	1900-1.	1901-2.	1902-3.
Revenue according to the present programme.....	224½	223	214½
Expenditures according to the present programme.....	201½	192½	176½
Excess of Revenue	13	30½	38½
	1903-4.	1904-5.	1905-6.
Revenue according to the present programme.....	205½	203½	203½
Expenditures according to the present programme.....	165	162	160½
Excess of Revenue	40½	41½	42½

Certainly there is here no evidence of financial difficulty. Nor is there much more accuracy in the common assertion that Japan has undertaken a scheme of armaments which exceeds her economic competence. In the fiscal year 1890-1, her expenditures on account of her Army and Navy absorbed 27.85 per cent. of her annual income, and she was then considered to be exceptionally moderate in the matter of unproductive expenditures. Since then she has adopted a large programme of armaments expansion, so that, in 1905-6, her military strength will be more than the double of what it was in 1890, and her Navy will have swelled from 33 fighting ships—the best of them second-class cruisers—with an aggregate displacement of 63,719 tons, and 23 torpedo boats, to 67 ships with an aggregate displacement of 258,300 tons—including six line-of-battle ships and 6 armoured cruisers of 9,200 tons each—together with 11 torpedo-destroyers and 89 torpedo-boats. But her expenditure on account of the two services will be only 30.14 per cent. of her revenue. In short, she will have made such increases to her armaments as will entitle her to rank with first-class Powers, and the additional annual outlay will be only 2.29 per cent. of her revenue. Such figures do not justify us in asserting that she is exceeding her financial strength in the matter of unproductive outlays, for if she was well within her strength in 1890, as could not be denied, an additional expenditure of 2.29 per cent. can not be held to overtax her competence. From the moment when we come to examine actual figures, all cause for uneasiness vanishes, yet such are the apprehensions created by the excessively timid, finnikin conduct of the House of Representatives that the outside world has gradually become imbued with a conviction of Japan's impecuniosity. Nothing was wanting to deepen the conviction but a proposal that another farthing should be charged on every letter passing through the post, in order to raise a petty revenue of one or two hundred thousand pounds sterling.

EXTRA-SETTLEMENT LEASES IN KOBE.

LET us suppose that the leasing of land by aliens is forbidden within the limits of a certain state in America. Let us further suppose that, in consequence of diplomatic intervention, the veto is withdrawn, and the Governor of the State publishes a notice to the effect that "foreigners and American citizens may in future make agreements between themselves and at their own convenience for leasing lands or houses." Is it for an instant conceivable that such a concession could be read as authorizing American citizens to ignore the laws of their country in leasing lands or houses to foreigners, although they are obliged to observe those laws in similar transactions between themselves? This hypothetical case is practically parallel to the arrangement made with regard to extra-settlement leases at Hyogo in 1868. The Governor of Hyogo announced that, in consequence of an agreement concluded between the Japanese Government and the Foreign Representatives, "foreigners and Japanese might in future make arrangements between themselves and at their own convenience for leasing lands or houses" within a certain extra-Settlement area which he then proceeded to define. In other words, he announced that foreigners might enjoy within that area the same privilege of land leasing as that enjoyed by Japanese subjects within the same area. He did not and he could not exempt such leases from the operation of the laws of the empire. If either then, or at any future time, the laws of the empire forbade leases in perpetuity, then leases in perpetuity would be illegal within the extra-settlement area at Hyogo, whether Japanese subjects alone or Japanese subjects or foreigners were parties to them. Of course, had the diplomatic agreement forming the basis of the Governor's communication created a privilege independent of the laws of the empire—as was the case with regard to land-leasing within the Foreign Settlements—the situation would have been different. Or if, even in the absence of such a special agreement, the practice followed with respect to similar extra-settlement areas elsewhere could be adduced as sanctioning perpetual leases in despite of the laws of the empire, then, again, something like a valid plea could be urged in behalf of the practice at Kobe. But the agreement created no such special privilege, and the practice in extra-settlement areas elsewhere—as in Niigata and Tokyo—was entirely against perpetual leases. On these grounds we have affirmed and we now repeat that the Japanese Government was strictly within its rights when, in 1884, it enacted a law limiting the duration of leases between foreigners and Japanese within the extra-settlement area at Hyogo, the limit being equally applicable to leases between Japanese subjects, and being also in accordance with the general legislative principle adopted by Japan at that era.

These facts seem perfectly clear. They have already been stated by us in simple, dispassionate language, and have evoked some very rude and abusive journalistic rejoinders in Kobe, but not one argument of the smallest intrinsic value has been adduced in contradiction. We therefore dismiss that phase of the discussion, and address ourselves briefly to the contention that the Japanese Government, under pressure of remonstrances made by Her Britannic Majesty's Minister in Tokyo, has acknowledged the action taken by it in 1884 to have been a violation of the Treaty; has cancelled the instrument of that action, and has restored to foreigners the privilege of leasing land in perpetuity within the extra-settlement area at Hyogo. Every point of that contention has been denied by us more than once, but our opponents, though absolutely without evidence to support their assertions, have persisted in their false interpretation of the Japanese Government's action. We have therefore obtained an official statement of the facts and we now translate it, placing it side by side with the journalistic allegations made in Kobe:—

The Kobe Allegations.

Official Statement of the Japanese Government.

During January, 1898,

an English subject by name Thornicraft made an agreement with a Japanese subject to leave a plot of land from the latter for 50 years within the Zakkyo-chi at Kobe, and application was made to the Governor of Hyogo Prefecture to have the lease registered. But since the terms of the lease exceeded the period fixed as the limit of such transactions by Notification No. 122 of the same prefecture, issued in 1884, the Governor refused to register the lease. A protest against that refusal was subsequently made by the British Representative in Tokyo, but the Japanese Government declined to entertain the protest and approved the Governor's action. Inasmuch, however, as the new Civil Code, which went into operation in July, 1898, contains all necessary provisions with regard to the periods of letting and hiring as well as of superficies, the provisions of the Hyogo Prefectural Notification referred to above became superfluous. At the time when the Notification was issued, the laws of Japan did not contain any definite provisions with regard to letting and hiring and superficies, and those matters had, therefore, to be specially dealt with by Notification; but so soon as the new Civil Code supplied the deficiency, the Notification ceased to serve any useful purpose. Consequently, in November, 1898, the Japanese Government instructed the Governor of Hyogo to rescind the Notification. Such being the facts, the rescinding of the Notification is not in the smallest degree based upon any objection made by foreigners (migi no shidai naru ni yori gai-tasshi no haishi wa go mo gwaikoku-jin no hoshō ni motowasu taru ni arazu), but is simply due to the fact that, as a result of the operation of the Civil Code, the Japanese Government saw no necessity for preserving the Notification (Mimpo jishi no kekka Nikon Seifu ni oite kore wa sanzai seshimuru no hitsuyō nahi mo mōtometaru ni yoru nari).

After this, we shall presumably hear no more about the Japanese Government's "recognising the injustice" done by the Notification, about the "prefectural decree having been clearly proved to be an infringement of the Treaties," and about "smiles of amusement" at the expense of the Japan Mail. If the issue of the Notification of 1884 was a contravention of the Treaty, since it restricted the period of land-leasing within the extra-settlement area, then the substitution of the Civil Code for the Notification is equally a contravention of the Treaty, since the Civil Code also restricts that operation. But the truth is that the communication made to the Foreign Consuls by the Governor of Hyogo in 1868 did not create any privilege superior to the laws of the empire, then or thereafter enacted, and the Japanese Government, in bringing the extra-settlement leases within the purview of the Civil Code in 1898, endorsed and repeated the procedure adopted by the Governor of Hyogo in 1884. Foreigners are just as effectually interdicted from obtaining perpetual leases within the extra-settlement area at Hyogo today as they were interdicted a twelve-month ago. In the particular case of Dr. THORNICRAFT, since, as we have often pointed out in the face of obstinate contradiction, the Civil Code permits the contracting parties to fix their own period for a superficies, he has doubtless obtained what he wanted, namely, a fifty years tenure. But, so far from admitting that the Treaty was infringed in 1884, the Japanese Government has now deliberately re-adopted in another form the very procedure which is journalistically denounced, and was publicly condemned by the memorialists in Kobe as an injustice and an infringement of international agreement. The complaint in the Memorial on this particular point had not received either in Downing-street or in Tokyo the recognition so confidently asserted in the paragraph quoted above.

AN ELECTRIC TRAM.

The first electric railway in this quarter of Japan was opened on the 21st instant. It runs from Kawasaki to the celebrated temple of Daishi, whither great numbers of pilgrims flock, especially at festival time. The fare from Kawasaki to Daishi is 5 sen first class, and 3 sen third class. The fact that such a line has been constructed at Kawasaki gives additional prominence to the extraordinary backwardness of Tokyo, where no street railway of any kind exists as yet. The Mainichi Shimbun has a good deal to say about the Mayor of Tokyo, whose responsibilities, especially in the matter of entertaining foreigners, it views in a very strong light, adducing the example of the Lord Mayor of London, and pointing out that the Shichō is really the representative of the metropolis. That is all very true, but it seems to us that the best plan for Tokyo at present is to efface itself as much as possible, instead of urging the Mayor to do its honours. The Mayor could only find himself embarrassed if he had to play the part of host in a capital which is far behind the general standard of the country's progress, and which, in some important respects, can not be ranked higher than a town in the backwoods of America. •

MONTHLY SUMMARY OF JAPANESE CURRENT LITERATURE.

In No. 95 of Dr. Katō's "Hundred Short Essays," published in the Taiyō, the growth of the democratic spirit in Japan is discussed. Dr. Katō thinks that the utterance of Louis XIV., "I am the state," though not applicable to any modern European monarch, describes accurately the position occupied by the Emperor of Japan. In Japan, says Dr. Katō, no revolution involving a change in the reigning dynasty is conceivable. No party, however strong, would ever dream of trying to set up a rival to the lawful sovereign. Dr. Katō regrets that in speeches and newspaper articles things are said that savour of democracy. He thinks that to the young and inexperienced there is much that is dazzling in the history of democracy and constitutional government given in Western treatises, and that not a few may be tempted to think that republicanism is the best form of government for any and every nation, but this is not the opinion of the majority of thoughtful Japanese. To them patriotism and loyalty to the crown are but two names for the same thing. Dr. Katō quotes the report of Count Ōkuma's address to the Tōhōkyōkai given by Opposition newspapers, which, it must be remembered, is alleged to be most inaccurate, and also refers to Mr. Ozaki's speech, of which so much was made for political purposes, and goes on to say that such expressions as Fijū naikaku no ranhen (The Abuse of Power by Chamberlain-Cabinets), published in the Seikai-no-Nihon, are disrespectful and improper. Dr. Katō thinks that the men who write in this strain have not studied Japanese history to any purpose and have no conception of the depth of Japanese loyalty to the crown.

* * *

One of the many changes which the operation of the new treaties will usher in is discussed by the Taiyō, namely, the curtailment of Japan's right of translating foreign works without the permission of their authors, a right that has been exercised to the full in past years. The Taiyō regards the subjection of Japan to international copyright laws as an entire mistake, but thinks, that since the State has taken this step, it should adopt active measures for supplying the nation with translations of important foreign works. The Government, says the Taiyō, has hitherto been far too indifferent in the matter of translation. There is no denying that there has been much that was compulsory in the adoption of Western civilisation by the nation. The Government has always taken the lead, and the people volens volens have been forced to follow. Now a perusal of standard foreign works rendered into our own language is the best way of getting to understand the real nature and significance of the system of civilisation to which we are wedded. To place the means of doing this within the reach of its subjects is one of the plainest duties of the state. One has only to travel through the country and converse with the people in order to see how superficial and imperfect is the acquaintance with Western civilisation possessed even by the fairly educated section of the nation. Accustomed to look to the Government for guidance in the paths of progress for three decades, it is not to be supposed that the people generally will make headway unaided. Having conducted the nation to the portals of the great fabric of western life and thought, the Government should certainly introduce them to the interior and enable them to admire for themselves its many beauties. Still more imperative is this task in the view of the near approach of mixed residence. There are plenty of men fully qualified to undertake the work of translation, and the expense would be insignificant.

The New Year Number of the Taiyō contains an unusual array of interesting articles. Dr. Katō Hiroyuki reviews the great events of the world during his lifetime (64 years). Dr. Inouye Tetsujirō writes on "The Tendency of Thought in Japan;" Dr. Ariga Nagao on "The State of Political Parties in Germany;" Mr. T. Soyeda on "Schemes of Finance and Economy and the Principles they involve;" while a variety of miscellaneous subjects are treated by other well-known writers. Dr. Inouye's essay is still unfinished. In the first part of it, which lies before us, he institutes an interesting comparison between the tendency of thought in Germany, England and Japan. The conclusion that he reaches is that Japan agrees with England in her love of the practical and the experimental, and that she has never taken kindly to speculation and metaphysics of the German type. Dr. Inouye reviews the history of philosophic thought in Japan and shows how in the Tokugawa era Buddhist philosophy and metaphysics had to give place to Confucianism, and how such Buddhist priests as Fujiwara Seiga, Tani Jichū, and Yamazaki Ansai turned their backs on their own abstruse philosophy and became earnest advocates of that form of Confucianism known as Shushi gaku. Every nation, says Dr. Inouye, has its dominant tendency; and thought moves in this direction or that according to this tendency. Philosophy of the practical type has special attractions for the Japanese, and hence it was that Confucianism obtained such a hold on their minds. It is a mistake to think that Chinese philosophy has been adopted in Japan without modification. The process of harmonising imported ideas with prevailing national tendencies of thought has always gone on. The dualistic principle of Sung (宋), who maintained that all things were to be traced to two sources, one transcendental, which he named 理, the other physical, which he named 氣, was not accepted in its entirety by many of our leading philosophers, says Dr. Inouye. They were not prepared to acknowledge the existence of any transcendental origin of the universe. They were simply concerned to trace out the physical train of nature's many sequences. Such well-known men as Hayashi Razan, Yamaga Sokō, Nakaye Tōju, Ito Jinsai, Kaibara Yekiken, Miura Baiyen, Satō Issai, and Hōaishi Banri took this view. And there were men, like Sorai, who maintained that it is quite impossible to infer from nature what rule of life should be followed. A moral code must be elaborated by wise men and must be founded on experience. In asserting that it is only the approved actions of mankind which furnish a standard of right and wrong, and that all transcendental ethical theories have no solid basis, the Japanese philosophers were following in the footsteps of the English philosopher Hobbes. It is a noteworthy fact that the leaders of philosophic thought in the Tokugawa era were not men who champion the Confucian philosophy without knowing the Buddhist. They were deeply versed in Buddhist lore, but they preferred Confucianism, because it was founded on experience of real life, and not on mere speculation. Coming to modern times, the two leading men of the day in the world of thought are undoubtedly Mr. Fukuzawa and Dr. Katō Hiroyuki. Mr. Fukuzawa can hardly be called a philosopher, but he may be said to be a champion of Utilitarianism. As for Dr. Katō, he is undoubtedly a philosopher of great power, whose knowledge has been mostly derived from German sources. Evolution is his favourite theme, and his conclusions are not far removed from materialism. These two thinkers agree in keeping to what is experimental or practical. They are good specimens of the typical Japanese mind. The set of the current of Japanese philosophic thought has always been in the same direction. It is gratifying to know that not even the introduction of Western learning has altered our national proclivities. It is something for a nation to have an all-prevailing tendency of this kind. It is not so with all nations. In Europe, though the characteristics of German and English thought have been for a long time clearly marked, French prevailing thought is ever changing and is altogether disconnected at the present time with the history of the nation. There is no such thing in France as philosophy that is strictly and exclusively French in character. Their philosophy is polygenous and lacks the continuity of systems of thought that have grown out of the histories of nations or have been the product of the most highly developed typical minds. There are people who say that we Japanese resemble the French. What likeness there may be is of a very superficial kind. In a far deeper way we resemble the English. The two nations are alike in that steady persistence in attachment to the actualities of life and in the high regard in which they hold the deeds and the thoughts of their ancestors. Is it the island life that the two nations have lived that enables them to preserve their identity and distinctiveness in a degree that Continentals find it hard to equal?

The Taiyō contains a review of the tendencies and principal characteristics of Japanese literature during the year 1898, from which we cull the following facts and opinions. During the month of January most of the leading newspapers began to publish novelettes, instead of the Kōdan, or lectures, that used to appear. Among novels and novelettes those of the witty kind were most popular. In February, in addition to the already existing Art Societies, the Kaiga Kyōkai, the Bijutsu Kyōkai, the Hakubakai, and the Meiji Bijutsukai, the Nihongakai was established, with Dr. Suyematsu as President. It aims at striking a middle course between the conservatism of the Bijutsu Kyōkai and the radicalism of the Kaiga Kyōkai. In this month the necessity of choosing exhibits to be forwarded to Europe led to a warm discussion of the comparative merits of Eastern and Western art. In February Japan lost one of her best sculptors, Kano Matsuo. The question of the nude in art was very much to the front at this time. In March the subjects which engaged most attention were the reform of our written language, the literary style of our novelists, and the commotion connected with the Bijutsu Gakkō. In April interviews with actors and performers and the publication of personal details connected with them became a distinctive literary feature. In May the stagnancy in the literary world was discussed and causes ascribed for it by various writers. In June the discussion on stage acting and its reform, which had been going on so long, ceased. In July Mr. Ozaki's Yaye-dasuki (父重だすき) appeared and proved a great success. In this month the Yorozu Chōhō commenced its article on "Concubinage," which contained a number of personal allusions and hence caused a great stir. At this time it was, too, that grave doubts were expressed as to the trustworthiness of many publishers who collect subscriptions for books in advance. In August there appeared in the Hanrei Zasshi a long poem by Mr. Doi Buusen entitled Busen no Yume (A Dream of Battle), the chief hero of which is Napoleon I. In August, too, one of Japan's famous modern painters Noguchi Yūkoku, died. In September linguistic reform was the principal subject discussed. In some quarters an earnest request for the production of political novels was made. October was the month of art exhibitions. In November the Chiyoda Shimbun and the Ippitsu Shimbun both saw the light. New learned societies cropped up here and there; the Shakai-gakkai, the Bungaku Club, the Kokuhon-gaku Kenkyu-kai, and the Kyoiku-gaku Kenkyu-kai. In this month Suzuki Chōrei, the well-known writer of old style poems, passed away.

Reviewing the past 12 months, there is no denying, says the Taiyō, that there has been a grievous want of activity in the literary world. This is ascribed by some writers to tradal depression or agricultural distress. The demand regulates the supply, say these authorities. The people have not the money they used to have to spend on books, and so on. It seems, concludes the organ we are quoting, that their own deficiencies as the cause of limited success are the last thing thought of by the numerous penmen who undertake to explain how the present stagnancy has been brought about.

The Taiyō comments on the want of Japanese works giving a history of Japan's arts and artists. It is surprising, says this organ, that in a country where the arts have received so much attention no attempt should have been made to prepare an exhaustive work of reference on painting, sculpture, architecture and music. Existing Japanese literature on this subject is most meagre and unsatisfactory. Last year a book by Mr. Kosugi, entitled Nihon Bijutsu-Shi (A History of Japanese Fine Art) made its appearance. But it was a most imperfect affair. The Hakubutsu Kan have a work in hand that is to be sent to the Paris Exhibition next year, which promises to be better than anything that has appeared hitherto. The reasons given for the dearth of literature on art by the Taiyō are (1) Lack of constructive ability in Japan. (2) The poor education which many artists have received. (3) The paucity of well-informed art critics. While we find that in England, France, and Germany learned works are published bearing on the arts of every country in the world, the Japanese are not yet alive to the importance of their possessing a reliable and minute history of their own art. But it is not only in the matter of art that Japanese literature is deficient. In regard to Indian and Chinese philosophy and religions the same thing may be affirmed. We have to sit at the feet of Occidentals. Even in the compilation of Japanese grammars, a foreigner, Mr. B. H. Chamberlain, has no rival. In a minute knowledge of Japanese art, in investigations of the Aino language and customs, and a variety of other subjects foreigners take the lead, and we are content to quote their works. What greater proof could there be of the slenderness of our resources as compilers and of the limited extent to which the scientific spirit is cultivated by us? For elaborate histories of Japanese art we have to consult the works of Gouse, Anderson, Rein, Bowes, and others whose names even many of us hardly know. The care, taste, and thoroughness displayed by some of these foreign works are quite astounding. We cannot but feel it to be an anomaly that we should have to rely on aliens for an exhaustive and accurate history of our own achievements.*

The 東亞時論 Tō-a-jiron (The Eastern Asia Contemporary) is a magazine that has only been in existence a few months. It represents the joint efforts of two Societies, the Tō-a-kai and the Dōbun-kai (同人會), both of which were founded with the object of giving a stimulus to Chinese study, and which have now been amalgamated under the title of the Tō-a-Dōbun-kai, with Prince Kinoye as its President. The Tō-a-jiron aims at collecting and publishing information bearing on China. Among the articles published in the first two numbers are one on "Schemes for the Reform of China," by Mr. Ito Shinsaku; one on "The extension of our trade with China," by Mr. Ariga Nagahumi, and one on "The Means of Awakening China," by Mr. Uchida Kō. Leung Keichiu, the editor of the Yokohama Seigihō, contributes a letter of thanks for the help given to the cause of reform in China by the Tō-a-Dōbun-kai. Mr. Ikebe Kichitarō asks whether it is reform or a revolution that is needed in China. He criticises Marquis Ito's speech on China, delivered at the Imperial Hotel some weeks ago, observing that it was too commonplace and failed to show the enormous difficulties to be encountered by the Chinese in the path of progress. The tone of Marquis Ito's address was, according to Mr. Ikebe, too despondent.

The 清議報 Seigihō, mentioned above, is a magazine that has been started in Yokohama by Leung Keichiu and others for the purpose of ventilating Chinese topics. Its design is to enlighten Chinamen as to the condition and perils of their own country. It receives assistance from Japanese writers and though its circulation in China will no doubt be forbidden by the wary Empress Dowager, copies of the magazine will be sure to find their way to the homes of certain progressive Celestials.

* It may be some comfort to the writer of the article in the Taiyō to know that it by no means follows that the best histories are written by persons who share the nationality of the people described. Gibbon's great work may be cited as a case in point. And Taine's "History of English Literature" is pronounced to be the most readable book of its size ever published on the same subject.—(Writer of the Summary.)

The Shina Shinron (A New Treatise on China) is a work covering some 300 pages, written by Mr. Satō Kōshi and published by the Yao Publishing Company. The book is divided into eleven chapters. We briefly indicate the subjects discussed. Chap. I. deals, with the present state of China's army, navy, education, finance, trade, industry, agriculture, transport, and prevailing customs. Chap. II. treats of the Court and its relation to the people. Chap. III. gives an account of the various reform parties. Chap. IV. discusses the renovation of China. Chap. V. deals with the Russian advance and the seizure of Manchuria. Chap. VI. discourses of Russia's movements in various other Northern provinces. Chap. VII. discusses Russian policy. Chap. VIII. treats of England's designs. Chap. IX. considers the main features of the policy pursued by the great powers. Chap. X. considers Japan's attitude in reference to that policy. Chap. XI. goes minutely into the question of Japan's future policy in reference to China. The view taken by the writer is that it is quite possible for China to be saved from partition if her leading men will but stir themselves. The editor of the Nippon Shimbun, Mr. Kuga, praises the work, and says it is absurd to think that a government that has lasted 7,000 years will crumble to bits even in the presence of the destructive forces to which it is now exposed, and adds that to Mr. Satō belongs the credit of having shown in the Shina Shinron that, if China plays her cards well, she has nothing to fear from either England or Russia.

Lieut. Ogasawara Chōsei, a naval officer, has published a "History of the Imperial Japanese Navy." The only other history of the kind that exists is Mr. Ishihara's Kaigun-Yenkaku shi. The scope of the latter work is very confined, and is altogether surpassed by Lieut. Ogasawara's book, which is modelled on the lines laid down by Captain Mahan in his "Influence of Sea Power on History," though of course it is only a very imperfect imitation of that great work. The volume is published by the Shunyō-do and sells at one yen per copy.

Mr. Sasa Masakazu, of the Second Higher School, is the author of a little book covering 150 pages on "Leading Features in the History of Japanese Literature," which is highly praised by the Teikoku Bungaku. According to the review of the work which appears in this organ, Mr. Sasa's object in writing it was to give a more full account of the literature of comparatively recent times than is usually done in books of this class, and to make clear to ordinary students the nature of the changes which literature has undergone within the past few hundred years. Verses of every kind have received special attention. The work is designed to be used as a class book in Middle Schools.

No 11 of the Gwaibō Jihō discusses many of the current topics of the day. The articles on foreign affairs are mostly from the pen of Dr. Ariga. Bismarck's treatment of opposition political parties, the German Emperor's Palestine Tour, the Fashoda Affair, and other subjects of the kind all receive notice at the hands of the indefatigable editor, but the article of most interest to readers in this part of the world is one entitled Shina Hōsenron (The Preservation of China). The writer observes that there are two ways in which a nation may be saved from collapse. It may be saved by reliance on its own strength or it may be saved by the help of other powers. He goes on to show that China cannot stand alone, that she is quite dependent on outside help. There are two forms that this help may take. It may be given in the form of a guarantee by alliance (dōmei tamō), or it may be vouchsafed by what is called a collective or combined guarantee (rengō tamō). Now the difficulty connected with the adoption by China of the first-named policy is that by allying herself with certain powers, say England and America, for instance, she would stir up the enmity of the non-allied powers, Russia, France, Germany, Belgium, Italy, and, perhaps, Japan. Such an alliance would be sure to increase the chance of war, as it would intensify the rivalry between the Great Powers. The only safe method for China to pursue is to endeavour to induce the chief Powers concerned to unite in preserving her integrity. The adoption of this plan succeeded in the Balkan peninsula and there is nothing to prevent its succeeding in China if it be given a fair chance. This collective guarantee, if it could be effected, would put a stop to all secret treaties and understandings between China and individual nations and would enable each country concerned to compete in a fair manner for its share of China's trade. It seems to me, says Dr. Ariga, that as a final settlement the plan of a collective guarantee, in which all the Powers concerned are included, must be adopted. If China should ally herself to two or three Western Powers and thereby force on war with other Powers, after the fighting is over, both sides will have to come to some agreement as to their future attitude to the Chinese nation, and a collective guarantee of China's integrity and independence would be the most probable result of such a war. It would save expense and bloodshed if this arrangement could be effected at once. And if some of the leading Powers would take the initiative in seeking to bring about this solution of the present difficulty, the majority of the nations concerned would, I venture to think, fall into line. Those which refused to do so could effect little against so formidable a confederacy as the one under consideration. In discussing this question there is one sentiment that we cannot get rid of, says Dr. Ariga, and that is, that Asia should be kept for Asiatics. There is something entirely wrong in the idea of a Concert of European Powers settling the affairs of the Far East. But with things situated as they are, the best method for China to adopt is to favour an arrangement whereby the Powers will be a curb on each other, while they all combine in preserving her independence.

Professor Terao, in the pages of the Gwaikō Jihō, gives an account of the part that he and a Mr. Takahashi played at the International Conference held at the Hague last September. He says that nothing could have exceeded the attention that he received while in Holland, and that his paper on "The relations between Europe and Japan down to the middle of the Nineteenth Century," delivered in French, was listened to with considerable interest. Professor Terao attended the Conference as the representative of the Japanese Diplomatic Society called the Nihon no Kokusai-hōgakkai. He is desirous of establishing closer relations between this Society and foreign Associations having similar objects in view.

In No. 180, the Fūsoku Gakō, writing on provincialisms, gives an instance of no less than 13 variations for the same idea. The words applied to clothes cut too short for the wearer are as follow:—

Tōkyō, Tenteraten*	Kiō, Tsunatsuratsun
Osaka, Chenchōchon	Huashima, Tsunatsuruten
Tajima, Chouchokochon	Omi, Chapinchopin
Izumi, Tongatonga	Okayama, Chouchoko
Hariu, Chopin	Awa, Chinchikorin
Chikuzen, Chochonkorin	Kii, Sutteko
Owari, Chinchokorin

Under the title of the Nihon Kyōiku Gakufu (學風) no henssen, Mr. Tanimoto Tōshi discusses in an essay, 30 pages in length, the underlying principles of Japanese education in past ages and at the present time. We can pretend to do no more than give the gist of the article. It may be well to state that Mr. Tanimoto is a well-known writer on the subject of education and that his writings are characterised by fervour and lucidity. In all times there has been in Japan, says Mr. Tanimoto, some leading principle that may be called the ethos of the time, to which the opinions of individuals have been subjected. The earliest recognisable principle Mr. Tanimoto calls the 天真爛漫主義 Tenshinram-man Shugi, "The principle of being true to nature, pure and simple." The youth of very early times was taught how to obey and to revere his parents and ancestors. Then came the introduction of Chinese literature, and with it a desire for ornament sprang up. Things were no longer described in simple language, but presented in a pompous form. The general effect of the introduction of foreign literature and the study of foreign ways was the prevalence of luxury, specially in the Ashikaga age. As a reaction from this, and yet contemporary with it, there came into existence that code of honour and manners known as the bushidō, which was in every way superior to any rule of life that existed in those days, and there was also a high class refinement of taste and manners among a small section of the community which exercised a very beneficial influence over certain minds. This principle Mr. Tanimoto calls Gashu (雅趣) Shugi. Then came the dark ages, when the one object of those in power was to make good soldiers. How to produce energy was the great question of that time. Under the Tokugawa rule Chinese ethics were keenly studied, and exercised a predominating influence over the educational policy of the Government. Combined with the prominence given to ethics, and in many respects as a result of this, there was an enormous amount of constraint and hampering of thought. Men were only allowed to think in grooves. Moreover, science was held in contempt, and, notwithstanding all the political morality taught, there was no development of public spirit. With the Meiji era came foreign learning and the illumination which accompanies it. For a while, that is, speaking roughly, down to the 15th

* Tentsuruten and tsunatsuruten are, we are told, also used in Tōkyō to express the same idea.

year of Meiji, Japan's educational policy may be said to have been European. But after that Nationalism began to assert itself and an enormous impetus was given to it by the Imperial Rescript on Education published in the 23rd year of Meiji, which in the plainest terms based the educational policy of the country on nationalism. This return to nationalism, says Mr. Tanimoto, at the close of the 19th century, is no other than the re-adoption of the principle of our early ancestors, faithfulness to nature pure and simple. To make the needs and the welfare of the nation the basis of our system of education is the only true principle to be followed.

A DANGEROUS PASTIME.

Superintendent Okada, of the Bluff Police Station, desires to call attention to the dangerous practice now so common with European boys in Yokohama, of shooting with air guns and parlor rifles. The Superintendent states that he has made it a rule, on observing lads shooting in the public streets, to send a constable to complain to their parents, but apparently his caution has had little effect, for the nuisance flourishes in vigour. It is only a few weeks ago that two accidents which might have had very serious results occurred, and the Superintendent considers that it is important that the amusement should be stopped before some fatality happens. We have been shown one of the bullets picked up by a constable, and though it probably would not cause a dangerous wound on the body it could easily make a very serious face wound. We are informed by one resident that he actually saw a lad fire a parlor rifle (not an air gun) at one of the miserable dray horses on the Bluff. The pellet penetrated the horse's skin, and made the blood flow, greatly pleasing the little savage, who laughed cheerily at the remonstrance of the driver. The degree of sensibility in a Yokohama dray horse, used to kicks and blows from its earliest years, is probably not much higher than that of a sponge or sea-anemone, it may even be conceded that it would feel strange and uncomfortable if not ill treated. But in the case of a high-spirited animal the results of such a flea-dash trick might have been very serious. The public which was so horrified over the fate of the celebrated Sapporo pig has not, apparently, brought its telescopic humanity to bear on matters nearer home, but we trust that giving publicity to Superintendent Okada's warning will draw attention to the matter, and lead to the wholesale confiscation of these dangerous toys, or at least to a restriction of their very common use.

THEFT FROM A GODOWN.

The Yokohama District Court had before it on Monday the case against Shimada Motokichi, charged with stealing seventeen bales of yarn from the godown of Messrs. C. J. Strome and Co. Four other Japanese were charged with assisting to dispose of the stolen goods, and one Hirota was charged with purchasing them. Shimada stole the goods on the night of Nov. 17th, and sold them to Hirota for 28 yen, dividing the proceeds among the other four men. Fujita, Nagashima, and Haseono (for helping Shimada in disposing of the stolen goods) were sentenced each to four months' imprisonment with a fine of ten yen, and ordered to be placed under police surveillance for six months. Mami (who also rendered assistance to Shimada) and Hirota (who bought the goods) were sentenced each to two months' imprisonment with a fine of ten yen, and ordered to be placed under police surveillance for six months. Judgment against Shimada was reserved.

IMPERIAL DIET.

THURSDAY, 19TH JANUARY.

HOUSE OF PEERS.

The House met at 10.30 a.m.

COPYRIGHTS.

A Government Bill embodying a project of Copyright Law was read for the first time. The Government Delegate explained that as Japan would join the International Copyright Union in July next, when the Revised Treaties go into operation, it was necessary to enact laws suitable for that purpose.

Mr. Kubota Yuzuru objected that Japan, being still in the translation period of her modern progress, would be greatly inconvenienced by the enactment of law forbidding her to make free use of foreign publications. She was importing all the civilization of Western countries, and should have unrestricted access to the literature embodying that civilization. What object did the Government seek to attain in enacting such a law?

The Government Delegate replied that Japan's entry into the International Copyright Union was one of the conditions of Treaty Revision. It was possible that the measure might be attended with disadvantages, but to raise objections to it now was too late.

Mr. Kubota expressed surprise at such an answer. Was the House to understand that the Government had deliberately pledged itself to a course which would prove disadvantageous to Japan?

The Government Delegate suggested that the query had better take the shape of a written Question to the Government, and the Bill was handed to a Special Committee, as were also three other Bills, one for amending the present Patents Law, one for protecting Designs, and one for protecting Trade Marks.

CARE OF THE INSANE.

A Government Bill was then read embodying a lengthy project of Law for the better Care and Supervision of Persons Mentally Deranged. In the Statement of Motives it was explained that under the very defective system now in vogue, the treatment of lunatics was not under proper control, and society suffered not a little in consequence. Statistics for 1897 showed that there were 21,104 demented persons in the empire. Of these the number receiving treatment in hospital was 2,923, and among them 938 were fettered. Those cared for in the houses of relatives or friends aggregated 18,181, of whom 3,823 had to be kept in chains. It further appeared that there had been 708 suicides and 297 attempted suicides by persons of unsound mind; that 1,305 persons had received bodily hurt at the hands of lunatics, that 112 conflagrations had been caused by them, and that property had been injured in 77,134 cases, the total losses resulting from these destructive acts being 14,876 yen. The necessity of enacting some better system of control was therefore quite evident.

The Bill was handed to a Special Committee.

GOVERNMENT BILLS.

The following Government Bills, sent up from the House of Representatives, were then read for the first time and handed to the same Special Committee:

Three Bills for including the Tobacco Monopoly among the ordinary State Industries, instead of keeping it as a separate undertaking, and for transferring its fixed capital and working-capital funds to the accounts of the State Industries instead of making them matters of special account.

Bill empowering the Government to make issues of Public Undertakings Bonds and Railway Bonds in advance of the time fixed by Law, if the condition of the money market made such a course advisable.

Bill empowering the Government to make drafts upon the Indemnity in lieu of issuing Bonds, should such a course seem advisable; provided that the amounts of the drafts be subsequently restored to the Indemnity out of the proceeds of Bond issues.

Bill empowering the Treasury to temporarily draft portions of the Indemnity into the Ordinary Revenue, provided that the monies thus drafted be subsequently restored.

Bill for abolishing the system of Special Account with regard to Consolidated Bonds, the whole issue having been already floated.

Bill for increasing the Working Capital of the Mint.

Bill for amending the system of Accounts of Government Railways in Hokkaido.

Bill for including in the Government Undertakings Accounts a sum of 4½ million yen, being the Permanent Working Capital of the Iron Foundry.

The House rose at 11.30 a.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SŌUL-CHEMULPO RAILWAY SYNDICATE LOAN.

The House met at 1.10 p.m., and proceeded to discuss Supplementary Budget No. 3 for the fiscal year 1898-9, proposing an appropriation of 1,800,000 yen to be lent to the Sŏul-Chemulpo Railway Company. Mr. Sakatani, Government Delegate, explained that the concession for the Sŏul-Chemulpo Railway had originally been obtained by Mr. J. K. Morse, an American citizen, who had expected to obtain the funds necessary for its construction from American capitalists. Failing in that expectation, however, he had offered to sell the concession in Japan, and a syndicate for its purchase had readily been formed, the country being, just at that time, in the height of its mania for industrial enterprise. It had therefore been agreed that the Syndicate should take over the railway when completed at a million dollars (American gold). Some delays had occurred, however, in the construction, especially with regard to the bridge over the Han River outside Sŏul, the railway contractors and the Syndicate entertaining different views as to the height that should be given to the road-way of the bridge in order to provide against danger from floods. Finally it had been agreed, that though the work was not completed, the line should be taken over as it stood, the Syndicate paying 1,800,000 yen. But the Syndicate found it quite impossible to obtain the money in the present state of the market, and had consequently petitioned the Government to lend its assistance. The Government believed that the interests of the country would be promoted by such a course, and the House's consent was now asked for a loan of 1,800,000 yen to the Syndicate, the conditions being that the Syndicate should complete the work of construction, and should pay interest at the rate of 5 per cent. on the loan provided that the net earnings of the line amounted to 5 per cent. of the paid-up capital.

In answer to questions, Mr. Sakatani explained that about 7½ miles of the road were finished, and that the cost of carrying it to completion would be about 750,000 yen. The Government was to have the line hypothecated to it as security for the loan. The original agreement with Mr. Morse had been concluded in May, 1897, and in October of the same year, the Specie Bank had made to him an advance of a million yen on account of the Syndicate.

Mr. Hoshi Toru questioned the Delegate closely as to this transaction with the Specie Bank, his object being to show that Count Okuma, who was Minister of State for Foreign Affairs at the time, had authorized the Bank to lend the money, thus making the Government responsible without obtaining the consent of the legislature.

The Government Delegate admitted that the advisability of making the advance had been suggested officially to the Bank, but showed a disposition to avoid the issue raised by Mr. Hoshi.

Mr. Inoue Kakugoro said that, as one of the promoters of the Syndicate, he was acquainted with all the circumstances, and would disclose them if it was deemed expedient.

At this stage the Government sent a message asking the House to go into secret session, which was done at 1.40 p.m.

At 3.35 p.m. the doors were opened, and it was announced that the debate had ended in the House's endorsement of the necessity of the steps taken by the Government. The Budget was therefore passed.

OTHER MATTERS.

Supplementary Budget No. 6 for 1898-9 was then taken. It provides for an appropriation of 37,102 yen to extend the storage accommodation for inflammable substances, such as kerosene and alcohol, at Yokohama. The House voted the Budget unanimously.

A Government Bill, sent down from the Peers, for altering the Prefectural Boundaries of Chiba and Ibaraki, was then passed.

A private Bill then came up for debate. It provided that with the exception of cases specially dealt with by law or ordinance, all administrative abuses of private rights should be judiciable by an Administrative Court. The object of the measure, as explained in the exposé of motives, was to extend the sphere of private rights and to dispense with superfluous procedure.

The Government Delegate opposed the Bill, but the House passed it, and handed to a Special Committee a correlated Bill relating to the carrying of complaints before an Administrative Court.

The Special Committee reported in favour of a private Bill for amending the Barristers Law, in the sense of providing that judges or prosecutors who had been retired on the ground of old age or inability to discharge their function, should not be permitted to practise as barristers.

This Bill was opposed by the Government Delegate, as involving a violation of private rights, and was rejected by the House.

The President announced that two Bills had been received from the Government, one providing for the imposition of a House Tax, the other for an increase of the Tax on Soy.

The following two Bills were handed to Special Committee:—

A private Bill providing for the organization of Agricultural Guilds, experience having shown that mutual consultation and co-operation on the part of farmers are often necessary for putting various essential measures into practice.

A Bill for amending the Pawnbrokers' Law, in the sense of rescinding all legal limitations of the rate of interest, and empowering Prefectural Governors to impose any restrictions suggested by local conditions or the state of the money market. The Law now provides the following maxima for rates of interest charged by pawnbrokers:—

For loans not exceeding 25 yen, 1 yen per cent. per month.
For loans not exceeding 1 yen, 4 per cent. per month.
For loans not exceeding 5 yen, 3 per cent. per month.
For loans not exceeding 10 yen, 2½ per cent. per month.

In the exposé of motives attached to the Bill it was stated that, in times like the present, when the rate of interest on money rises high in the market, the above restrictions, so far from protecting the people, prevent them from obtaining from pawn brokers accommodation which is often most serviceable in the affairs of their daily life.

The House then unanimously adopted a Representation similar to that introduced some days ago in the House of Peers by Viscount Tani for granting a sum of public money to effect improvements at the Miyazaki and Sano shrines on the occasion of the great festival of Jimmu Tenno next April.

The House rose at 5.05 p.m.

On the 20th instant neither of the Houses sat, the members being engaged in Committee work.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 21ST.

HOUSE OF PEERS.

HOKKAIDO ABORIGINES.

The House met at 10.20 a.m., and proceeded to read for the first time a Government Bill (sent up from the House of Representatives) for the better Protection of the Hokkaido Aborigines. The Government Delegate, in answer to questions, said that the number of the aborigines did not now exceed 17,000, though it had been three or four times as large 50 years ago. Recent statistics did not show any marked diminution, yet that the race was dying out could scarcely be doubted. The children of the aborigines, when educated side by side with Japanese children, did not betray special inferiority in general studies, but were conspicuously deficient in aptitude for mathematics. The Bill was handed to a Special Committee.

SUPPLEMENTARY BUDGETS.

The President announced the receipt of two Supplementary Budgets for 1898-9 from the Lower House; one providing an appropriation for increased warehousing accommodation for inflammable substances at Yokohama; the other sanctioning a loan of 1,800,000 yen to the Sôul-Chemulpo Railway Syndicate. He said that the Government wished these Budgets to be treated as urgency measures, and the House proceeded to debate the nature of the instruction that should be given to the Budget Committee as to the time occupied in examining the Budgets. Viscount Soga and other members of the Opposition objected to any special expedition, and after a short but animated debate, the House decided by 76 votes to 75 that the Committee should be instructed to present its report as soon as possible.

QUARANTINE.

The Second Reading was then taken of the Bill for amending the system of Medical Inspection at ports of entry for ships coming from Southern China, in the sense of making the system continuously operative. The Bill was passed without opposition.

THE SÔUL-CHEMULPO RAILWAY.

Viscount Tani, on behalf of the Budget Committee, asked permission to report on Supplementary Budget No. 6, handed to the Committee a short time previously, for granting a loan of 1,800,000 yen to the Sôul-Chemulpo Railway Syndicate. The Committee unanimously recommended the Budget for approval, and the House went into secret session to debate the details, finally passing the Budget almost unanimously.

BANKS.

Two Bills for amending the Bank Regulations so as to bring them into accord with the new Civil Code, were then carried through their Second and Third Readings without debate.

ALCOHOL, SAKÉ, &c.

The Second Reading of the Government Bill (sent up from the Lower House) amending the Statutory Tariff in the sense of increasing the import duties on alcohol, tobacco and Sake, was then voted, but the Reading was not taken at once.

EDUCATION.

A Representation for increasing the High Schools and the Universities stood next on the Order. Its signatories urged that whereas the number of Middle Schools had increased from 82 in 1894 to 157 in 1897, and the number of students attending them from 22,000 to 52,800, the accommodation at the High Schools and the Universities had not been extended in any way. There were only 5 High Schools just as there had been ten years ago. The consequence was that thousands of youths had to stop their education half-way. For example, 3,170 students had presented themselves for admission to the High Schools in 1898, but only 1,590 had been admitted. The need for more High Schools, and consequently for increased accommodation at the Universities, was clamant. The House adopted the Representation without any dissenting voice.

THE BUDGET.

Viscount Tani, as Chairman of the Budget Committee, stated that the Committee ought to present its Budget report on the 24th instant, but had commissioned him to ask for an extension of time until the 7th of February. The House assented, and rose at 3.40 p.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House met at 1.25 p.m.,

THE HOUSE TAX.

A Government Bill providing for a Tax on Houses was read for the First Time. The Bill provides that each house shall pay a tax of 5 per cent. of the renting value, except in the case of houses whose renting value is below 5 yen per annum, such houses being altogether exempted. For the purpose of determining the rental value, an Examining Committee is to be elected in each urban or rural district, the Committee to consist of 7 members where a district has upwards of 1,000 houses; of 5 members where the number of houses is less than 1,000 but not less than 500, and of 3 members where the houses fall below 500; the tax to become leviable from April 1st, 1899.

The House showed a capacious disposition towards this Bill, several members vehemently demanding some proof that the proposed tax would not be a direct addition to the Local House Rate already levied, although such a duplication of imposts is forbidden by law. The Government Delegate promised that full explanations would be given in the committee room, and the Bill was finally handed to a Special Committee of 27, as was also a Bill for doubling the tax upon Soy, a measure which is expected to yield an additional revenue of 1,590,000 yen.

FOREIGN LOANS.

A Bill was then read empowering the Government to have recourse, if expedient, to the foreign money market for raising loans already sanctioned by law. The bonds thus issued may have their denominations stated in terms of the currency of the country where they are sold, and the details as to ante-redemption period, method of issue, redemption interest and, etc., are to be determinable by Departmental Notification, provided that redemption must be fully effected within 55 years from the date of issue.

Mr. Tanaka Shozo seized this occasion to attack the Government. He declared that all these Bills for increased taxation and loans showed the Cabinet to be possessed with a spendthrift mania and to be without any sense of its financial responsibility. Four or five million yen a year might easily be saved if official corruption were effectually checked. Had the Government any genuine intention of putting the finances in order?

Baron Tajiri, Vice-Minister of Finance, replied that it was precisely for the purpose of putting the finances in order that these various bills were introduced.

The Bill was handed to a Special Committee.

LETHAL WEAPONS.

A Government Bill for amending the Law for the control of Lethal Weapons, Gunpowder and other explosives, was read for the first time, and the Government Delegate having explained that the law now in force for the Control of Arms, &c., had not been changed since 1872, or the law for the Control of Gunpowder since 1884, the Bill was handed to a Special Committee.

FORMOSA APPEALS.

The next Bill on the Order was a Government measure giving to litigants or persons accused of crime in Formosa the right of Appeal to the Supreme Court in Japan. At present an appeal can not be carried beyond the local appeal court, and no tribunal can be invoked to determine whether an error of law has not been committed. The Bill was handed to a Committee, as was also a Bill (Government) for amending the Law of Registration so as to bring it into accord with the new Civil Code.

MEDICAL PRACTITIONERS.

The Second Reading of the Private Bill for the Organization of Associations of Medical Practitioners was then taken. Several members denounced the measure, first as an unwarrantable interference with the rights of the individual, from the point of view not only of the medical man who would be compelled to join the associations, but also of the person employing him whose freedom of choice would be circumscribed; secondly, because the associations would enable their members to combine, as monopolists, for exploiting the public; and thirdly, because a majority of the best men would be too busy to attend the meetings of an association, so that the great power vested in it would be exercised by the unemployed and least competent members of the profession. Mr. Shimada Saburo read letters from various parts of the country, objecting to the measure, but the House voted for the Second Reading by 160 to 61.

FIRE DAMAGE.

A Private Bill for amending the Civil Code was introduced. The purpose of the amendment is to abrogate the provisions which render a householder liable for the damage which other people may sustain owing to a fire breaking out on the premises occupied by him. The introducers of the Bill contend that to impose such liability is entirely contrary to the custom of Japan and to the principles of humanity, for the breaking out of a conflagration can scarcely ever be provided against, inflicts the greatest loss on the people of the house where it occurs, and should entitle a man to the compassion of his neighbours instead of exposing him to their demands. The Bill was handed to a Special Committee.

SUBSIDIES.

The House then adopted, for presentation to the Government a Petition praying that the annual subsidy of 6,000 yen now granted for a steam-boat service to Oshima and other islands in Kagoshima Prefecture be increased to 24,000 yen.

The House rose at 4.05 p.m.

MONDAY, JANUARY 23RD.

HOUSE OF PEERS.

The House did not sit, the Committees alone assembling.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TOBACCO.

The House met at 1.10 p.m., and received the Special Committee's report on the Government Bill for empowering the Authorities to include imported tobacco in the State monopoly. The majority of the Committee favoured the Bill, but the House decided to postpone the Second Reading.

LAW COURTS.

A Government Bill for establishing new Law Courts in various places which have hitherto been within the jurisdiction of distant tribunals—as the Bonin Islands, Rinkiu, &c.—was then passed through its Second and Third Readings without debate.

POSTAGE RATES.

The next Bill on the Order was a Government measure for increasing the rates of postage. Two principal reasons for this measure were given; one, that since the present rates were fixed the prices of commodities and consequently the cost of the service had greatly appreciated; the other, that owing to the marked change which has been taken place in the gold-price of silver, the postal rates of foreign countries, which had been taken as a basis in compiling the Japanese schedule, now represented the double of their original figures, when converted into Japanese currency. The Government considered, therefore, that to raise the rates by 50 per cent. would be a legitimate means of obtaining funds to make up the present deficiency of revenue. The proposed schedule is:—

LETTERS.

Weight 4 momme or less	3	sen
For every additional 4 momme	Post Cards	3	sen
Single Post Card	15	sen
Return Post Card	3	sen

NEWSPAPERS AND PERIODICALS.

Up to 30 momme	15	sen.
For every additional 30 momme	15	sen.
Publications issued 3 times a week or oftener at fixed time, for every single number up to 20 momme	0.5	sen.
For every additional 20 momme	0.5	sen.

It is expected that the revenue obtained by these changes will amount to 1,580,000 yen. The Bill was handed to a Special Committee.

A number of Government Bills seeking post-facto approval for various expenditures and appropriations in the fiscal years 1896-7 and 1897-8 were then handed to a Special Committee, and the House, after passing a Representation urging that a special office be established for the superintendence of Shinto affairs, rose at 2.25 p.m.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 24TH.

HOUSE OF PEERS.

THE REVISED COMMERCIAL CODE.

The House met at 10.15 a.m., and proceeded to read the Revised Commercial Code a second time, finally passing it as presented by the Government.

INCOME TAX.

The Second Reading of the Revised Income Tax Law (sent up from the Lower House) was then taken. Mr. Mizuno proposed amendments in the sense of a minute classification of incomes from 30,000 yen upwards, and the lowering of the minimum taxable income from 300 yen to 250 yen annually. The House adopted the latter proposal, but rejected the former, and voted the other clauses of the Bill as amended by the Special Committee.

LOCAL BOUNDARIES.

A Government Bill (sent up from the Lower House) for changing certain local boundaries in Chiba and Ibaraki Prefectures was next passed.

LAW COURTS.

On coming to the Second Reading of a private Bill (sent up from the Lower House) for extending the Jurisdiction of Administrative Courts, the Government Delegate opposed the measure, pointing out that the principle of generalization on which it was based was in advance of the degree of civilization attained by Japan. Austria was the only European country where that principle was adopted as a basis for instituting suits, and in Austria special arrangements existed. Elsewhere the principle of specification held, and the Government considered the latter more suitable in Japan. The Cabinet contemplated introducing a Bill next session for the purpose of amending certain features of the existing law, but without any change of basic principle.

A proposal to postpone the discussion of the Bill was negative, and it was handed to a Special Committee.

The House rose at 2.20 p.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House did not meet.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 25TH.

HOUSE OF PEERS.

The House of Peers did not meet.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House of Representatives met at 1.10 p.m., and discharged the following business:—

VOTE OF CONDOLENCE.

A Resolution was unanimously adopted that the condolences of the House should be sent to the family of the late Count Kato.

BUDGETS AND OTHER BILLS.

Two Supplementary Budgets, No. 3 and No. 5, for the fiscal year 1898-9 were passed as amended by the Budget Committee.

The Second Reading of the Bill for imposing a Tonnage Tax was passed.

The Government Bills for amending the Newspaper Regulations (in the sense of permitting foreigners to engage in journalistic enterprise); for amending the Law of Security in Civil Suits; for amending the Chemists' and Druggists' Regulations; and for abolishing the System of State Purchase of Sugar in Okinawa Prefecture, were all passed.

The following Bills were handed to Special Committees:—

A Government Bill (sent down from the House of Peers) for amending the Banking Regulations so as to bring them into accord with the Revised Commercial Code.

TOBACCO MONOPOLY.

The Second Reading of the Bill for amending the Law of the Monopoly of Leaf Tobacco was then taken. Amendments were proposed for the purpose of removing the restrictions which certain clauses of the Bill seem calculated to impose on dealers in tobacco, but the House rejected these proposals, and passed the Bill as recommended by the Special Committee.

MEDICAL ASSOCIATIONS.

The Special Committee on the Medical Associations Bill having reported favourably, and the Government Delegate, Dr. Hasegawa, having spoken in support of the Bill, its Second Reading was voted. (The purpose of this Bill has already been explained.)

FIRE DAMAGES.

A private Bill for changing the system of responsibility enacted by the new Civil Code in the case of conflagrations was then read for the first time and handed to a Special Committee.

The House rose at 3.05 p.m., the President announcing that a majority of the members being engaged on committee work, there would be no sitting until the 29th instant.

LORD CHARLES BERESFORD'S FAREWELL.

A JAPANESE RECEPTION.

Lord Charles Beresford left Yokohama for America on Wednesday by the Toyo Kisen Kaisha steamer America Maru.

At 9.30 his lordship was present at a reception given by Mr. Otani Kahei, the well-known Yokohama merchant, in his pretty villa at Isayama. There were present: Baron Sannomiya, Grand Master of Ceremonies to His Majesty the Emperor; Governor Asada of Kanagawa Kencho; Mr. Minakami, Superintendent of the Yokohama Customs; Messrs. R. Kinsura, F. Watanabe, T. Aoki, S. Tanaka, and T. Okada (Secretary), representing the Yokohama Chamber of Commerce, of which Mr. Otani is President; Mr. Konosuke Otani, President of the Eastern Japan Trading Company; Mr. G. Umeda, Mayor of Yokohama; Mr. R. Ruoye, Secretary of Kanagawa Kencho; and Mr. S. Sugiyama, Councillor of the Kencho. The foreigners present were the Marquis C. de Nemhrini Gonzaga, of Kanagawa Kencho; Mr. H. A. C. Bonar, British Consul; Mr. J. P. Mollison, Mr. R. D. Robison, Mr. H. M. Bevis, and Mr. Robin Gray (Lord Charles's Secretary).

After the reception the guests were invited to partake of a cold collation served in one of the large Japanese-style rooms of Mr. Otani's residence.

The Mayor of YOKOHAMA spoke a few words welcoming the visitor in the name of the City, and Mr. OTANI then made a short speech in Japanese, of which the following is a translation:—On behalf of the Committee of the Yokohama Chamber of Commerce I beg to tender our warmest thanks to Lord Charles Beresford for the great honour he has conferred upon us to-day by his presence at this small gathering. We understand your lordship has said that Great Britain and Japan have both the same interests in the Far East politically and commercially, and that consequently closer relations must be drawn between the two countries. We can assure your lordship that we take great interest in what you said. After your enquiries into the commercial conditions of our neighbour China on behalf of the Associated Chambers of Commerce of Great Britain, we should be very glad on this occasion to hear a few words from your Lordship as to our trade. Your lordship's mission will greatly benefit the commerce and trade of the Orient. Although your stay in Japan has been very short and your lordship has been all this time very busy, you have been gracious enough to honour us, previous to your departure, with your lordship's presence which we very highly appreciate. We wish your lordship a happy and successful journey to your country.

LORD CHARLES BERESFORD, in reply, said:—Mr. Otani, your Excellency, and Gentlemen,—I am very grateful for the remarks that have been made. You said, Mr. Otani, that my visit here was a very short one. That I am sorry to say is the case as far as I am personally concerned, but I have been here quite long enough to do what I intended to do when I made up my mind to return by Japan. That was to make out from the Chambers of Commerce, as well as some of the leading men, what the Japanese view of the question of future trade in China was. Therefore I am perfectly pleased and satisfied with my visit as far as that goes. From the personal point of view I am extremely sorry I cannot stay longer, as I should have had the opportunity of learning more of your country and of extending my enjoyment of the civilities and courtesies which have been so freely offered me. But the main point is, what are the views of this country as represented by its Chambers of Commerce and its representative men. I am extremely sorry, gentlemen, that I could not stay longer in order to obtain more fully the views of your Chamber, but I have seen representatives of the Chambers of Commerce of Kobe, Kyoto, and Osaka, and I may say Tokyo, and I have a very fair idea of what their views of the matter are. It is a matter of supreme satisfaction to me to find that the views I have held are very much those held by your Chambers of Commerce, and that is that the interests of Great Britain and Japan are absolutely identical, and if we wish to continue the condition of trade as it is in China, and wish to develop it as it should be developed, we must hold together and stick together as tight as ever we can in the future. In saying that, gentlemen, I do not at all wish it to be inferred that that is a threat to other countries, but we read history, and we observe motives, and there is no doubt that the policy of some other countries is to take territory, and, when that territory is taken, to put tariffs on. If we have a clear good understanding, if we have a clear and positive policy, then the other countries will understand what we would do in certain eventualities, and I think if they understood that, you would find that those eventualities would not occur. This proposal, gentlemen, tends towards peace, which is the greatest interest we can have in carrying on trade and commerce in China. I have to thank you most warmly, Mr. Otani, for receiving me here, and you, gentlemen, most warmly for your kind welcome and for the appreciation of the ideas which I have had to offer in this country.

MR. ROBISON, in the name of the Yokohama community, expressed the gratitude of all foreigners for the views expressed by the Japanese on the occasion of Lord Charles's visit.

A general interchange of compliments followed, and the healths of both host and guests were honoured.

At the conclusion LORD CHARLES BERESFORD said:—

Before I go I wish to express my gratitude and my thorough appreciation of the honour Mr. Otani and the Yokohama Chamber of Commerce have paid me personally by asking me to come here. I understand that the Japanese Chamber of Commerce is one of the most practical and one of the most powerful in the whole of your Empire, and that there is a great deal of sympathy between the Japanese and the Foreign Chambers. I am sure it that sympathy continues and becomes even more strongly cemented it will be to the benefit of the trade and commerce of Yokohama in particular and of the Empire generally.—(Applause.)

The party then broke up, most of the guests accompanying the noble guest to the Hatoba to see him off. Baron Sannomiya was, it is understood the bearer of a farewell message from the Emperor.

At the Hatoba, in addition to the gentlemen mentioned above, were His Honour Judge Wilkinson, Mr. James Dodds, Mr. W. F. Mitchell, and the Rev. E. Champneys Irvine. His lordship was accompanied on board by Mr. Mitchell, the Rev. E. C. Irvine, Mr. Dodds, Mr. Robison, and Mr. Bevis. Speaking at the last moment he urged again the necessity of a fourfold alliance; the international union was like a haystack and a lighted fuse; it was easy enough to quench the fuse, but not so easy the haystack, and after the conflagration there would be no haystack left.

He was rejoiced to learn that his stay had largely conduced to the growth of the good feeling which had sprung up lately between Great Britain and Japan.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE MEGURO LEPER'S HOME.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

SIR,—Some response has come to the appeal recently appearing in the Japan Mail, in which aid was requested for the Leper's Home in Meguro, at least to the extent of the purchase of a bicycle for the manager, who is obliged to take almost daily, walks into the city, but for whom in the non-robust state of his health, much walking is particularly injurious. As a start has been made for this worthy object it seems a pity that it cannot be completed. The Japan Mail will kindly receive funds from those for whom it is more convenient than to forward to Meguro direct.

H. F. P.

THE U.S. COLONIAL POLICY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

SIR,—The appended article is much talked about, and lauded by the "expansionists" as an unanswerable exposition; while even those adverse to "expansion" seem ready to acknowledge that it is the strongest presentation of the "imperial" policy. To me it appears feeble and unconvincing—the talk of a theorist who is wholly ignorant of practical Oriental conditions. If it is the best argument that can be made on that side, there is mighty little logic to support President McKinley.

You may not have noticed one singular incident in the political development at Washington. The Democratic Congressmen were absolutely arrayed against the Treaty with Spain, and meant to oppose it bitterly; but Bryan—late Democratic candidate for President—suddenly appeared in Washington, and by personal exhortation brought many of them to promise acquiescence in the Treaty itself. Not that Bryan believes in adopting the Philippines. He is dead against it. But he wants the Treaty accepted, leaving the future of the Philippine question to be dealt with by Congress—an odd situation, but explicable, perhaps, on solid grounds of statesmanship. What Hoar and the other Republican antagonists of Philippine annexation will do, we have yet to see.

Yours truly,

H.

PROF. DAVIDSON FOR IMPERIALISM.

THE NOTED AUTHOR AND LECTURER REPLIES TO THE ARGUMENTS AGAINST IMPERIALISM AND PRESENTS POINTS IN ITS FAVOUR.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE WORLD."

Will the anti-expansionist World permit an expansionist to enumerate and briefly answer the leading arguments against expansion and then to present a few points in its favour?

So far as I have seen, the arguments are these:—
1. In expanding we abandon our traditional policy, laid down in Washington's Farewell Address.

Answer.—All progress means, more or less, the abandonment of tradition. Democracy itself is the abandonment of nearly all the past political traditions of the race. In a profound sense we prepare for the future by impiety to the past. Socrates, Jesus, Paul, Luther, Washington, were guilty of this impiety. Let us imitate them, firmly convinced that we understand our times and needs better than they did or could do. It is a pedantic formalism calling itself consistency, a conservative dogmatism, that clings to the letter that killeth and neglects the spirit that maketh alive. No constitutional or other formula, however logical can direct the march of human history. "Law is mighty, mightier is Need," says Goethe.

2. By expansion we entangle ourselves in foreign politics, thus jeopardizing our peace and comfort.

Ans.—This is a chimerical argument. We must not walk in the world's streets or highways for fear of getting into quarrels! We do not teach our boys this—hardly even our girls. No commercial, cosmopolitan nation can sequester itself. We are out in the great world now, and a few towers of refuge on its broad bosom can only add to our safety. Does any one seriously think of contesting new possessions with us?

3. By assuming to govern inferior races we belie our fundamental principle that all government must be with the consent of the governed.

Ans.—At no time in our history has this principle been really carried out. When it was written down our country contained many myriads of slaves, and to-day our Indians, Alaskan, Chinese and women are governed without their consent.

4. Since our new acquisitions cannot for long become States or even Territories, they must be governed as colonies, and for such the Constitution makes no provision.

Ans.—So much the worse for the Constitution, if colonies are desirable. Since it was not, like the Koran (!), created for all eternity, let us alter it if necessary. But it is not so, as is clear from the fact that we govern Alaska now as a colony, and many regions of the United States were at one time so governed (see December Atlantic Monthly pp. 735-742). The Constitution is not a fetter.

5. Our civil service, thanks to the want of a sitting aristocracy, is such that we produce no men, as Great Britain does, fit to govern inferior races. Witness our troubles with negroes and Indians.

Ans.—Britain produced few such men, notwithstanding her aristocracy, till she needed them to govern colonies. It is largely to her colonies that she owes her uncorrupt civil service and her great statesmen. If our democracy fails to produce pure men, then let us either return to Britain's bosom a colony ourselves or else let us import an aristocracy. We can get plenty of English lords for the asking. It is futile to cite negroes and Indians. The people of our new acquisitions are far superior to both. The mass of the Filipinos are cousins to the Japanese and to the Javanese, who have proved such good colonists under Dutch rule. After all, England has trouble even with Ireland, and yet she can govern colonies.

6. Even if we could produce men fit to operate colonies, life in the tropics would enfeeble and demoralize them.

Ans.—The British, from whom we do not differ find no difficulty in spending large portions or even the whole of their lives in the tropics—in India, Ceylon, Central Africa, &c. And such life does not seem to demoralize them.

7. Our colonies will render necessary a large navy and standing army, entailing great expense and liable to be used in the interest of capital to defeat the just claims of labour.

Ans.—With or without colonies it is not safe for a great commercial country to be without the means of protecting its foreign markets, so liable to be endangered by the selfishness of illiberal nations. To leave to Great Britain alone the task of keeping the "open door" is neither generous nor just. On the other hand, while universal suffrage lasts labour is as likely as capital to find an ally in the army. I conclude, therefore, that there is no valid reason against expansion. In its favour the following points may be urged:

1. It affords an opportunity which we ought not to shrink of doing our part in the elevation of the lower races. If we neglect this duty we may find them, in other hands, inspired with an ideal hostile to ours. We, the freest of the nations, ought to be the missionary nation, and in dealing with other peoples we ought to consider their advantage, at least, as much as our own.

2. The expansion of our influence means so much advance toward universal peace, which can never be realized save under Anglo-Saxon influence.

3. We need colonies to widen the horizon of our people, to be schools for statesmen, to accustom us to the thought that not all men are fit for democracy and political power, as well as to the true method of dealing with those who are not. They will help to unteach the foolish notions that moral and political manhood is determined by years and that all men are born free and equal. The world of the twentieth century will perhaps be divided into teacher peoples and pupil peoples.

4. Our power to govern colonies in their interest will increase the prestige of democracy and help to remove the suspicion with which it is still regarded in many quarters. It is a sad reflection on democracy if it is inferior in governing power to aristocracy, if we cannot do what England can do.

5. Our extended sway will increase our national prestige, and security to our commerce, carry light into dark places and give us a home all the world over.

THOMAS DAVIDSON.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

H.E. Yu Keng, the ex Chinese Minister to Tokyo, has been made a member of the Tsung-li Yamèn.

The Osaka Mainichi reports that off Kaminoseki in Yamaguchi prefecture a junk of 144 koku capacity struck the bow of the steamer Glenogle, and rapidly sank. The occupants of the boat were picked up by the steamer and brought on to Kobe. One of the men in the boat was seriously injured in the left leg at the time of the collision.—Hogo News.

The Secretary of the Peninsular and Oriental Company, in a letter to The Times, says that the Directors of the Company are totally unaware of the ground for the unusual proceeding taken by the Board of Trade in the case of the steamship China. The Directors, in replying to the Board of Trade, state that the Board's action simply appears to involve a grave censure on the British Resident at Aden and also on the officers composing the Court of Enquiry and the Bombay Government which confirmed the judgment.

At the monthly meeting of the Committee of the Hongkong Chamber of Commerce, a letter from the Singapore Chamber of Commerce, dated the 28th December, was considered. The Singapore Chamber wished to know whether, in view of the annexation of the Philippine Islands by the United States, the Hongkong Chamber proposed to make any representation in favour of the fiscal policy for those islands under the regime being, as far as practicable, in the direction of Free Trade, how it intended to act, and suggested that the two Chambers should work in unison. After some discussion, it was decided to address the Foreign Office, through the local Government, on the subject, and to inform the Singapore Chamber of the steps to be taken.

The Asahi states an aquatic growth has recently been discovered to have caused considerable damage inside the Yokohama breakwater, while the blocks of concrete forming the outside for a distance of about 240 yards have been very much damaged by the action of waves. The officials of the Kanagawa Kencho intend to commence the work of repair as soon as milder weather sets in. The dredging works are going on very slowly. Since the opening of the Bureau of Harbour Works, an area of 120,000 tsubo has been dredged, out of a total area of 1,700,000 tsubo. In the course of the last year, only 16,000 tsubo were cleared.

At the Yokohama Saibancho, two Chinamen were charged, the one with theft and the other with having assisted in disposing of stolen articles. The former, Liao Chang-lung by name (age 21), living at No. 137, Settlement, was found guilty of various thefts, among which was the stealing of a lady's gown from the residence of Miss Lee, No. 127, on January 5th, and also of sundry goods from the office of Mr. P.M. Abdulla, No. 146, on the night of January 9th. He was sentenced to five months' hard labour and police surveillance for six months. Ho Teng, who helped to sell the goods, was sentenced to one month's imprisonment, a fine of 3 yen, and police surveillance for six months.

Forty friends of the Doshisha met at the Kyoto Hotel on the 22nd inst. under the presidency of Mr. Ban Naonosuke, to discuss the affairs of the Association. In consequence of the resignation of the old trustees, the following were elected to fill the vacancies:—Messrs. Ozaki Hiromichi, Ukita Kosutami, Kishimoto Nobuta, and Kawamoto Junzo. These names are now to be submitted to the American Mission Board, whose reply will be considered by the Japanese supporters of the school with every desire to cement the relations between themselves and the American Mission Board.—Hogo News.

GRAND HOTEL LIMITED.

The Annual Meeting of Shareholders of the Grand Hotel, Limited, was held at the Hotel on Monday afternoon, Mr. F. J. Lowder presiding.

REPORT AND ACCOUNTS.
The Profit and Loss Account, and Statement of Assets and Liabilities for the half-year ended the 31st December, 1898, accompany this Report.

The net profit for the half-year, including balance brought forward from the 30th June, 1898, and after providing for general expenses, Directors' and Auditor's fees, interest, and depreciation, and after writing off bad debts, amounts to $28,064.60 which it is proposed to apply as follows:—

In payment of a dividend of 6 per cent. for the half-year 15,000.00
Balance to new Account 13,064.60
$28,064.60

The falling off in the amount of profit available for the payment of dividend, as compared with previous periods comprising the second half of the year, is due to the enhanced price of market produce and imported household necessaries, and more particularly to the very remarkable decrease in the number of persons visiting Japan during the half-year.

It is proposed that the dividend shall be payable on the 24th day of January, when the warrants will be issued.

E. & O. E.
Yokohama, December 31st, 1898.

J. F. LOWDER, } Directors.
JAMES WALTER, }

I have examined the foregoing accounts and compared them with the vouchers of the Company, and certify them to be correct.

O. KEIL, Auditor.

Yokohama, January 9th, 1899.

The CHAIRMAN, commenting on the report, said—Gentlemen, I think with your permission we may as well take it that you have read the report and accounts, and that you do not want them read over again. You will notice that the liabilities under the head of debentures have been reduced from 20,000 yen to 15,000 yen. That 5,000 yen which has been paid off has been written off the furniture and electric light plant, which altogether have been reduced by that amount. You may notice also that apparently a large amount is carried forward to the new account. That may be accounted partly in one way and partly in another. We had some expenses to meet during the latter part of the last year which had to be met in the early part of the following half and for which provision had to be made. The remainder would have been allowed for depreciation in the ordinary course of things, but our assets have been written down very low indeed, and your directors could not find any assets from which they could write off any more. I regret we are not able to offer you as much dividend as we have been in the habit of doing, but that is explained by the great falling off in the passenger-traffic as compared with 1897. There was a falling off of 5,943, and of that number 3,841 are to be attributed to the last half of the year, which of course makes a great difference on the takings. A similar conclusion will be arrived at by looking at the working account and comparing it with the Working Accounts for the last half of 1896, 1897, and 1898. In 1846 it was 61,800 yen odd, in 1897 57,500 yen odd, and in 1898 51,900 yen odd. The expenses on the other hand were 25,000 yen odd in 1897, and in 1898 increased to 28,200 yen odd. That of course owing to the price of household necessaries and other things having gone up. Although we have not been able to give you so good a showing as we have done, I think, taking all the circumstances into consideration, that the half year has been very satisfactory and I can congratulate you, gentlemen, on having as large a dividend as six per cent. for the half year. If any shareholder would like to ask questions they will be answered and if the accounts are satisfactory perhaps some shareholder will move a resolution to that effect.

Mr. HOWES proposed and Mr. McDONALD seconded the adoption of the report, and it was carried.

The CHAIRMAN—And I presume the dividend proposed is also satisfactory. That is all the business before the meeting and I am obliged to you for your attendance.

The meeting then closed with a vote of thanks to Mr. Lowder and the Directors, on the proposition of Mr. McDONALD, seconded by Mr. RUSSELL.

E. & O. E.
(Signed) H. Syme Thomson,
Hon. Treas. L.L.T.C.

The ballot for the new Committee resulted in the election of the following ladies, who have kindly consented to act:—President, Mrs. Thomas; Hon. Treas., Mrs. Mitchell; Hon. Sec., Mrs. Harland; Committee, Mrs. Eldridge and Mrs. J. Walter.

YOKOHAMA ROWING CLUB.

The annual meeting of this Club was held on Tuesday evening at Keil's Building. Mr. H. C. Litchfield, the President, was in the chair and there was a good attendance.

THE REPORT.

The President, after remarking that the large attendance was a gratifying evidence of continued interest in the Club, read the report as follows:—

In presenting to the Members the annual report of the Club, the Committee take pleasure in being able to record a successful year.

ACCOUNTS.—These show a balance in favour of the Club of yen 837.44.

The Profits on the Bar amount to yen 778.15.

ROWING.—The interest in rowing has been well sustained at the Spring and Autumn Regattas. In the Spring the K. R. & A. C. sent up representatives as usual, but only succeeded in winning the race for pair oars; the three other events falling to the Y.A.R.C.; the Rowing Clubs of Hongkong, Shanghai, and Nagasaki were invited to take part in this regatta, but, unfortunately for us, were unable to do so. The Hongkong Victoria Recreation Club kindly invited us to take part in their Regatta in December, but it was found impossible to get a crew together, although at one time this had almost been done.

SWIMMING RACES AND AQUATIC SPORTS.

These were quite up to the average; both produced some good contests, while the latter, in addition, gave the spectators some amusement. Additional interest was lent to swimming this year by a contest—over 100 yards, $\frac{1}{2}$ mile, and $\frac{1}{4}$ mile—between representatives of our Club and of the Sui-fu-yu Otaha Dai-Nippon Yurijo of Tokyo. Our opponents won the rubber with the 100 yards (won by Mizoguchi Motomoto with a foot or so to spare) and the $\frac{1}{4}$ mile (won with ease by Mizoguchi Motoki) to their credit; while the Y. A. R. C., represented by H. V. Irvine, was successful in the $\frac{1}{2}$ mile. Considering the numbers that the two Clubs had to select their representatives from, the Y. A. R. C. has no cause to be ashamed of its defeat, and it is worthy of note that the second string of our opponents finished last in all three races.

BATHING BARGE AND LANDING STAGE.—With reference to the remarks in last year's report about the Barge, it was found, on examination, that the work done by the Yokohama Engine and Iron Works in 1895 was still in good order and that the leakage was due to the state of some of the side planks. To make the Barge fit for relaunching the Committee had to expend the sum of yen 300. By the kind permission of Dr. Hoskyn, the Barge and the Landing Stage have been hauled up for the winter on the beach under the British Naval Hospital, under the supervision of Mr. Clausen. This gentleman has examined both the Barge and the Stage, and reports, with regard to the latter, that the pontoons are badly worm-eaten in places, and that some of the iron fastenings want renewing; and with regard to the former that she is in a fairly good condition, considering her age, but that the annual beaching and launching are apt to strain her unless the work is carefully done. To remedy this as much as possible, Mr. Clausen recommends that the Barge be fitted with athwart-ship beams to work on rollers.

BOATS—FOUR-OARED.—The five new boats have proved satisfactory during the past season. They gave some trouble in regard to stretchers, and the rowlocks in some cases would not carry the oars ordered last year, but this has been remedied to a great extent and, with the last consignment of oars received, the boats should suit our men very well. The old Black and White boats have been out frequently; the latter being still a great favourite. The Green appears to be quite neglected. These old boats are getting rather cranky, as may be expected after their lengthy service.

PAIR-OARED.—Three new boats built by Mr. Sim in Kobe on the lines of the K. R. & A. C. boats have been utilized during the past season. They are slightly heavier and higher rigged than the old ones. We did not have suitable oars for them, but four sets have now arrived from home and will be available for next season, when the boats should be more popular. Mr. Sim kindly built these boats for cost price, and the best thanks of the Club are due to him for the trouble he took in the matter. The old pair-oared boats are showing their age a good deal and are constantly requiring tinkering up.

DOUBLE SCULLS.—These also are always requiring repairs. The Tern does not yet steer straight, although some efforts were made to remedy that defect. The slides of both boats appear to be pretty well played out.

SIX-OARED—This boat has served the Club well for years and is still good for another year.

SCULLS, ETC.—These boats are in a fairly good state of preservation.

OARS—With new consignments of three sets of four and four sets of pairs which have not yet been used there should be plenty of good serviceable oars for the ensuing season.

PROPERTY AND HOUSE.—The water from the bath-rooms having in course of time rotted much of the woodwork (including some of the supports of the building in their neighborhood), repairs costing yen 190 had to be effected; this sum included the cost of lining the bath-room with sheet zinc. A proper W.C. was also fitted during the year and the Committee room was slightly enlarged. The wooden piles supporting the larger of the two slips have been replaced by concrete pillars and the slip itself extended a few feet further towards the French Harbour.

During the year under review, the Committee invited the Governor of the Ken, the Harbour Master, the Secretary of the Kencho, the Commissioner of Customs, the Chief of Police, and the Chief of the Water Police, to become Honorary Members of the Club.

With their best wishes for the continued prosperity of the Club, the committee place their resignations in the hands of the Members.

H. C. LITCHFIELD, President,
F. J. HALL, Captain.
M. SCHELLENBERG, Hon. Sec.
G. C. ALLCOCK, Hon. Treas.
W. GODDARD,
H. E. HAYWARD,
JOHN MCARTHUR, } Committee.
H. ROSE.

The CHAIRMAN remarked that the Committee had added to the value of the prizes at the Regatta, which he thought was a good thing as long as the Club could afford good prizes, and this he was happy to say was the case at present.

The R-V. E. CHAMPNETS IRVINE called attention to the statement in the report that in the swimming contests "the second string of our opponents (Japanese) finished last in all three races." He believed that was not so, that in one race the Japanese were before the Yokohama competitors.

The error was amended, and the report was then adopted.

The election of officers then took place. A ballot was first taken for the Captain and President, and resulted as follows:—Captain, Mr. F. J. Hall; President, Mr. H. C. Litchfield.

The result was received with applause.

The CHAIRMAN remarked that with regard to the election of Hon. Secretary he was sorry to say the Club would lose the services of Mr. Schellenberg, who was returning to Europe, and would therefore be unable to continue the duties. Mr. Schellenberg had rendered most efficient services during his term of office, and he (the Chairman) had never known a more conscientious, cordial, and "nice" secretary, who did the work so well, or who assisted in keeping the tempers of the members better. (Laughter and applause.) He proposed a hearty vote of thanks to Mr. Schellenberg.

The vote having been accorded, Mr. SCHELLENBERG, in reply, said he thanked the Chairman most heartily for his kind words. His work had been a pleasure to him, and he should always remember the happy times he had had with the Club. He wished it every success and prosperity.

The CHAIRMAN mentioned that Mr. Levedag would be willing to accept the Secretaryship, though he did not in any way wish to limit the choice of the members.

The ballot resulted as follows:—Secretary, Mr. Levedag, Hon. Treasurer, Mr. G. C. Allcock.

The Committee was elected as follows:—The Rev. E. C. Irvine, Messrs. W. Goddard, H. Rose, and H. E. Hayward.

STRANGE RECORDS.

A correspondent sends us the article quoted below, and remarks:—"I think your readers will like to look at this. It sounds startling, yet there is every reason to think that it may be true, and probably is. The book of Rolf Boldrewood—one giving the history of Bully Hayes—and the remarkable reports of the new South Sea writer (Louis Becke, I believe his name is) show that this sort of thing is happening all the time. It would be a good thing if an international row should come of this particular incident:—"

(SPECIAL TO THE "SUNDAY WORLD.")

Vancouver, B. C., Dec. 8, Seattle, Dec. 9. The British auxiliary ship Mildura has arrived in Vancouver after the most extraordinary cruise of which even the dark and bloody isles of the Pacific have ever been the witness.

In the course of less than six months she has chased a French ship over coral reefs and thus perhaps displaced the Fashoda incident as a subject of international ill-feeling and possible conflict.

She has rescued an island princess and scores of other women from most horrible slavery, avenged the cruel murder of a British colonial Governor, stormed a stronghold of escaped French convicts, and witnessed many scenes of bloodshed, desolation and misery.

This is the story as told by Capt. Leah, of the Mildura, with corroborative details furnished by the people of the Australian steamship Miwera, just arrived from Sydney. The facts have been collected exclusively for the Sunday World:—

The Mildura left Sydney, Australia, very suddenly six months ago, and was shortly followed out of the harbour by the French cruiser Eure.

The object of their cruise was accidentally learned by a Sydney reporter. It was to put down the traffic in native girls said to have been carried on by white officers of merchant ships and even of naval vessels patrolling the Pacific.

After leaving Sydney the Mildura steamed direct for New Hebrides and made Noumea her headquarters. The day after her arrival she was joined by the Eure. It was then definitely learned that the two men of war would work together in putting down the horrible traffic in native girls which was becoming so prevalent among the islands.

While at Noumea reports were received by Capt. Leah, of the Mildura, that scores of girls had been stolen and taken aboard French ships during the preceding three months from the island of Aoba. Together the two ships set out to investigate.

They found that the report was true, and that an awful vengeance had been wrought upon the white Governor, who, though guilty of the crimes that had maddened the natives to revolt, has been massacred.

White dealings with South Sea natives are short and sharp.

The English and French warships opened fire. The village, which had a population of about 500, was soon in flames, and the inhabitants fled to the hills.

Then the British and French tars rowed to the island and captured many natives. Among them was Chief Omoo, whose village was on the other side of the island.

The next morning this chief, with a number of his warriors, paddled to the Mildura.

"What have you done with Gov. Duncan?" demanded Capt. Leah.

"Where is my daughter?" retorted the chief. "Is there no punishment for white men, and for our burned villages and our young men slain?"

"I know nothing of your daughter."

"It is true," said Omoo. "Last night she was bathing with her women in the sea and they were all stolen before morning."

"Your child shall be rescued," said Capt. Leah. "They cannot have gone far. First let us hear about the murder of Gov. Duncan."

A LATE SAVAGE RETRIBUTION.

Capt. Leah says he has no doubt Duncan's murder was due to the anger of some native whose daughter had been stolen by Frenchmen.

Like many Governors of small islands, Duncan was also a trader. With a number of his wife he was trading with a chief several miles inland on Aoba, with whom he had been dealing for upward of seven years. He placed such confidence in this chief that he had on several occasions taken him on board his cutter for a cruise among the islands a privilege accorded only to natives of supposed reliability.

Duncan was in the chief's tent making some entries in a book, while the chief was sitting opposite him. Without a moment's warning the native seized a tomahawk and aimed a blow at Duncan's head.

The Governor ducked, but received the edge of the tomahawk on his forehead, cutting it to the bone. Although partly stunned, he reached for his revolver, which was lying at his side, when the chief, seizing a knife, stabbed him twice in the back. The wounds were not deep, and Duncan secured his revolver. The chief, seeing his danger, sprang like a flash for the doorway, only to receive a shot, fired point blank into his body.

Duncan's companions, at the sound of the revolver shot, rushed into the tent, only to find the chief dead and the Governor in a dying condition. He was carried back to the coast, and had hardly told the story of the attack when he breathed his last. His death and that of the chief was followed by a general revolt, in which several whites were slain.

THE CHASE OF THE "PORT DESPOINTE."

It now remained to chase the French cutter that had taken away Chief Omoo's daughter and nineteen other girls of Aoba. An extraordinary coincidence now occurred which may lead to international complications.

After shelling Aoba, the French cruiser Eure, Capt. Lecuyer, steamed away to Segou, one of the stations of the French New Hebrides, to put down a revolt of escaped convicts. She left word for the Mildura to follow as soon as possible. It thus happened that Capt. Leah was left to chase the Port Despointes alone.

The little cutter was still cruising in the vicinity. The Mildura gave chase. The Port Despointes was no match for her in speed and ran in close to a small island. The Mildura followed at a high rate of speed and was almost within firing distance of the cutter when a horrible grinding sound told Capt. Leah he was in dangerous waters. The cruiser had run over a hidden coral reef and had, strange to say, sustained no other damage than to have two of her plates sprung.

By this time she was close upon the Port Despointes and a shot fired across the cutter's bow brought her to a standstill. Capt. Leah, with twenty blue jackets, immediately boarded her.

He found on board the Aobian Princess and twelve of her girl companions. He demanded their immediate release, and First Lieut. Couillard, who was in charge of the cutter, made no demur. This officer is supposed to have authorized the capture of the girls.

The Princess was found in her cabin sleeping. She is described by Capt. Leah as a beautiful girl, almost as fair in complexion as a European. When awakened she protested against leaving Lieut. Couillard, but Capt. Leah was obdurate.

Then followed a strange scene like a modern version of the story of the stolen Sabine women.

GIRLS HAD LEARNED TO LOVE THEIR CAPTORS.

The beautiful girl, clad only in a lava-lava of gaudy calico, "made in Germany," hesitated but for a moment. All savage people are accustomed to the idea of rude wooing and she was already reconciled to her captor.

With a cry of despair she threw herself at the feet of Lieut. Couillard and raised her hands to him in mute appeal.

Two tars levelled loaded guns at the Lieutenant's head, while Capt. Leah led the girl gently to the cutter's rail, where lay one of the Mildura's boats. It was unnecessary. The Lieutenant made no move but watched the stirring scene with a cynical Parisian smile. A suit of old clothes was thrown over the Princess and she was lowered into the boat. Her companions, beautiful young girls, some as young as thirteen and none over twenty, were as loath to go as she, but they obediently followed, leaving their sailor lovers. They were absolutely without clothes of any kind and were from eighteen to twenty years old. The French sailors had chosen the prettiest of the native princess's followers for themselves.

Before he left the cutter Capt. Leah held an informal investigation. Lieut. Couillard made no secret of what he had done. He said it was a common practice to steal the native girls and if he suffered for such a proceeding some of his countrymen high in the French South Sea Navy might not escape. He declared that the traffic in native girls was not confined to French vessels and cited cases where British merchantmen had stolen whole boat-loads of girls.

The captives, he said, were generally effected while the girls were bathing in the sea and unprotected. They were surprised, bound and carried on board ship before the tribe knew anything about it.

When the sailors got tired of them they generally, he said, put them on the first convenient island they came to.

Hundreds of native girls, he declared, had been treated in this manner during the past year.

Capt. Leah was received with a royal welcome when he returned to Aoba, and bonfires were lighted in honour of the man who two days before had been shelling the village and killing its dusky defenders. Then, while the young girls rested to the tribe were alone unresponsive to the general rejoicing, Capt. Leah followed the Eure to Segou.

KITCHENER'S SCHOOL.

[Being a translation of the song that was made by a Mohammedan schoolmaster of the Bengal Infantry (some time on service at Suakin) when he heard that the Sirdar was taking money from the English to build a Madrisa for Hubshees—a college for the Sudanese.]

On Hubshees, carry your shoes in your hand and bow your head on your breast!

This is the message of Kitchener who did not break you in jest.

It was permitted to him to fulfil the long appointed years.

Reaching the end ordained of old over your dead Buis.

He stamped only before your walls, and the Tomb ye knew was dust:

He gathered up under his armpits all the swords of your trust:

He set a guard on your granaries, securing the weak from the strong:

He said:—"Go work the waterwheels that were abolished so long."

He said:—"Go safely, being abused, I have accomplished my vow."

That was the mercy of Kitchener. Cometh his madness now!

He does not desire as ye desire, nor devise as ye devise:—

He is preparing a second host—an army to make you wise.

Not at the mouth of his clean-lipped guns shall ye learn his name again,

But letter by letter, and many letters, at the mouth of his chosen men.

He has gone back to his own city, not seeking presents or bribes,

But openly asking the English for money to buy you H-kims and scribes.

Knowing that ye are forfeit by battle and have no right to live,

He begs for money to bring you learning—and all the English give

It is their treasure—it is their pleasure—thus are their hearts inclined.

For Allah created the English mad—the maddest of all mankind!

They do not consider the Meaning of Things; they consult not creed or clan.

Behold they clap the slave on the back and behold he becometh a man!

They terribly carpet the earth with dead, and before their cannon cool,

They walk unarm'd by twos and threes to call the living in school.

How is this reason (which is their reason) to judge a scholar's worth,

By casting a ball at three straight sticks and defending the same with a fourth?

But this they do (which is doubtless a spell) and other matters more strange,

Until, by the operation of years, the hearts of their scholars change;

Till these make come and go great boats or engines upon the rail;

(But always the English watch near by to prop them when they fall)

Till these make laws of their own choice and judges of their own blood;

And all the mad English obey the Judges and say that the law is good.

Certainly they were mad from of old; but I think one new thing.

That the magic whereby they work their magic—wherefrom their fortunes spring—

May be that they show all people their magic and ask no price in return.

Wherefore, since ye are bound to that magic, O Hubshees make haste and learn!

Certainly also is Kitchener mad. But one sure thing I know—

If he who broke you be minded to teach you, to his Madrisa go!

Go, and carry your shoes in your hand and bow your head on your breast,

For he who did not slay you in sport he will not teach you in jest.

RUDYARD KIPLING.

MR. AND MRS.

The difference between Mr. and Mister is curious. No one feels flattered at being accosted with a "Hi! Mister!" and no one would care to have his correspondence addressed to "Mister." So and-so. The unobtrusive "Mr." on an envelope displeases no one. Godwin, indeed, did not like to be so addressed. His daughter, Mary Shelley, writing to Leigh Hunt on one occasion, asking him to direct to her at her father's, added: "Pray put William Godwin, Esq., since the want of that etiquette annoys him. I remember Shelley's unspeakable astonishment when the author of 'Political Justice' asked him, half reproachfully, why he addressed him 'Mr.' Godwin." But Godwin was a philosopher, and we are not all philosophers, thank goodness!

The conventional Mr. and the vulgar Mister are both contractions of the Latin "magister," a more ancient title than the "esquire" after which the son of the philosopher longed, and which has long ceased to have any significance whatever. But "magister," save its contracted form, survives only in the title of "Master" as applied to boys in the nursery and schoolroom, and in secluded rural districts to farm labourers and cottagers generally.

The answer to the question, Who is legally entitled to be addressed as "esquire"? is one which involves much legal lore. Through a natural confusion about the meaning of the term's Latin equivalent "armiger," which is properly armour-bearer, but was often interpreted as one bearing arms in a heraldic sense, it used to be said that a man who was entitled to coat armour was alone qualified to be styled "esquire." This notion is now exploded; but much confusion exists in the minds of antiquaries, and many divergent views are held, as to who can legally claim the title. In ordinary practice, however, the question has ceased to have any importance, as for years past the appellation has become a mere conventional suffix to the surname.

But despite the broad-cast use of the title, there are still honest souls who strive hard to maintain the distinction between "Mr." and "Esq.," not from any old-fashioned respect for memorial bearings—not from any knowledge, indeed, of the legal or historical side of the matter—but simply from devotion to class distinctions. This kind of thing flourishes in Suburbia. In suburban subscription-lists for churches, or chapels or charities of any kind esquires are very plentiful, indeed, while the "Mr." only appears occasionally. A like investigation will show that the bearers of this supposedly humbler designation are the local tradesmen. In Suburbia the vein of trade is entirely a matter of locality. Jones, the local grocer, is "Mr.," of course, and so are all his local colleagues; but Smith, who owns several grocery shops in town, is "Esq.," on the strength of the villa to which he returns every evening, and so far the same reason is Brown, who runs a "hotel" in a frowsy corner of Lambeth, and so are many other London going tradesmen. The local traders neither admire nor appreciate these subtle distinctions, but regard them as part of the price they pay for the business of Suburbia.

It is odd that any one should turn up his nose at the venerable and dignified title of "magister," and hanker after the mediæval "esquire," which has long been one of the most meaningless of titles; but the tribe of Godwin is very large. Troubles of this kind are no new thing. In a Spectator paper, written by Estace Budgett in 1711, the author, remarking that a man of sense would endeavour to keep the medium between a lop and a sloven, quotes a writer who "advises his son to appear in his habit rather above than below his fortune; and tells him that he will find a handsome suit of clothes always procures some additional respect." "I have, indeed, myself observed," adds the essayist, "that my banker ever bows lowest to me when I wear my full-bottom wig; and writes me Mr. or Esq., accordingly as he sees me dressed."

"Mrs." is also a title with a history. It is neither a graceful-looking nor a pleasant-sounding title; and one may be forgiven for wishing that the custom might be revived of using, in speech, the unabbreviated form of the word—that is, of saying "Missus" at full length, a custom which survives only in Scotland. But the tendency nowadays in every direction is towards abbreviation and condensation rather than expansion, and the ungraceful "Missis" is likely to maintain its ground.

For many years past the title has been reserved for married women, with occasional exceptions in favour of elderly spinsters, who sometimes claim a kind of brevet title to the supposedly more dignified form of address. This, however, is really a modern innovation. A hundred and sixty years ago, and earlier, Mrs. was the title of unmarried ladies, and matrons were addressed as Madam, while girls, so long as they remained of childish years, were Miss. One of the old essayists notes that no woman after reaching the known age of 21 should presume to allow herself to be called Miss, unless she could fairly prove that she was not out of her sampler.

Even very young children were sometimes dubbed "Mrs." In the parish registers of St.

Margaret's, Westminster, the burial of an infant daughter of John Milton, who died at the age of five months, is recorded as that of "Mrs. Katherine Milton," and the name is followed by a small "c" to show that a child is meant. But this was probably an exceptional use of the title. It was much more generally given to women whose childish days were past.

In those delightful love-letters which Sir Richard Steele wrote from so many coffee-houses and taverns to the lady who afterwards became his "dear Prue," he continually addresses her as "Mrs. Mary Scurlock." = Dear, lovely Mrs. Scurlock," he begins one well-known epistle; and the lady's waiting maid is spoken of more than once as "Mrs. Warren. Very indignant that good but somewhat exigent woman, Mary Scurlock, would have been had her lover addressed her otherwise; for those day "Miss," except as applied to quite young girls, was a word of very doubtful reputation. The ill-repute once connected with the title has since been transferred to the word "mistress"; and the fact the "miss" was once a term of reproach, as "mistress" is now, accounts, no doubt, both for the old custom of styling respectable unmarried women "Mrs.," and for the present pronunciation of the title.

It is doubtful when the change of custom took place, but probably it was gradual. So late as 1777, when "Humphry Clinker" was published, we find the Tabitha Bramble of that delightful book, inveterate spinster, more than once styled "Mrs.," and yet more than twenty years before Tobias added to the gaiety of nations, the heroines of Richardson's long-winded romances had been familiar to the world as Miss Clarissa Harlowe, Miss Harriet Byron, and so on. There was probably a period of some length during which the old practice died hard.

(FROM THE "JAPAN TIMES.")

MR CHAMBERLAIN AT WOLVERHAMPTON.

London, Jan. 20.

Mr. Chamberlain, in his speech at Wolverhampton, quoted statistics against the Little Englanders, showing that commerce follows the flag. He referred to the removal of several sources of irritation with France, mentioning the Niger and the withdrawal of the French claims for the extension of the settlement of Shanghai. He added that the questions concerning Madagascar and Newfoundland might disturb friendly relations with France unless settled.

THE GORDON COLLEGE AT KHARTOUM.

At the meeting of the General Council of Gordon College it was announced that the total fund had reached £118,119.

London, Jan. 21.

The convention signed by Lord Cromer and Sutoras Pasha, defines the limits of the Soudan; includes Wady Halfa and Suakim in an administration which is distinct from that of Egypt; excludes the Soudan from the jurisdiction of the mixed tribunals; and provides for the supreme power, being vested in the Governor-General, to be appointed by the Khedive with the consent of Great Britain.

London, Jan. 23.

The decree has been signed at Cairo appointing Gen. Lord Kitchener Governor-General of the Soudan.

The Temps says the Soudan convention will entail the protectorate of Egypt; and counsels France not to quarrel over the inevitable, but to seek compensation.

COUNT ESTERHAZY'S RETURN.

London, Jan. 20.

Count Esterhazy has returned to Paris.

London, Jan. 25.

The Court of Cassation has examined Col. Count Esterhazy.

TROUBLE IN SAMOA.

London, Jan. 21.

In consequence of the dispute over the Kingship of Samoa, wherein the German Consul opposes the candidate proposed by Great Britain and America, three British warships from Australia and one American, from California, have been ordered to Samoa.

London, Jan. 23.

The German Press is very reserved over the Samoan situation, while awaiting official reports.

The Washington Cabinet has decided to propose a conference to be held between America, Great Britain and Germany over the Samoan question.

THE HOOLEY CASE.

The Official Receiver reports Mr. Hooley to be guilty of fraud and misconduct.

THE NICARAGUA CANAL.

London, Jan. 24.

The Nicaragua Canal Bill now before the Washington Congress provides that the United States guarantee neutrality of the canal, that the cost of its construction should not exceed $15 million dollars, and that it should be completed within six years. The Bill also requires of the President the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer, or any other treaty, interfering with the construction of the canal.

EARTHQUAKES IN GREECE.

EXTENSIVE DAMAGES IN SOUTH-WEST.

There were incessant earthquakes throughout last Sunday in Greece, the shocks being the severest in the south-west, where several towns and many villages were damaged and destroyed.

DUKE OF DEVONSHIRE AT BIRMINGHAM.

London, Jan. 25.

The Duke of Devonshire, Lord President of the Council, speaking at Birmingham, said that kinship and common interests between Great Britain and the United States imposed upon them a common policy in facing the world. He also said that Great Britain's firm assertion of her rights brought her into closer relations with Germany, Italy, and perhaps even with Russia.

FOR THE BORNEO RAILWAY.

MARITIME DISASTERS.

Paris, Jan. 3.

Serious disasters are reported along the coast of France.

CHINESE AFFAIRS.

Peking, Jan. 23.

About ten thousand rioters have risen near Chei-chow, in Anhui. Their disturbance is gradually increasing. Military men formerly in Government service are assisting the rioters. The Government has despatched soldiers from various provincial centres to put down the rebellion.

FRESH RIOTS.

Peking, Jan. 23.

More disturbances have occurred in Yeichow-fu, Anhui Prefecture. The new outbreaks are connected with the riots in Kwangtung Province. Soldiers from Pechili and Shantung prefectures have been despatched to the spot to repress the rebels.

KIAO CHOW RAILWAY.

Work on the Kiao-chow Railway between the Bay and Chei-nam is to be commenced next month.

THE YU-MANTZE REBELLION.

Peking, Jan. 25.

The rebels under Yu-mantze have been defeated, and have surrendered to the Government. The Rev. Father Fleury, the French Missionary, who had been captured, has been delivered up to the French Consul.

The influence of the rebels in Hunan Prefecture is increasing. They have devastated parts of two provinces.

AN ASSASSIN.

The Chinese Government has despatched an assassin to kill Mr. Kang Yu wei, who is now in Japan. His name is Ting.

Notes (abridged) by Emil Keman, in The Ledger, Philadelphia.

(a) In the first game of the match Janowsky played B to K 2. The text move is more aggressive.

(b) Preferable is Q takes P. The text move enables Black to advance the K P, and the centre Pawns become threatening.

(c) Well played. Black can not answer B takes P, for R to Kt 5, followed eventually by P to R 3, would win the Bishop. Black is pretty nearly obliged to sacrifice a piece, for if he plays Q to Q 5 or B to B 5, White, with P to B 6, obtains an overwhelming advantage in position.

(d) This move, in connection with B to Kt 2, causes loss of time. White, though a piece ahead, had by no means an easy game. Instead of B to Q B 2, White might have played B to B 4, followed by Kt to B 4. White then would be enabled to make counter demonstrations on the Queen's wing.

(e) A highly ingenious move. Black sacrifices the Q P in order to open the diagonal for his Queen.

(f) A powerful play, which threatens Kt to K 5 and Kt to Kt 6 mate. White hardly has another defense than B to K 2 attacking the Rook.

(g) Which loses the exchange. White, however, had no better play.

(h) Better was Kt to B 4. The text-move enables Black to play Q to Q 7, which should win a piece and the game. Black, however, failed to make the proper reply, and the game becomes equalized.

(i) This gives up the piece. White was obliged to adopt this play. Had he moved Kt to Kt 4 Black would have answered Q takes P, threatening R takes K ch, as well as Q takes B P, and he would have obtained the better game.

(k) The play, of course, leads in a draw, Black having a perpetual check on hand.

(l) K to Kt sq was not any better. The moves were repeated three times, after which the game was drawn.

Notes (abridged) by Emil Kemeny, in The Ledger, Philadelphia.

(a) This move, though pretty generally adopted, leads to a rather slow development.

(b) P to Kt 3, followed by B to Kt 2, might have been played.

(c) In order to force the exchange of Bishops. The play is inferior, and Black loses two moves. Better, perhaps, was Castles.

(d) Loss of time. He should have moved P to Q or Castles K R.

(e) Considering White's rather obvious P to Q 5, B to Kt 3, P to B 4, etc., continuation, the Castles Q R is a very poor play. P takes P should have been played, in order to prevent the P to Q 5 move. Black then might have continued Castles K R.

(f) Much better was B to B sq, for it would have temporarily stopped the advance of the Q B P.

(g) He could not well play R takes P, on account of Kt to B 4, winning the K P; for this reason the R to Kt 3 move of Black was inferior. He should have played B to Q 2.

(h) With the intention to prevent White from Kt to B 4. The move, however, proves a failure. Instead of B to Kt 4, Black might have played P to Kt 4, followed eventually by B to Kt 4 or B to Q Kt 3.

(i) B to Q sq was better; after the text move Black's game becomes hopeless.

(k) Threatening R takes Kt, followed by Kt to Q 7 ch and K takes R.

(l) Had he moved Kt takes Kt, White would have answered Kt P takes Kt, followed by P to B 7 and P to B 8 (Q), winning easily.

(m) Causes Black to surrender. He can not play R takes P, for Kt to K 7 ch and Kt takes B would follow.

END GAME.

The following delightful anecdote is contributed to the China Mail:—

BLACK.—(Amateur.)

WHITE.—(Mr. Blackburne.)

The above end-game, which occurred in a blindfold stance at Witney, is a very apt illustration of Mr. Blackburne's humorous treatment of such contests. This quality, combined with his preeminence as a player sans peur, not only makes

Mr. Blackburne's performances attractive to the onlookers, but gilds the pill which his victims must swallow. On this occasion Mr. Blackburne continued with Q to B 2, and on the next round his adversary gave his reply, as B to Q Kt sq. The sightless performer immediately called "R takes P." This was at first sight so obvious an oversight, that the teller (who was probably amused at Mr. Blackburne's way of doing things) asked for the move to be repeated. Again "R takes P" echoed through the room. A whispered colloquy around the table showed the unanimous opinion to be that Mr. Blackburne had thrown away the game; but as a last chance the teller once more called for a repeat, receiving still the same reply, "R takes P." Meanwhile the amateur had clutched the queen left on prise, the teller remonstrating. "But he can take your queen." "Can he?" said Mr. Blackburne, in a dubious kind of way. "Yes, he can," was the answer. But does he?" asked the blindfold player, as if preparing to accept the inevitable loss. "Yes, he does," was the teller's reply. "Then I mate him in three moves!" Mr. Blackburne instantly retorted. The dismay of his adversary and the peal of laughter following may be left to the imagination. The moves are 1—R to B 6 ch, K to Q—Q; 2—R takes R ch, K to K 2; 3—R to B 7 mate.

Notes.

In the course of some remarks on the influence of patrons on the vitality of chess clubs, the Pall Mall Gazette says:—"Patrons themselves should see that their patronage is used as a means of helping sound and healthy effort, organized on a democratic basis, if they wish to do lasting good and not to supplant that effort, as unfortunately is only too frequently the case. Our remarks apply in particular to the news recently received that the City of St. Petersburg is at this moment without a chess club. The St. Petersburg Chess Society had to close their doors for want of funds to meet expenses. In no part of the world was there a chess society whose patrons have so liberally endowed a club as St. Petersburg. The quintangular match, the Tschigorin-Tarrasch match, Lasker-Steinitz match, correspondence matches, and many other chess enterprises, were undertaken by the club on the most magnificent scale, but the club itself made no effort at organization on a proper democratic basis, the result being that as soon as the few patrons who sustained all this lavish expenditure, will fully or otherwise, withdrew their patronage, one of the greatest chess clubs (to all appearance) of the world had to close its doors."

The above remarks may apply to the Yokohama Chess Club, the little interest members are taking in the game hardly justifying the support given to the club by the many patrons who are yearly called upon to pay their subscriptions.

In Watertown, New York, when Pillsbury the American Champion gave the first exhibition outside of New York City, he played six games of Chess and one game of checkers without seeing the boards, and, at the same time, took a hand in a game of duplicate whist. He lost only two games of Chess, and won everything else. The next day he played in Saucra Falls, New York, six games of Chess simultaneously, in the afternoon, and ten at night, losing but one out of the sixteen.

The B. C. M. is rather hard on Mr. Franklin K. Young's "Grand Tactics of Chess," when it says:—"Grand Tactics" is a book that should be taken as read. On the table or shelf it can do no harm. But, at best, it must be useless to the Chess player—in esse or in potest—so far as the matter of Chess is concerned."

It has been reserved for enterprising lovers of chess in Hungary to evolve the most novel variant of the game. This game was played upon a billiard-table, and was called a "drinking" game. It appears that a billiard-table was marked off into 64 squares, and that the pieces were bottles of wine. The king was very suitably represented by a bottle of champagne, the queen by a bottle of Bordeaux, the next three pieces by various kinds of wine, and the pawns by bottles of the ordinary wine of the district. The game was played by four young men, two on each side, and whenever a piece was taken the mover had to empty the bottle of wine thus removed. The game did not last very long; in fact, by the time that the pawns had been advanced, the players were lying under the table. So far as it went, it was a noble game, and the town of Upper Hungary in which it was played is proud of the four players.

IMPORTS

The Manchester market is "way-up," and things are rosier for Yokohama importers than even the most sanguine imagined. Business is reported in grey shirtings, but yarns show no improvement. For fancy cottons and woollens there is little demand, dealers being slow to respond to the higher prices required by importers.

The kerosene market is steady at a slight decline for American and Russian petroleum. China sugars are dearer; Manilla show decline. The market for white refined indicates a downward tendency. As to exports, in raw silk there has been a large business doing, both with Europe and America. The waste silk market is quiet, with an upward tendency. In tea the only demand is for medium to common grades, and the season may be regarded as virtually closed.

LORD CHARLES BERESFORD.

Saturday, Jan. 14.

The coming of Lord Charles Beresford is anticipated with considerable enthusiasm by the vernacular press. There will, of course, be numerous entertainments offered to his lordship, though the fact that he is coming in a private capacity will prevent the Government from taking any official steps to welcome him. Some Japanese publicists refuse to believe that Lord Charles' mission is primarily connected with commerce. They are disposed to think that the commercial aspect is only ostensible, and that he holds a commission from the Foreign Office in London to ascertain the drift of British opinion in the Far East, and possibly to influence it. Others, however, take the more rational view that the soundest basis on which any union for preserving the integrity of China can rest is a commercial basis, and that Lord Charles really aims at finding such a basis. The Yomiuri, which is a strong and persistent advocate of the quadruple alliance—Germany, America, Japan and England—thinks that the presence of Lord Charles in Japan will be a unique opportunity for consummating that project, and remarks, shrewdly enough, that what Lord Charles will desire far more than any display of hospitality is to obtain a clear exposition of the views held by Japanese statesmen and the trend of Japanese public opinion. The Nippon makes a similar point. It speaks of his lordship's coming as the advent of rain-clouds in a time of drought, but fears that he may be disappointed if he expects to find the Japanese people well informed about foreign politics, or Japanese statesmen provided with any hard-and-fast policy. It is quite plain, however, that the Japanese attach much importance to the visit of his lordship, and that his words will be listened to with profound interest. After all, he may be said to be the first British statesman who has come to Japan under circumstances enabling him to speak freely. Mr. Curzon, on both occasions of his coming, confined himself strictly to investigations, and, moreover, had not yet become a prominent figure in British politics. Earl Spencer came and went as the most ordinary private individual might have done, so far as concerned political questions. But Lord Charles Beresford is avowedly on a species of political tour. It is as though the British communities in Japan and China were now, for the first time, brought directly within the circle of home politics, and invited to listen to the views of one of their country's statesmen and to make him the repository of their own views. Japanese officials may not conveniently make any signal display in connexion with the event. Lord Charles can not be dissociated from his very frank utterances in China, and Japan will naturally be careful not to take any steps which might be construed as a governmental endorsement of his words. But there will be opportunities to give his lordship a clear insight into the policy of this country, and we are persuaded that they will be utilized.

Monday, Jan. 16.

Lord Charles Beresford was entertained at luncheon by the merchants of Osaka on the 14th instant, covers were laid for 130, and the Governor of the City was among the guests. According to telegraphic reports, Lord Charles said that the object of his coming was to study the state of affairs in Japan with a view to future action. From various points of view he found a great resemblance between Japan and England. In both countries the population was large in proportion to the superficies, and there seemed to be little doubt that Japan, like England, would by-and-by devote herself to commerce and industry, becoming dependent upon foreign lands for her supply of food stuffs. Like England, too, Japan would find her population growing beyond the limits of sustenance, and would be driven to seek new outlets in colonial expansion. It might be safely predicted that commerce and industry would ultimately become the pillars of the Japanese Empire. He believed that the mission of Japan, England, and America was to promote the growth of the world's commerce and industry. The alliance that he advocated was based on these considerations, not on military or diplomatic objects. The great aim of Japan should be to develop her trade and manufactures.

Tuesday, Jan. 17.

It may be presumed that every Englishman in the Far East has followed Lord Charles Beresford in the newspapers from point to point of his tour, and has perused all his speeches carefully—excellent speeches they are too, straightforward, comprehensive, and eminently comprehensible. But it may also be presumed that very few of these interested observers and readers have arrived at a clear understanding of Lord Charles' object. A commercial union between the four Powers, America, Germany, Japan, and England, is the definite declaration of his lordship. But what is a commercial union? In the ordinary sense of the term it means a combination of States for the mutual promotion and expansion of trade under special conditions—tariff conditions, for example. But that is not what Lord Charles Beresford means. He does not suggest that the United States should modify its tariff in favour of England, Japan and Germany, or that the whole four should surround their common field of commerce with a cordon for excluding foreign competitors. The purposes of the commercial union contemplated by him are two: first, to keep the trade of China open to all the world, and secondly to preserve the integrity of the Chinese empire. How is that to be accomplished? How is the union to achieve those purposes? There is only one way, though Lord Charles prudently avoids putting it into explicit language. It is that the four Powers should enter into a compact to combine their naval and military forces against any State attempting to encroach upon Chinese territory, or seeking to impose restrictions upon freedom of trade by foreign nations in the Chinese empire. We may call that a "commercial union" if we want to deal in euphemism, but it is something more, much more, than a commercial union, especially when there stands already in the arena a great Power which is busily engaged not only in assimilating Chinese territory but also in imposing restrictions upon freedom of foreign trade in the Chinese empire. Russia is doing both of those things. Indeed she may be said to have accomplished the first on a vast scale by virtually absorbing Manchuria, and the second to a more limited though even less equivocal extent, by closing the Liaotung peninsula to all nations, by vetoing British railway enterprise eastward of Shan-hai-kwan, and by asserting exemption from the customs dues which all other nations have to pay. So, then, the members of the "commercial union" would have to say to Russia, "Step back and hands off!" We may as well understand the thing clearly. It is a practical plan that could not fail, since Russia's obedience to a behest backed by such force may be taken for granted. Therefore we must all applaud Lord Charles Beresford's wisdom when he predicts that such a union would make for the maintenance of peace as surely as did the celebrated Dreidand in Europe. It is, indeed, the only peaceful solution of the problem. But we miss one factor in the arrangement. Where does China come in? Why should not China be a party to a compact for the preservation of her own integrity? Her exclusion from the combination is singular. One of the great difficulties of the situation is China's extraordinarily invertebrate and pusillanimous conduct. She does whatever she is asked to do; bows to every menace; concedes every demand. If she is to be perpetually thrusting her neck under Russia's feet while the Four Powers labour to hold her erect, the task of the Union will not be as light as it might be. Of course Lord Charles Beresford sees this as plainly as any one else can see it. We suggest that he should openly add China to the Union, for if her great potentialities of defence are not to be utilized, her capacities for mischief must be checked at all events.

Fate draws strange events from its lottery. Only four years have elapsed since a combination of Western States drove Japan out of Liaotung and Manchuria. It looks as if she herself might now become one of a combination of States to rescue Manchuria and Liaotung from the leader of the Powers that then coerced her. We have often thought that she was fortune's favourite.

Friday, Jan. 20.

It is understood to be the wish of Lord Charles Beresford that the reception planned for Monday next in Yokohama should have a cosmopolitan character. In fact, when his lordship accepted the invitation addressed to him by the local branch of the China Association, which is a cosmopolitan body, he doubtless did so on the assumption that the affair would not be confined to British subjects. Lord Charles' mission is not to British subjects. Neither his visit nor his speeches, great as has been the attention attracted by both, were necessary to rouse British subjects in the Far East to the fact that some resolute policy is necessary if they are to be secured in the enjoyment of the trade privileges which their country has won for them at no small cost of blood and treasure. The object his lordship evidently has in view is to create a sense of that necessity among the other nationalities whose interests are threatened, and, above all, to obtain some tangible evidence that such a sense exists? Hence if British subjects are anxious to cooperate with him and to further his purpose—as they undoubtedly are—their obvious plan is to take the initiative in organizing a reception which shall include all nationalities. It may be taken for granted that this view of the question presented itself from the outset to the British promoters of next Monday's demonstration; but they were probably deterred from giving effect to the wider scheme, first, by the idea that their welcome to Lord Charles must take the form of a dinner, and, secondly, by the impossibility of finding any place in Yokohama capable of accommodating more than 150 people at dinner. It does not appear at all necessary, however, that a dinner should be given. A meeting is all that is required, and there should be no special difficulty, even at this eleventh hour, in changing the character of the demonstration in the former sense. Three days amply suffice to publish notices that, in deference to Lord Charles Beresford's wishes, a reception will be held at the Public Hall in lieu of a dinner at the Oriental Hotel, and that the presence of all nationalities is invited. Arrangements for refreshments can easily be made if desirable. In fact, the dinner preparations, which have probably been already carried some way towards completion, might be utilized for the new purpose. That is a trifling matter, however. The sole point of importance is to adopt whatever course seems best calculated to serve Lord Charles Beresford's purpose. In connexion with this we venture to add another suggestion. It is that the purpose of the meeting should not be limited to presenting an address from the community and hearing a speech from Lord Charles, but that a resolution should be proposed and passed of such a nature as to strengthen the policy which his lordship advocates. There has been time enough to arrive at a perfectly clear idea of the course recommended by our visitor, and if we sympathise with that course, we should endeavour to assist Lord Charles in urging it for the approval of the Home Government. Some explicit declaration of public opinion in Japan is the most effective weapon we could place in his hands, and the opportunity to furnish that weapon would be a meeting of the kind alluded to above, and a resolution unanimously adopted at the meeting.

LORD CHARLES BERESFORD AND THE JAPANESE PRESS.

Lord Charles Beresford is not to be regarded merely as a commercial delegate. We shall not be greatly mistaken if we consider him also in the light of a representative of British official opinion. It is our hope, therefore, that his coming will be made the occasion for something more than mere superficial civilities. He will have an opportunity of observing the real state of our trade and industry, the condition of our military and naval preparations, the degree of our national capacity, the position we hold and the prospects before us, and he will thus obtain materials for submitting a really useful statement to his own Government. It is quite unnecessary now to offer any demonstration of the fact that England and Japan have common interests in the Far East. Public opinion is already agreed as to that. Hence the two countries ought to march abreast, and it is owing to the latter conviction that so many publicists have been induced to advocate an alliance between them. An alliance is very easy to talk about, but very difficult to carry into practice. We may compare it to a marriage in private life. The bride and bridegroom are perfectly willing, but questions of settlements have to be discussed, and the views of relatives have to be reconciled. In England there are men opposed to any scheme of alliance, and in Japan also there are persons that entertain the same notion. We should be in error if we imagined that anything like a formal alliance exists, but we should be equally in error, perhaps, if we denied the existence of any secret understanding. Such matters must be left to the management of those whose official duty it is to deal with them. It is not wise for outsiders to talk much. Apart from their want of intimate knowledge, their indiscretion is apt to arouse the suspicion and ill-feeling of other nations. Leaving on one side, then, the question of an actual alliance, we may confine ourselves to the statement that, looking at the relations which now exist between the two countries, estimating the probable course of future events, and having regard to community of interests in the Far East, an occasion may arise when it will be essential that England and Japan should move together. From that point of view, constantly increasing intimacy between the two nations is to be desired, and in order that they may be drawn close together, nothing is more important than that they should have accurate knowledge of one another's conditions. Hence it is that we regard the coming of Lord Charles Beresford with special satisfaction, and trust that every means will be afforded to him for obtaining a clear insight into the state of affairs in Japan. It is our earnest hope that through his agency the peoples of England and Japan may become better known to each other and may be drawn closer together.—Fiji Shimpō.

The state of affairs in the East is disquieting. For our own part, we do not advocate any definite alliance, whether between Russia and Japan, or between England and Japan, or between England, America, Germany, and Japan. But in our humble opinion England's interests in the Far East, especially in China, are almost identical with the interests of Japan. Thus the leaders of thought in both countries are agreed that the integrity of China should be preserved, and that her commerce should be thrown open to the whole world, and upon that conviction they base the policy that should be adopted towards her. Hence the coming of Lord Charles Beresford is an excellent opportunity for the people of Japan to disclose their views, and to discuss the future of the Far East. We trust that the welcome given to him will be hearty and general.—Shogyō Shimpō.

The disposition to welcome Lord Charles Beresford is very commendable. But it must not be confined to mere ceremonial and display, as was the case when receiving Sir Edward Reed and General Grant. His lordship visits Japan not to look at her pretty scenery, or to examine her works of art, or to investigate her customs, or to taste her viands. His object is to obtain materials for forming a just estimate of her national condition such as may serve as a solid basis for the policy which he advocates, namely, an alliance between England and Japan. Therefore in welcoming him we must make no mistake about his real purpose. He is a very different person from the poet Arnold, and should be treated differently. We must open our hearts to him, and show him, not the forms of conventional courtesy, but the sentiments that really animate us.—Mainichi Shimbun.

Lord Charles Beresford is a most distinguished Englishman. (Here follows an epitome of his lordship's career.) If we rejoice at his coming and welcome him heartily, it is not merely because he holds such a prominent position as an officer, or because he was the author of the Bill for increasing the British Navy, but because he stands forth as the advocate of the policy which we advocate, an Anglo-Japanese alliance. Lord Charles preaches the doctrine of an association of the four Powers—England, America, Germany, and Japan, and, since his views include ours, his arrival in Japan affords us lively satisfaction. If the plain truth be told, the Japanese are in favour of an Anglo-Japanese alliance. Therefore when we welcome the representative of a quadruple union, the dual union is always in our thoughts. National affairs, above all a nation's foreign affairs, know no distinction of political parties. We must receive Lord Charles Beresford as a united people and show him our feelings as a united nation.—Kokumin Shimbun.

GOVERNMENT PURCHASES OF PUBLIC BONDS.

Up to 1896 only one method of redeeming public loan bonds existed in Japan: the bonds to be redeemed were determined by lot, and the Treasury handed their full face value to their holders. But in 1896 a law was enacted, empowering the Government to purchase bonds in the open market, according to the convenience of the Treasury; in other words, to redeem them at their market prices. Since that law went into operation, the Treasury's purchases of various kinds of public bonds—irrespective of the special purchases made by the Bank of Japan last year—have aggregated 19,987,700 yen in face value, and the price paid for them was 18,479,031 yen, so that the net result of the process has been a gain of 719,668 yen to the State. It appears from these figures that the Treasury's purchases were made at an average of 96½. We may observe, en passant, that the substitution of the method of purchase in the open market for redemption at face value, though certainly profitable to the State, is in fact a removal of one of the buttresses that helped to sustain the market price of these securities. The possibility of a certain quantity's being redeemed at any time at par must have exercised more or less effect upon the price.

THE WEATHER.

The weather has behaved in a most orthodox manner this year. On the 5th instant the season of great cold (Kan) set in, according to the almanack, and the reality has agreed most accurately with the theory. In Tokyo and Yokohama bitter cold has been with us ever since, and from all parts of the country come reports of a winter such as has not been experienced for years. In Nagano the snow has been deep enough to stop the running of the trains, and Hiroasaki, Yamagata, Fukui, Yokkaichi, Matsuyae, and so on have been visited by snow-storms of extreme violence. The period of Kan lasts for thirty days, coming to an end on February 3rd.

COLONEL ARISAKA.

It would appear that Colonel Arisaka's visit to Europe is not to procure machinery for the manufacture of his new quick-firing field-pieces in Japan, but to superintend their manufacture in Europe. The Colonel is the object of warm eulogies by the Tokyo press. He had been employed for many years—ever since 1880, in fact—on the coast-defences, and had done highly meritorious work in that branch, before he turned his attention to armament improvements. In the latter field his first signal achievement was a conversion of the Murata magazine rifle. He reduced the capacity of the magazine from ten cartridges to five, but he simplified the mechanism enormously, greatly lessened the weight of the weapon, and otherwise modified it so as to increase the muzzle velocity, flatten the trajectory, and signalily improve the accuracy. His new-pattern Murata was sealed in 1897, and is believed to be a splendid weapon. Now he comes again to the front with his rapid-firing field-piece, for which high merits are claimed. Side by side with Colonel Arisaka's exploits as an inventor, reference is made to Mr. Shimose's smokeless powder. As to the nature of this we know nothing. When the discovery was announced in 1897, and when one of the Shinagawa forts was assigned to Mr. Shimose by the War Department for the purpose of manufacturing his powder, we could do no more than announce the bare facts. Smokeless powder is nothing new, of course. A variety of it has long been manufactured in China, and, so far as the public knew, the powder made in Japan was similar to that which the Chinese had been taught to make; that is to say, not a really smokeless powder, but only a comparatively smokeless. The difference is very important, for the process of manufacturing the nitroglycerine smokeless powder requires special training and special machinery. Mr. Shimose's powder is supposed to be absolutely smokeless, but the method of manufacturing it is kept a profound secret. The Yomiuri Shinbun classes the inventive success of Mr. Shimose and Colonel Arisaka with the discoveries of Dr. Kitasato in the bacteriological field, and welcomes them as an earnest that there is no truth in the criticism once uttered that the Japanese race was "imitative but not original."

NEW JAPAN-CHINA BANK.

We read in the Shogyo Shimpō that it has been definitely decided to establish a new Bank called the Nis-shin Ginko, or Japan-China Bank, in order to improve the commercial facilities between the two countries. The Bank will have its head office in Kobe, and will establish agencies at Fusan, Jinsen, Newchwang, Tientsin, Chefoo, Shanghai, Foochow, Hongkong and Amoy. Our contemporary adds some interesting figures to show the development of trade between the two empires during the past six years:—

TRADE BETWEEN JAPAN AND CHINA.

JAPANESE CHAMBERS OF COMMERCE AND THE QUADRUPLE UNION.

We shall be very curious to see whether Mr. Hamaoka, the Chairman of the Kyoto Chamber of Commerce, will carry out the pledge he has given to Lord Charles Beresford. When addressing the citizens of Kyoto who had assembled to welcome him in the city hall, Lord Charles said that the most agreeable souvenir he could carry home would be an assurance that his project of a triple union had received the endorsement of the Japanese Chambers of Commerce. We observe, en passant, that since his arrival in Japan Lord Charles has ceased to speak of a quadruple union. He has dropped Germany out of the account, and confined himself to America, Japan, and England. Possibly he is incorrectly reported. If not, the omission invites surmise. To return to Kyoto, however. Mr. Hamaoka is alleged to have replied that he would take an early opportunity of bringing the matter to the notice of a meeting of the united chambers. We hope he will. The Japanese people are a great deal too reticent, not to say too timid, in these matters. They always wait for a lead from the Government, whereas it is their business to give the Government a lead. Without pretending to hold up England as a pattern, we nevertheless seem to be justified in saying that in no country does the system of parliamentary representation and free speech work in a manner more conducive to the successful conduct of foreign affairs than in England. Yet it is characteristic of England's public men that they boldly declare their views, and frankly invite the Government to promote them. The result is that at every season of crisis the Government has no difficulty in ascertaining how the pulse of the nation beats, and is able to be sure that, in following a certain line of policy, it will have the people at its back. In Japan, on the contrary, the aim of publicists, as a rule, is to abstain carefully from any kind of declaration about foreign politics, and, as for her statesmen, they may be said to live with sealed lips. Compare such reticence with the explicit outspokenness of Mr. Chamberlain, Lord Rosebery, Lord Charles Beresford, and so on.

THE FINANCIAL DEFICIT.

The deficit of 5,700,000 yen in the revenue will be made up, as already stated, by obtaining 3 millions from a house-tax and 2,200,000 yen from an increase of the rates under the tobacco monopoly. Also by postponing the abolition of export duties, another sum of half a million will be secured. A great deal of doubt is expressed in some quarters about the feasibility of a house-tax fixed on a basis of renting value. An important distinction is made between buildings used for trade purposes and buildings used for residential purposes in assessing rental value. But in Japan it is the common custom for merchants to use the front of an edifice as a shop and the back as a residence. How can the rental value of such buildings be assessed, ask the critics? We do not appreciate that particular difficulty ourselves. It seems to us that a shop is a shop, whether the owner resides there or elsewhere. But there is no question that the house-tax will be very unpopular.

AN ARRESTED CONFLAGRATION.

The Tokyo fire brigades did a smart piece of work on the 17th instant. At half-past twelve in the afternoon, smoke was observed issuing from the western face of the big ungainly structure forming the third storey of the former Tokyo Hotel. A strong wind was blowing at the time, and in a very brief interval flames were playing along the eaves of the roof. The whole edifice is of wood, and it seemed at first that not only the hotel but the small Japanese houses clustered at the back, and even those on the other side of the road, were doomed. Within ten minutes of the outbreak, however, five steam fire-engines were pouring streams of water on the roof and through it, for the fire-men succeeded in tearing away portion of the zinc covering, so that they were able to direct the hose against the beams and rafters inside. It was a stubborn fight for about forty minutes, and few people imagined that any better result could be obtained than the limiting of the conflagration to the hotel. But by half-past one the flames were completely under control, it was then seen that the injury had been confined to the roof of the third storey. Of course the whole building was deluged, but as it serves at present for a Japanese club, the furniture and appurtenances were scanty, and the total damages will probably not exceed twelve or thirteen hundred yen.

THE UNITED STATES MILITARY EXPANSION.

There is a great difference of opinion as to the forces that America will need to establish her sway and preserve order in her new territories. The Cuban commission, that is to say, Generals Wade and Butler and Admiral Sampson, were reported as saying that Cuba alone would require an army of 50,000 men, and General Miles was supposed to put the number at 25,000. But when General Miles appeared before the House Committee on Military Affairs, he gave it as his opinion that the Philippines must have 25,000 men, Cuba 10,000, Porto Rico 2,000, and Hawaii, Guam, and other outlying ports, 3,000. In other words, 40,000 men are suddenly required for service abroad by a country which, a few months ago, had not a soldier on duty beyond the sea and was content with a regular army of 27,000 men. The idea now is to raise the regular army to a strength of 100,000 men on the peace footing, and to abolish the militia, men serving in the latter being given the option of enlisting in the regular army. As to the dimensions of the scheme there may be difference of opinion, but there can not be much doubt that a militia is an unsuitable force for a country to rely on when military operations in foreign lands may have to be undertaken. Of course the cost of the expansion excites some comment. The pay of the American soldier is $13 (gold) a month. An increase of 20 per cent. was given during the period of the war with Spain, but it is freely predicted that 20 per cent. will not suffice to obtain men for service in the Philippines or Cuba, and that 50 per cent. will have to be offered. If that forecast prove correct, the pay alone of the army on the new footing will be over 23 million dollars, and the total expenditure on account of the army can not fall short of 100 millions, or 20 millions sterling. With regard to naval expansion there does not appear to be any second opinion. The country is evidently agreed that there shall be added to the fleet three first-class battle-ships of 13,500 tons; three armoured cruisers of 12,000 tons; three protected cruisers of 6,000 tons, and six cruisers of 2,500 tons. Considering that America is already engaged in building eight first-class battle-ships, four monitors, and a number of torpedo-boats and torpedo-destroyers, it is apparent that her navy will soon be very powerful.

NEW ANGLO-JAPANESE BANK.

The talk now is of an Anglo-Japanese Bank, which is have a capital of 10 million yen, 4 millions subscribed by Japanese and 6 millions by Englishmen. The idea is that three Englishmen and two Japanese should form the board of directors, and the Asahi Shimbun, which announces the project, says that 3 millions of the capital have been subscribed in Yokohama. We do not attach great importance to the story. Such a scheme is, of course, feasible enough, but the affairs of the bank would have to be conducted on a basis of absolute confidence between the directors, the Japanese branch of the business being entirely beyond the ken of the English directors, and the foreign branch beyond that of the Japanese directors. There are plenty of Japanese worthy of that amount of trust, large though it must be, and there are plenty of Englishmen certainly not less worthy. But how many Englishmen are there, and how many Japanese, who believe each other worthy in that sense, and who are prepared to subject their belief to the test of a pecuniary risk?

With reference to the subject of banks, the Fiji Shimpō notices an interesting feature, namely, the remarkable paucity of branch banks in Japan as compared with the number of principal establishments. The figures for the four years ended 1897 are:—

1894—Banks ... 628	Branches 193
1895—Do 789	Do 302
1896—Do 878	Do 384
1897—Do 1,005	Do 428

Our contemporary attributes this unsatisfactory state of affairs to the very small capital with which most of the banks work. They do not command public confidence and their deposits are so scanty, especially in provincial districts, that no inducements exist for establishing branches. The Fiji advises amalgamation on an extended scale. The complaint is hackneyed, but its iteration will do no harm.

FATAL ACCIDENT.

Two steamers of the Union Tug Company of Osaka were towing 28 cargo-boats, each carrying 20 tons of rice and miscellaneous goods, when, at half-past seven on the evening of the 13th, on emerging from the Aji-kawa, a violent wind and head sea were encountered. The tow-ropes parted, and 15 of the cargo-boats were carried away, only 13 arriving safely, 8 at Kobe and 5 at Osaka. The fate of the 15 is not known, but ten corpses have been found in Tempo-zan Bay, and it is feared that the boats are a total loss. The boats and the cargo were partially covered by insurances effected with three offices.

THE STREETS OF TOKYO.

At last there is a reasonable prospect of tolerable thoroughfares being constructed in the capital of Japan. It is stated that the Mayor and the City Council have decided to ask the Assembly for a sum of a million yen to be expended on road making. The outlay will be spread over a period of 5 years, and it is calculated that, according to the proposed system, each tsudo (36 square feet) of road will cost 35 or 36 yen. The idea is to lay a thick stratum of broken stone six inches below the surface, and to spread earth over it with a superficies of fine gravel. Experiments of that kind have been made on the Yotsuya-kaido, and are said to have given excellent results. Nothing is stated as to the provenance of the broken stone, though that has always been the great difficulty in Tokyo. The work will be commenced from April 1st, but streets traversed by tramways will be excluded from the scheme for the present. This last condition strikes us as peculiar. Why should the tramway streets be excluded? They are among the very worst in Tokyo, and they were among the very best before the laying of the trams. The tram company, pocketing a dividend of over 30 per cent. annually, tears the streets to pieces and spends virtually nothing on their repair. There is not a more scandalously irresponsible procedure in the whole of Japan than the procedure of the Tokyo Tram Company. If the municipality had decided that the company must be called on to put the new system of road-making into practice at its own charges in all the streets traversed by its vehicles, the citizens might feel that justice was being done. However, it is permitted to hope that these streets will seem so execrable in comparison with the new roads as to be beyond endurance. The Fiji Shimpō has been prominently active in rousing the municipality to a sense of its road-making duty and we offer it our compliments.

MR. MASUJIMA AND THE TOKYO MUNICIPALITY.

Our readers remember, of course, that Mr. R. Masujima, the well-known barrister, presented a pretty stiff bill of costs to the Tokyo Municipality for services rendered in connexion with the notorious water-works scandal, and that the Municipality endeavoured to put him off with a mere fraction of his demand. Mr. Masujima persisted. He expressed himself willing to defer to the wishes of the Municipality provided that certain conditions were complied with to save his professional honour, but the Municipal officials tried to carry matters with a high hand, and finally Mr. Masujima had recourse to the law. On the 28th of last month, the case emerged from its final stage, Mr. Masujima obtaining a verdict for 13,900 yen. He appears to have employed remarkable expedition in giving effect to his success. The Yomiuri says that the city officials having shown a disposition to palter with the matter, he at once sent bailiffs to levy a distraint upon the property of the Municipality, and the latter found itself in the agreeable predicament of having its offices and archives held for debt. Of course the money had to be paid over, a step which the Municipality might have taken more wisely long ago.

JAPANESE SILK FABRICS AND THE FRENCH GOVERNMENT.

Several Tokyo Journals discuss the recently received announcement that France contemplates imposing an import duty of 9 francs per kilo. on Japanese silk fabrics, with the exception of kabutai. Hitherto the duty has been from 2 to 6 francs, and, of course, this sudden and sharp increase creates a great deal of uneasiness. The Nishijin Silk Weavers addressed a memorial to the Minister of State for Foreign Affairs on the subject, and it is understood that Mr. Kurino, the Japanese Representative in Paris, has been instructed to enter a protest. The Yoroku Choho alleges that he did remonstrate, but that the arguments employed by the French Government convinced him, and he withdrew his objection, which action the Yoroku denounces as a flagrant diplomatic blunder. We find difficulty in crediting our contemporary's version. Japan is explicitly entitled to most favoured-nation treatment at France's hands, whereas the proposed tax would be an unequivocal discrimination against her. There is no attempt on France's part to deny or palliate its discriminatory character. The reason assigned by her for subjecting Japanese fabrics to heavier taxes than the corresponding products of other countries, is that such a step is necessary in order to compensate for the superior advantage which Japan derives from her command of cheap labour. That is discrimination of the plainest kind. There is an article in the Treaty securing to each of the contracting parties the right to abrogate the most favoured-nation clause provided that a year's notice be given. We have not heard of any notice being given by France. Possibly her intention is to have the principle of the tax endorsed by the chamber, and then to put it into operation a year subsequently. If that be her programme, the Conventional Tariff which she has just been at some pains to conclude will de facto cease to be operative simultaneously with the imposition of the discriminatory duty, and we may look to see a war of rates between the two countries. The matter is of vital importance to Japan, for the future of her export trade depends, in great measure, on her success in finding a market for her manufactured goods, and France is one of her best customers for silk fabrics. Indeed the question is of greater moment than would appear at first sight. For though Japan's chief staple of export at present is raw silk, the time will certainly come when the competition of other silk-growing countries and a sense of the advantages to be gained by utilizing the artistic instincts and cheap manual dexterity of her people, will lead her to manufacture the silk before exporting it, and everything tending to postpone that consummation is most prejudicial to her interests. She would certainly be justified in resorting to every legitimate means of either averting or reversing such action on France's part.

POLITICAL OUTRAGES IN THE NORTH.

The Liberal organ (Yimmin) published a strong condemnation of the behaviour of the Progressist partisans in Awomori. Baron Suyematsu, who was to have proceeded thither in the interest of the Kensei-to, learning that some 300 Soshi had been assembled in the town by the other side, abandoned his intention of holding a political gathering, and announced that he should go to Awamori merely on a visit of pleasure. He was nevertheless met at the entrance of the town by men carrying buckets of filth, which they discharged at him without effect. One of them, seeing this failure, made "a break" for the Baron, who, however, hurled him back and went on his way. Subsequently 30 or 40 youths effected an entry into the inn when he was staying, and made themselves very obstreperous. During the whole of these doings neither policeman nor gendarme put in an appearance, and their failure to preserve order is strongly criticised. In the evening a crowd gathered outside the inn, and there was talk of an assault, but, the police being now present in force, the rioters were over-awed.

THE FORMOSA RAILWAY.

We stated in a previous issue that a further extension of time had been granted to the promoters of the Formosa Railway, the period for completing arrangements being thus prolonged to February 28th. It now appears, however, that their object in seeking an extension was, not to prepare for taking up the charter, but to get ready for dissolving the Company. If the earnestness of their effort to carry the enterprise to completion may be inferred from their reluctance to abandon it, no charge can be brought against their sincerity. It is of course necessary to have a plausible pretext for their final abandonment of the field, and the pretext they allege is that, since the Government has resolved to float Formosan Public Undertakings Bonds and to carry on various enterprises of expansion in the island under official auspices, there is no place for a private company. They add, however, that should the Diet refuse to approve the Bill for floating Formosan Bonds, the Company may find reason to reconsider its decision. We are bound to say that this pretext seems very inartistically chosen. The Government has given every possible encouragement to the Company, and has extended the preliminary period of its charter again and again—so often indeed that the iteration of the performance became a little farcical. Moreover, if the Government now steps into the field, it is because the Company has displayed incapacity to occupy it. There is consequently an inversion of facts when the Company professes to be driven out by the Government.

RAILWAY FARES.

Fares are to be raised on the State railways. They have been already raised on private lines to the extent, in some cases, of fifty per cent., the reason alleged being the great appreciation of commodities. It is true that, of late, commodities have shown a steady tendency towards decline, but their average is still fully fifty per cent. above the normal figure, and the Government thinks it fair to take cognizance of the fact in fixing railway rates. There is not to be any change in freight charges: they will remain as before. But fares for passengers will be increased by one-third, approximately; that is to say, the third-class fare of 1 sen per mile will become 1.3 sen. It is expected that the additional revenue resulting from this change will be over a million yen.

THE PRELIMINARY EXAMINATION OF SUSPECTS IN JAPAN.

There is evidently some misunderstanding about one of the reforms which the Japanese Government has asked the Diet to sanction in the system of criminal procedure. The following comments on the matter have been published by a local contemporary:—

As reported in the proceedings of the House of Peers on Saturday last, there is one item which may have possibly escaped our readers' attention, but which nevertheless would seem to demand it. Mr. Kiyoura, Minister of Justice, introduced a bill to amend the Law of Criminal Procedure. It appears by what was stated that there is a secret cell known to the Authorities to which "obdurate prisoners" are committed in order to "extort confessions" during preliminary examinations. It is proposed to do away with this cell and to substitute a solitary one for it. The Minister stated that by the change it is not proposed to do away with all physical means of eliciting information from prisoners.

Now it seems to be tolerably certain, by this official confession, that the application of torture has not been abolished, as pretended, for the application of physical means to extort confession from obstinate prisoners, as expressly stated, is still to be continued. That this vicious practice is frequently resorted to in the "secret cell" is not now to be doubted, and why should it be concealed from the public, by being done in the privy manner it appears to be, except for the purpose of hoodwinking the foreign Ministers who have been assured, time and again, that the infliction of physical torture is illegal.

It has always been a matter of much surprise to us to find that Japanese prisoners were so prone to confess their crimes, but the secret is now out, for it appears that they are physically maltreated to compel them to do so.

The above observations are very misleading, not only with regard to the system hitherto in force but also with regard to the system which it is proposed to substitute. According to the procedure adopted by Japan in 1881, a Judge conducting a preliminary examination is competent to order the prisoner into solitary confinement for a limited period, if he deems such a course essential in the interests of justice. That is the French method. In fact, the Japanese Code was modelled on the French, and the French term—mise au secret—being literally translated into Japanese, the cell for solitary confinement became misshitsu, or "secret room." The Government now proposes to abolish the misshitsu altogether. The Minister of Justice, Mr. Kiyoura Keigo, introducing in the House of Peers the Bill embodying this change, made use of the following words:—

The system of secret confinement (misshitsu kankin), as you are aware, is resorted to in preliminary examinations when such a course seems essential for eliciting the facts. Some publicists, however, condemn the system even to the extent of calling it a relic of feudalism, and certainly, when examined by the light of our 15 years' practical experience, the results obtained by it seem small in comparison with its questionable propriety. Legislation must keep pace with the progress of society and the advance of the time, and we are therefore of opinion that it will be much better to abolish in toto such a cruel form of procedure. Hence the amendment proposed under this heading in the Code of Criminal Procedure.

It will be observed that the Minister, whose words we have translated verbatim from the stenographic report, spoke simply of secret cell altogether. He made no such reservation as that attributed to him by our local contemporary quoted above, namely, that "it is not proposed to do away with all physical means of eliciting information from prisoners." We are unable to conjecture the origin of this error unless it be attributable to careless reading of the epitomized report published in our own columns on the 16th instant. Summarizing the proceedings in the House of Peers and taking our summary from the necessarily brief synopsis furnished by our own Japanese reporter, we wrote:—

The second amendment is the abolition of the "secret cell" (misshitsu) as a means of obtaining a confession from a suspect at the preliminary examination. It is not considered desirable, however, to do away with all physical means of eliciting information from a person under examination. Hence the proposal is to substitute the "solitary cell" (doku bo) for the secret cell in cases where there appears to be a necessity for obtaining information.

This was our own version of the proceedings, and by what misapprehension it was put into the mouth of the Minister of Justice we need not pause to speculate. But we are certainly confronted with extraordinary ignorance of the Japanese system, which has been in operation for 16 years, and of the French system on which it is based, when we find a newspaper alleging, at this juncture, that the "secret cell" is a device for "resorting to the vicious practice of torture." Indeed it is scarcely possible to conceive that our contemporary's remarks are made in good faith, for in addition to ignorance so profound as to be almost incredible, they exhibit a use of terms which, if accidental, must be called phenomenal, and if intentional, is singularly dishonest. We allude to the words "obdurate prisoners" and to "extort confessions," which, though purely inventions of the newspaper employing them, are put in inverted commas and represented as statements officially made in the House of Peers—an "official confession" our contemporary calls them. No words of the kind were employed in the House, nor was the slightest hint given that "the application of torture" is resorted to in the secret cell as "a physical means of extorting confession."

Another point has to be elucidated, however, namely, the form of procedure which is in future to be adopted. Our report spoke of substituting a "solitary cell" (doku-bo) for the "secret cell." That, too, does not convey an accurate idea of the proposed system, and, as the matter is of importance, our readers will permit us to give a somewhat detailed explanation. The 87th, 88th, and 89th articles of the present Code of Criminal Procedure run thus:—

87.

At any stage of the preliminary examination, the judge is competent, if he deems it necessary for discovering the truth, to order, whether at the instance of the procurator or of his own motion, that the accused who has been placed under warrant of detention shall be put in a secret cell (sema mis au secret).

88.

Secret confinement carries with it isolation and interdiction from communicating with any one, or from receiving or sending correspondence, papers, money, or other objects, without the authorization of the judge of instruction.

89.

Secret confinement can not continue for more than ten days consecutively, unless the order be renewed every ten days. In case of such renewal the judge of instruction shall make an explanatory report to the president of the court. The judge of instruction must question the prisoner twice at least in each period of ten days.

It is proposed to abolish these Articles; to expunge them from the Code, and, if the amendments stopped there, we should be in no doubt as to the fact that the system of mise au secret had finally come to an end. But the amendments do not stop there, and in order to explain this point we must quote another Article of the Code, namely, the 85th. It stands thus at present:—

85.
An accused person, unless he is in secret confinement, is permitted to receive, in the presence of an official, visits from his relatives or connections, his friends or his counsel, in conformity with the prison regulations. Letters, books, and other written documents must not be transmitted between the accused and persons outside the prison, until after they have been examined by the judge of instruction or the procurator, who may retain them provisionally.

In the above article two amendments are introduced, an elision and an addition. The words "unless he is in secret confinement" are elided, and the following clause is added:—

The judge of instruction, when he considers it necessary for the purpose of eliciting the facts, may segregate the accused's cell (hikokunin no kango wo betsurei shi), and may forbid him to hold communication with persons outside or to transmit to, or receive from, them books, documents, or articles, and may retain such books, documents or articles temporarily.

What are we to understand by the above? The system of mise au secret has certainly been abolished, but it would appear from the newly added clause that the judge has competence to put the accused in a separate cell and to cut him off from all communication with outsiders. So, at all events, the clause would be interpreted by ordinary readers. The Government Delegate, however, being asked by Viscount Niwa to explain that very point, answered thus:—"The 85th Article simply gives power to segregate the accused's cell and does not create any special new feature. Segregating the cell sounds like solitary confinement, but it has not that meaning. It simply amounts to separation from other accused persons. (ta no hikokunin to betsu ni suru to iu dake no koto de aru)." Doubtless that explanation was given in all good faith, but we question whether the judges will read the Article in such a sense. To men of ordinary intelligence the provision certainly confers on a judge power to order an accused person into solitary confinement. If it is not intended to bear that construction, the Special Committee of the House of Peers, now engaged in examining the Bill, will do well to make some amendment so as to correct the ambiguity. The system of preliminary examination in criminal procedure, though justified so far as French precedents are concerned, is much in want of amendment and the Diet would greatly add to its reputation by introducing the necessary reforms instead of waiting for the Government's initiative.

NEWSPAPER TROUBLES.

The Public Procurator has instituted a suit against the Yorozu Choho for libelling an official. Count Kahayama is the chief object of the journal's attack. He is charged in the most explicit and offensive terms with corruption, the amount of the money obtained by him and the manner of obtaining it being definitely stated. We have, of course, no right to suspect that this accusation is inspired merely by a desire to gain notoriety. The Yorozu Choho has long been conspicuous for publishing scandals, and perhaps it honestly counts itself a censor of public morals. But there is in Japan a small band of journals, headed by the Yorozu, conspicuous above all things for a lack of any sense of responsibility in dealing with the affairs of private individuals. These journals seem to have no sort of compunction about assailing the reputation of prominent persons and deliberately accusing them of conduct which, if proved against them, should cause their ostracism from society. Unfortunately the victims of such foul scandals refrain from instituting legal proceedings, and the result is not merely that newspaper licence remains unchecked, but also that newspapers themselves tend to become objects of contempt in the eyes of the public. How much the Yorozu Choho and its congeners have contributed to lower the status of journalism in Japan we do not venture to estimate, but in the interests of Japanese progress we have no hesitation in expressing satisfaction that this suit has been instituted, and in adding a hope that the losing side will be duly penalized.

The Nippon has committed a still graver offence in the eyes of the law. It has published an article which can only be described as an incentive to disturbance. The Nippon labours under the strange hallucination that the land tax is an impost on the agricultural class alone, and, being therefore convinced that to increase the land tax is a grossly partial exercise of legislative power, it fulminates against the Government, and calls upon the farmers to rise against such tyranny. The Minister of State for Home Affairs has considered it necessary to institute legal proceedings against the journal for inserting matter calculated to disturb the public peace, and the sale of the offending number has been stopped. It is a pity that such steps should have to be resorted to. To outsiders their expediency does not seem very clear, for under a parliamentary system the legislature, which consists of the people's nominees, is responsible for the imposition of all taxes, and to incite the people to rebel against their own representatives, as the Nippon does, is a species of silliness that can scarcely be hurtful to anything except the newspaper indulging in it.

WEDDING IN TOKYO.

On the 18th instant Miss Divers, eldest daughter of Dr. Edward Divers, F.R.S., was married to Captain Viscount de Labry, Military Attaché to the French Legation. The religious ceremony, conducted by the Rev. Père Evérad, took place in the Roman Catholic Cathedral in Tsukiji at one o'clock. The Rev. Père Péri presided at the organ, and vocal music of an exceptionally excellent character was contributed by M. André, of the French Legation, and by the Rev. Fathers Mugabure and Balet. The Cathedral, prettily decorated for the occasion, could scarcely afford space for the great crowd of friends who assembled in evidence of the affectionate regard universally felt for the fair bride, who may almost be regarded as a daughter of Tokyo, having lived there from her early girlhood. Miss Divers wore a handsome and becoming dress of white satin trimmed with chiffon and orange-blossoms, and draped with rich lace. She was given away by her father, and was attended by six bridesmaids, the daughters of the Minister of State for Foreign Affairs, of the French Minister, of Prince Lobanow, of Archdeacon Shaw, of Mr. Molison, and of Mr. Carcer. Four of the bridesmaids wore white felt hats and white dresses trimmed with blue silk and dark brown fur, this delicately toned combination taking the form of charming Kute-Greenaway costumes in the cases of the two youngest; and the sixth was dressed in pink monochrome, a somewhat startling note of colour among the gentle tints. Mademoiselle Harmand and Miss Aoki had gold brooches set with diamonds, and the other four bridesmaids, gold brooches set with pearls, the gift of the bridegroom. Mr. Suavedra, Secretary of the Spanish Legation, and Mr. Andréw, Second Secretary of the Russian Legation, acted as Groomsman. After the service, at which Father Evérad delivered an eloquent and feeling address, a reception took place at the Hotel Metropole and was attended by nearly all the principal people in Tokyo and many from Yokohama. Baroness Sannomiya assisted Dr. Divers to receive the guests, among whom were the Minister of State for Foreign Affairs and Viscountess Aoki, the Minister of State for War, the Minister of State for Education, Marquis and Marchioness Nabeshima, the President of the Imperial University, the Russian Minister and Baroness Rosen, the Belgian Minister and Madame d'Anethan, the French Minister, the Italian Minister, the German Minister, the British Minister, the Spanish Minister, the Portuguese Minister, the Minister for Brazil and Madame Lisboa, the Austro-Hungarian Chargé d'Affaires and a number of other distinguished personages, civil, military and naval. No attempt could be made to provide sitting accommodation for so large an assembly, but excellent arrangements had been effected for refreshments. The health of the bride and bridegroom was proposed by the British Minister, Sir Ernest Satow, in a few well chosen words, and the happy couple drove off at 3 o'clock to Shimobashi, whence they proceeded to Dazushi where the honeymoon will be spent. Perhaps we should add for the benefit of our lady readers that the bride wore a going-away dress of dark blue cloth, relieved with white, and a black hat trimmed with white velvet and feathers.

THIS YEAR'S ADDITION TO THE JAPAN'S NAVY.

In the columns of our Tokyo contemporaries we read that Japan's Navy will be augmented by four ships and seven torpedo-destroyers in the course of the present year. The ships are:—

	tons,	knots
Chitose , Belted cruiser	4,836	23½
Kuaghi , " "	4,978	23½
Asumi , Armoured cruiser	9,855	20
Tokima , " "	9,855	20

The torpedo-destroyers, which are all of the same tonnage (306) and the same speed (31 knots) are the Murabumo, Yugiri, Ikasuchi, Inazuma, Shinonome, Akibono and Shiranui.

THE LATE PRINCESS SADA.

The obsequies of the late Princess Sada took place on the 17th instant. The funeral cortege left Aoyama Detached Palace at 9.30 a.m. on that day, and proceeded by Otowa-machi to the temple Gokoku-ji. Owing to the Princess' extreme youth, Court mourning was not prescribed, but on the day of the funeral mourning was observed throughout Tokyo in the usual manner, all music and theatrical performances being suspended. The two Houses of the Diet, of course, addressed messages of condolence to the Throne, and suspended their sitting on the day of the obsequies.

STANDARDS.

WE have undertaken to explain our statement that, Japan having prematurely dispensed with foreign assistance in her adoption of foreign systems, and having thus undertaken to walk alone before furnishing herself with high standards, her tendency will be to lose much of her rate of progress. In our original reference to this subject we used the word "retrograde," and we observe that the Japan Times is disposed to draw somewhat large conclusions from the fact that for "retrograde" we subsequently substituted the less emphatic form of expression "lose much of her rate of progress." Indeed, our contemporary goes so far as to accuse us of "an attempt to explain away our meaning," and attributes to us "a reluctant confession that we have been guilty of an over-statement." It is unfortunate that such a tone should be imported into a discussion on such a subject, but we prefer to pass by that phase of the matter, and to explain briefly what we meant when we spoke of "retrogression," and what we mean when we say that the expression, if left unqualified, over-states our idea. For that purpose we can not do better than quote the illustration taken by the Japan Times itself:—"Because a ship steaming, say, 20 knots reduces her velocity to 15 knots, the Mail would have us believe that she is backing." The fault of that illustration is precisely the fault which lies at the root of the trouble, namely, a defective standard. Just as the Japan Times, by calling "recourse to foreign aid" "going under foreign tutelage," seemed to furnish an example of the very mood which is proving mischievous to Japan at present, so now when it fails to see that a reduced rate of advance may be practical retrogression, it betrays the defective standard of appreciation to which we originally alluded. For the progress of a country that has entered the comity of nations must be calculated not from the zero point of rest, but by comparison with the rate of its competitors' advance. The vital question for Japan is whether she keeps abreast of the countries with which she has entered into rivalry. If she does not keep abreast of them, then, though she may herself be moving forward, she is actually falling behind in the race, and her progress, measured by their rate of advance, becomes a negative quantity. We speak from the stand-point of foreign countries. We measure Japan's progress by theirs, and we say emphatically that her present tendency is to drop behind in the race. In other words, her tendency is to retrograde.

Another prefatory note must be added here. Having said that Japan's "tendency" is to retrograde, we declined to be interpreted as saying that she is "doomed" to retrograde. The Japan Times attributed to us the latter form of expression, and now charges us with "endeavouring to confuse the point at issue by insisting on trivial differences in the meaning of words." Again we observe that the importation of such a tone into a controversy on such a subject is unfortunate. Apart from the question of tone, however, we assure our contemporary that among English-speaking people "doom" and "tendency" are radically different words. A disease may "tend" to become worse without being "doomed" to become worse; a country's finances may "tend" to fall into confusion without being "doomed" to do so. We have faith in Japan's "destiny," but we nevertheless think that its fulfillment is likely to be postponed by her present "tendency."

What then are the "standards" of which we spoke? Concrete examples will serve better than a general definition to elucidate this point, and in choosing such examples we do not wish to be understood as selecting them according to their order of importance.

Lying before us at the present moment are two Magazines printed partly in English and edited by Japanese writers. They are well known periodicals, occupying a prominent place in the field of Japanese contemporary literature. Now not one page of the English essays in these publications is free from solecisms of construction and syntax. Often, indeed, the solecisms amount to a burlesque. We refrain from quotations, because our comments are concerned with generalities, not with individuals. How does it happen that the writers of these essays complacently perpetrate the solemn farce of offering their thoughts to the public in a foreign garb which they are not competent to handle without flagrant blunders? The simple explanation is that they do not possess any standard of the English language. They have not learned to distinguish accurately between good English and bad English. Yet they imagine that they have learned, and are thus betrayed into displays of ignorance which they would bitterly lament were they conscious of them. Some folks attribute such displays to conceit. "The Japanese," say these critics, "imagining that they have attained perfection, engage complacently in enterprises from which people less self-contented would shrink." That theory does not commend itself to us, for our experience of the Japanese people is entirely opposed to the idea that they are conceited. In demeanour and in everyday intercourse they are essentially modest, nor do the writings of the newspaper press, which may probably be regarded as the most trustworthy reflection of a nation's mood, offer any evidence of a self-satisfied disposition. Japanese students think that they can write English because they have not learned to appreciate the difficulty. It ought to occur to them, one imagines, that if no Occidental attempts to write Japanese, there is a good reason for the reluctance, and that if Englishmen never dream of editing periodicals in German or French, just as Frenchmen and Germans shrink from a similar essay in English, it is because obstacles virtually insuperable lie in the way. But perception of that kind can hardly come until the nature of the obstacles is recognised, and the Japanese have apparently failed to reach that point in their knowledge of Western languages. They are not equipped with an adequate standard.

This illustration is less effective for the purpose of our contention than the more concrete example of postal and telegraphic management. Quite recently there came under our observation a monograph by a Japanese writer containing the declaration:—"The management of the posts and telegraphs in Japan excites the admiration and surprise of foreign observers." The writer was perfectly sincere. He frankly believed that in respect of rapidity and punctuality of transmission letters and telegrams fare extraordinarily well in Japan. His standard of comparison was defective. We need scarcely say that the postal and telegraph services in Japan do not appear worthy of encomium in foreign eyes. They are highly creditable by contrast with the state of affairs existing thirty years ago, but their progress during the past decade has been imperceptible, and they are very far indeed from exciting Western admiration. It would be easy, of course, to point to a time when the condition of these same services was very defective in European countries, and their progress towards improvement painfully slow. But that was when European nations had to grope their way to better things; when they, too, were without a standard. The difference is that, in Japan's case, if she employed foreigners freely and entrusted them with administrative responsibility, she might very quickly attain by their aid the standard which they have laboriously worked out, and which, without their aid, she will have to work out laboriously for herself.

The same remark applies to her railways. They seem, indeed, to satisfy the ordinary requirements of such means of communication. They convey passengers at a leisurely rate of speed, with a fair approximation to punctuality and without any excess of casualties. But, with rare exceptions, they have not benefited at all by modern improvements, and the organization of their goods traffic is egregiously defective. If the Japanese public enters no protest, and if Japanese engineers and traffic-directors feel no compunction, it is because neither the public nor the experts have a proper standard of comparison.

The city of Tokyo abounds with flagrant examples of the fact we are asserting. If the citizens had any conception of what is meant by efficient municipal control, they would not for a moment endure the abuses of which they are now the victims. The method of repairing the streets is mediæval, and their condition in general is painfully bad. Private tram companies are allowed to reap enormous gains while grossly neglecting public responsibilities. Civil engineers are permitted to waste years over works of vital importance to the city's hygiene, comfort, and security, and are moreover allowed to discharge their duties in a manner which would be counted conclusive proof of incompetence in an Occidental country. Facilities of transport are conspicuously deficient because the profit to be gained by supplying them is so keenly desired that no one section of the citizens will consent to another's enjoying it. If Tokyo knew what it is to be well governed, would its inhabitants tamely submit to these disgraces and discomforts? But they have no standards, and therefore remain happily unconscious of defects.

There is scarcely a factory in the country that does not add its testimony to support this arraignment. The organization involves a waste of labour which would be ruinous were not labour still very cheap in Japan, and the condition of the machinery betrays great economical imprudence. The Japanese are an industrious people, a careful people, and a thrifty people. If their industrial organization is wasteful and their treatment of foreign machines imprudent, it is simply because they lack standards.

We refrain from carrying our theme into the region of science and philosophy, though equally forcible and even more important illustrations may be found there. It will, of course, be clearly understood that these criticisms are not intended to suggest any innate incompetence on the part of the Japanese. It is merely a question of premature independence. On routes which their feet are accustomed to tread the Japanese have reached goals of remarkable achievement, and if foreigners essayed to follow the same routes, they would have to serve a long apprenticeship to Japanese experts. But many Japanese seem to think it a reflection on their natural ability that they should not be able to carry foreign systems to perfection without the aid of the foreigners who perfected them. If the plain truth must be told, that phantasy discredits Japanese intelligence much more than it could ever be discredited by recourse to foreign assistance. The wise man avails himself of every factor that can help him to success. To adopt foreign systems of administration, of legislation, of science, of commerce, of communications, and of education, yet to shrink from employing the foreigner who evolved those systems, is to strain at a gnat and swallow a camel. We have watched Japan's progress from the first and built great hopes on its permanence. Hence the evidences we now detect of comparatively arrested advance can not be passed in silence.

KOBE AND THE REVISED TREATIES.

AFTER the somewhat ill-considered and, in one instance, unjustified language of the Kobe Memorial, addressed to Lord SALISBURY last year, the speech delivered by Mr. A. H. GROOM, in his capacity of chairman of the local branch of the China Association, at the Lord CHARLES BERESFORD luncheon in Kobe, is pleasant reading. Mr. GROOM is thoroughly English. He was among the foremost and stoutest opponents of Treaty Revision so long as any chance of postponing that unwelcome experiment remained; but now that the die is irrevocably cast, he is prepared to devote his strength to minimizing what he regards as an evil and a misfortune. DAVID is the most conspicuous historical example of that kind of common sense. He wore sack-cloth and put ashes on his head so long as the breath of life remained in his child's body, but when the hand of death had fallen, he washed his face and went about his royal business as usual. The old extraterritorial system was a darling child; the offspring of racial superiority and Christian pride. From a selfish point of view, there is not one of us that would not gladly have prolonged the existence of the little prodigy for ever and ever. But that was not to be. Its days were numbered. The sands of its life have now nearly run out. For our own part, we do not pretend to have been a bit less partial to the old system than any one else is. It was very delightful to live beyond the range of the tax-collector's troubling; to feel that neither policeman nor magistrate figured in our lives, and to be accompanied everywhere by a consciousness of elevated aloofness. Where our views parted company with those of our fellow-nationals was, first, that we recognised the inevitability of Treaty Revision, and, secondly, that we were convinced of the expediency of effecting it quickly, because the sooner it was effected, the better the terms obtainable. We invite any one of our readers to take a calm retrospect of the course of the negotiations since 1885, and to say whether such a review does not confirm the soundness of our judgment from point to point. Suppose that Count INOUE's proposals had been frankly accepted, what would be our position now? Should we not have foreign experts sitting on the Japanese bench and possessing a dominant voice in every case where foreign interests were concerned? Should we not have the prisons in the hands of the Central Government, and the prison system regulated so as to be beyond complaint? Should we not have the right of owning real estate? Take a step forward, then, and suppose that Count OKUMA's proposals had been accepted. Should we not have all these advantages, except the first and not the least important, namely, the foreign judicial experts, who, instead of sitting in a majority in every collegiate court before which a foreigner appeared, would be sitting in the Supreme Court only, to which access could be obtained on a point of law alone? In a word, Count OKUMA's proposals reduced to a mere shadow one of the most vital of Count INOUE's concessions. Now take another step forward, and see what happened during the next stage of the negotiations. Did not every one of the great concessions disappear? If it occurred to us to write these words now for the first time, we should stay our pen. It would be too like a case of windom that follows the event. But we have been writing them again and again and yet again ever since 1884. We have written them ad nauseam, and we have the indisputable right now to say that our warning is justified by events, and that had our advocacy of timely Revision been successful, the transition from the old order to the new might have been accomplished in such a way as to remove all grounds of uneasiness. "We are looking," said Mr. GROOM, "we are looking with some anxiety to the experiment of being placed under a Code of Laws that is practically untried by, according to Western ideas, an inadequately remunerated judiciary and by judges who must necessarily be inexperienced in the newly-framed laws." Yes, we are looking forward with some anxiety. But how different it might have been! However, we shall not dwell upon that phase of the subject, for what we set out to do was to congratulate Mr. GROOM on his eminently sensible utterances:—"We feel confident that Lord CHARLES BERESFORD's visit to this country will materially assist in advancing that good understanding between the Japanese and foreigners which it is the desire of all present to see. It is absolutely necessary, however, to a continued good understanding that the new Treaties should work smoothly, and on my part—and I speak for the members of the Association—I can promise that we shall do all we can to promote good feeling between foreigners and Japanese." We detach these words from their context in order to bring them specially to the notice of our Japanese contemporaries. The Englishman has fought his battle stoutly. He stood to his guns as long as there was a plank under his feet. He knows the value of good laws. He knows, above all, the value of a good judiciary. He knows what it has cost to elaborate the laws and educate the judiciary of which he is justly proud and in which he places well warranted confidence. He spared no effort to retain the inestimable privilege of being governed by such laws so administered. But now, the fight being over, he will not waste time in fruitless regrets, or add to the dangers of the new era by approaching it in a captious, implacable mood. On the contrary, he strikes his hand into the hand of Japan, and says:—"You have won the day, and I mean to aid you with all my strength in carrying out the new system. I would gladly have averted it, but, since that has proved impossible, I shall certainly not try to justify my fears by increasing your difficulties." We call that a fine example of practical English common sense, and of the proverbial English spirit of fair play.

RUSSIA IN EASTERN ASIA.

NO one can be surprised to learn that Mr. PAVLOFF, while passing through Shanghai en route for Sôul, where he is to represent Russia, took occasion to deny the recently published statement that Port Arthur and Talien are to be opened to foreign trade. We asserted at the time our total disbelief in the story, and, judging by the silence with which it was universally received, the public had a similar feeling of incredulity. Russia is doing exactly what any vigorous, resolute and self-relying Power would do under the circumstances: she is making every conceivable effort to strengthen her position in Manchuria so that the task of dislodging her will soon be too formidable for serious contemplation. No sensible Englishman should have a word to say against her far-seeing practicality, however masterful it may seem, and however indefensible from a moral stand-point some of the preliminary steps of her procedure must be pronounced. It seems to us that, as between Russia and England, the difference may be very simply stated; the foreign policy of the one is modern; that of the other, mediæval. The Russian Government is responsible only for the results of its acts: it is not answerable to any one for its methods of reaching those results. The English Government, on the other hand, has to take every step under the full glare of a public opinion which insists that certain definite moral canons shall be observed. Which of the two is the more immediately efficient mechanism for purposes of imperial expansion, there can not be much question. Russia's armoury of diplomatic instruments is more extensive than England's because she continues to include in it some weapons which advanced civilization has pronounced obsolete. Morality, after all, is chiefly a matter of opportunity. Human nature is not endowed with any elementary repugnance to crooked devices. It would never become conscious of such repugnance without the educating effect of social usages. An autocratic ruler who is absolutely unlimited in his choice of agencies, and whose sole responsibility is towards his own programme, has, in all the initial stages of a competition, immense advantages over a body of statesmen who labour under the necessity of shaping their course according to the indications of ethical signposts. We have accustomed ourselves to think that in the day of inevitable collision between these two policies, victory must rest with the one which is backed by the united force of the nation whose conscience it has consulted. But East-Asiatic affairs are still in their initial stage, and as such we have to consider them. Russia is making the most of her opportunities. She is not restrained by any scruples or deterred by any criticisms. Why should she be deterred or restrained? Manchuria has dropped like a ripe plum into her lap, and her present imperial duty is to guard it. It appears quite clear that the CZAR entertains with regard to China precisely the same views that his great-grand-father and name-sake entertained with regard to Turkey forty-six years ago. He considers that China is moribund, and that no time should be lost in making arrangements for the disposal of her assets. NICHOLAS the First explicitly invited Lord ABERDEEN to coöperate in a scheme for constituting Great Britain and Russia legatees of the Sultan's domains. He received a rebuff which preluded the Crimean war. NICHOLAS the Second was not likely to risk a similar rebuff by a similar invitation to Lord SALISBURY with regard to China. He appointed himself to succeed to such portions of the inheritance as might be conveniently appropriated, France agreeing to occupy the position of residuary legatee. England, on the other hand, has undertaken to try to keep China alive, and, at all events, to refrain from despoiling her until after her death. The two policies now present themselves to the world as plainly as though they had been written up on gigantic posters by the statesmen directing them. Russia can not be accused of want of frankness in the late stages of her procedure. She has demonstrated in the most unequivocal manner that Manchuria is her sphere of influence, and that no industrial or commercial enterprise by foreign races shall be permitted there without her sanction. The demonstration is quite complete. Its steps have been the acquisition of exclusive privileges in districts to which all the Powers had an equal right of access by treaty; the vetoing of any hypothecation of railways within Manchuria to foreign capitalists; and, in general, the treatment of all concessions obtained from China as political. Yet Russia gives no evidence of a belligerent mood. On the contrary, her aim seems to be pacific. She is persuaded that, sooner or later, England will be forced by the exigencies of the situation to endorse the partition programme, and she is doing what she can to lead the British Government as quickly as possible to a conclusion which she herself regards as the only peaceful solution of the problem. It seems like an abuse of language to apply the term "peaceful" to a course which amounts to nothing more or less than the vivisection of a huge empire. But when we say "peaceful" we mean simply "non-belligerent." China counts for nothing in Russian eyes. She has to be cut up; and by undertaking the operation resolutely and expeditiously, Russia thinks that it can be accomplished without bloodshed. We are firmly persuaded that Russia, in consideration of a free hand in Manchuria, would at any moment gladly conclude, and loyally endeavour to implement, a compact with England securing to the latter as large a slice of China as the most ambitious Britisher deems his country capable of digesting. England, however, is morally precluded from entering into such a compact. But if things continue in their present groove, the day will certainly come when she will have to choose between joining the scramble to take what she can get, and forcibly driving the Russians from positions where they will by that time be strongly, almost invulnerably, posted. Russia believes that England will choose the former alternative, and it must be admitted that the belief is solidly based on England's acquiescence in the closure of Talien and Port Arthur and on her occupation of Wei-hai-wei. In truth, all present appearances indicate that events are marching in the direction desired by Russia, and that, while avoiding any actual collision with her rival, she will by-and-by be able to rest her case on the strongest form of logic, the logic of accomplished facts. There is no visible obstacle to such a consummation. The one point of danger in Manchuria is Newchwang. England virtually monopolises the trade of Newchwang. She has a settlement there, and Japan also will soon have a concession of her own on the banks of the Liao. If Russia makes any bluntly arbitrary effort to replace Chinese sovereignty at Newchwang by her own, there will be trouble. But that is not Russia's way. Gradually and by almost imperceptible methods she can create for herself in Manchuria a position so commanding that the commerce at Newchwang will come to be dependent on her mood, if, indeed, the whole trade of the region be not diverted to Talien, where neither British subject nor Japanese is or will be represented. Russian merchants look forward to establishing cotton factories in Manchuria, at an early date. Already the necessary machinery has been ordered by them in England. Given the Russian official paramount from the valley of the Liao to the valley of the Ussuri, and it is easy to conceive a course of procedure which, without ever affording a pretext for armed interference by a foreign Power, would nevertheless eventually render Newchwang and every part of Manchuria an impossible place of business for any foreigner not bowing to Russian supremacy. In short, Russia seems to have gained everything she wants, for the present at all events. She has established herself behind an impenetrable curtain in Manchuria, and the world will be denied any full view of the stage until she has collected there all the properties she needs for the last act of the drama and trained all the characters in the cast.

The gist of this is that Russia in Manchuria does not constitute any immediate menace to the peace of the East. If the steps by which she planted herself there did not provoke foreign opposition, the processes of her subsequent growth will be still less provocative. The more anxious she is to preserve her own sphere of influence intact, the more scrupulous she will be to avoid trespass upon England's sphere. A great deal has been said about the Peking-Hankow Railway. It is to be built by a Belgian syndicate which is supposed to be under the influence of France and Russia, and if it were connected with the Trans-Siberian Railway in Manchuria, Russia would have overland access to the Yangtze valley, which access is spoken of as likely to give her the complete control of that region. There are a great many hypotheses here. There is the hypothesis that the Peking-Hankow line will fall into Russian hands; there is the hypothesis that the Peking-Shanghai line will fall into Russian hands; there is the hypothesis that the Peking-Shanghai line will be prolonged to Liaotung in Russian hands; and there is the hypothesis that access to the Yangtze by a solitary railway thousands of miles long would give to Russia, in the valley of the great river, a position superior to that held by England, who has direct access to the same valley by a water route which she absolutely commands. So many hypotheses constitute a chimera. In the event of China's dismemberment, the Yangtze valley will fall to the lot of the mistress of the seas, whoever that may be at the moment. The Russian spectre looms gigantic in some imaginations, but that its shadow should reach to the banks of the Yangtze is beyond sober conception.

It is on the side of France that the chief menace of trouble seems to be coming in sight. If one could imagine a great nation—the most refined and logical nation in the world—suddenly visited by an access of vertigo which removed the acts of its people beyond the range of all rational calculation, that would appear to be France's case to-day. The DREYFUS affair derives its importance, not from the probability that there has been a terrible miscarriage of justice which military partisanship refuses to redress, but from the fact that it reveals to us one after another of France's prominent citizens in the character of men who have thrown all their moral ballast over-board, and are drifting at the mercy of every wind of passion and prejudice. In the presence of such a mood it is impossible to tell what a day may bring forth, and when we add that the French are burning with resentment against England in consequence of the Fashoda affair, and that the vertigo of which the DREYFUS scandal has furnished so many examples, found another illustration in the extraordinary demands recently preferred by France at Shanghai, we have sufficient materials for uneasiness. Russia in the Yangtze valley is a mere bogie, but France seems bent upon getting there. On the one hand, she seeks to divert the trade of the upper Yangtze to Tonquin via Yunnan; on the other, she appears resolved to utilize every pretext for the purpose of gaining an extended foothold in the valley itself. It is with France that a collision seems most imminent, and in casting up its eventualities we may at least comfort ourselves with the reflection that Russia is not at all likely to move a ship or march a squadron in the interests of France's Yangtze ambition. One of these days the concession which a French syndicate has obtained for building a railway from Söul to Wiju will become an object of great value in Russia's eyes; but that day is not yet, and until she has consolidated herself securely in Manchuria, Russia will not make any sacrifices to French aspirations in the Yangtze Valley.

FOREIGN TRADE OF JAPAN.

THE following totals relating to the foreign trade of Japan during the past two years are published in the Customs Returns:—

	1898 yen.	1897. yen.	Increase. yen.
Exports.....	165,662,304	163,135,077	2,527,227
Imports.....	276,996,526	219,300,771	57,695,755
Total...	442,658,830	382,435,848	60,222,982

The total growth of the trade is the largest on record, the nearest approximation being the growth shown in 1894 as compared with 1893, namely, 52,758,011 yen. But in the year 1894 the increase was tolerably evenly divided between exports and imports, the increment in the case of the former being 24 millions, and the increment in the case of the latter, 29 millions, in round numbers. In 1898, on the contrary, exports showed a development of only 2½ millions, whereas imports increased by 57½ millions. These facts, however, must not be taken without analysis. Japan's export trade is made up of raw products and manufactured goods, in the proportion of 5 to 3, approximately. If we follow that division, the figures for the past two years become:—

	1898. yen.	1897. yen.
Export of Raw Products.....	106,197,206	117,771,632
Export of Manufactured Goods	59,465,098	45,363,445

It appears, therefore, that, whereas the export of raw products fell off by 11½ million yen, that of manufactured goods increased by 14 millions. Indeed, of the 12 chief staples making up the export trade in manufactured goods, only one failed to increase, namely, carpets, which fell from 973,871 yen in 1897, to 850,879 yen in 1898. Nothing is more interesting in Japan's foreign trade than the steady development of manufactured goods. We shall set down here the figures for 1898, 1897, and 1889, so as to show not only the growth in the past year, but also the growth that has taken place in a decade:—

Twelve Principal Staples of Manufactured Goods Exported.

	1898. Yen.	1897. Yen.	1889. Yen.
Habutere	9,595,596	9,595,596	804,149
Other Silk Piece Goods	513,531	186,000	2,204,480
Silk Handkerchiefs	3,350,246	3,350,246	243,574
Cotton Piece Goods	8,519,307	8,519,376	51,014
Carpets	850,879	973,871	1,137,087
Matches	6,271,372	5,041,993	1,057,087
Flowered Mitting	3,098,818	1,029,738	286,583
Cotton Yarns	8,225,671	23,400,177	1,499,888
Porcelain and Pottery	1,080,548	1,819,058	589,649
Lacquer	783,134	707,408	1,057,087
Straw Hats	5,281,218	3,181,973	26,008
Umbrellas	887,198	668,957	26,008
Total	50,456,948	45,363,445	6,594,140

It thus appears that the exported value of these twelve staples of manufacture increased nine-fold in a decade; and it further appears that whereas the ratio of manufactured goods to raw products in the export trade was 6½ to 55 in 1889, the ratio in 1898 was 33 to 55. The lesson taught by these figures has often been insisted on by us during the past few years, namely, that Japan's future will probably be industrial. On the other hand, if we look at the export of raw products, we find that it is made up of 7 principal staples, namely, Silk, Tea, Rice, Copper, Coal, Camphor, and Marine Products. The last, Marine Products, may be capable of great development. It is, perhaps, one of the fields where foreign enterprise and foreign capital might be profitably employed. But its growth during the past decade has been so insignificant that we need not consider it in this context. Taking the other six staples, we have the following figures:—

	1898. Yen.	1897. Yen.	1889. Yen.
Silk	44,673,342	58,683,102	29,250,052
Tea	8,215,991	7,860,460	6,136,728
Rice	5,919,233	6,145,249	7,434,653
Copper	7,267,074	5,776,774	2,879,335
Coal	15,229,960	11,545,801	2,337,804
Camphor	1,174,574	1,318,292	1,391,371
Total	82,480,180	91,329,678	49,449,943

The rate of development in this branch of the export trade does not bear comparison with the rate shown above in the case of manufactured products; the rate for the principal staples of raw products being less than 2 to 1; and that for the manufactured products, more than 9 to 1. Further, if we examine the items that make up the list, they do not seem to suggest any prospect of large increment hereafter.

Tea, Rice, and Camphor may be set aside at once: Tea because the market for it is limited and shows no sign of growing; Rice because the domestic demand will probably keep the quotation at such a point that profitable export will be impossible, except to supply the special need which exists in Europe irrespective of price; and Camphor because, whatever Japan's produce might become under careful husbanding, it tends at present, and has for many years tended, to diminish rather than to increase. With regard, then, to the remaining three staples, the figures for Silk seem, at first sight, encouraging. It used to be thought, indeed, that an almost unlimited field offered for the export of Japanese silk; but, of late, China, with her newly established filatures and her originally better product, has become a powerful competitor, and there is now reason not only to modify the hopes once entertained for the Japanese staple, but even to apprehend that it may be partly driven out of the arena. At all events, the trade in raw silk is shown by experience to be a delicate business, and the annual fluctuations are very heavy. For example:—

EXPORT OF RAW SILK DURING THE PAST 5 YEARS.
Yen.	Millions.
1893..... 31,591,935	—
1894..... 42,892,751	Increase..... 11½
1895..... 50,928,440	Increase..... 8
1896..... 31,666,210	Decrease..... 19½
1897..... 58,683,102	Increase..... 27
1898..... 44,673,342	Decrease..... 14

Apparently the export of this staple reached its maximum in 1897, and we should scarcely be warranted in looking for any considerable development in the future. As for coal, it shows a substantial increase—from 2½ million yen in 1889 to 15½ millions in 1898. But the growth of manufacturing industry in Japan will involve a correspondingly increased domestic consumption of coal, so that the portion available for export will become more and more limited. According to what we know now, Japan is not rich in coal. New seams may be discovered, but experts allege that, even at her present rate of extracting the mineral, a fifty years' supply is not in sight. Coal, then, can not be regarded as a considerably expanding staple of export. Copper alone remains, and the same remark applies to it, that the sources of supply are comparatively small. On the whole we can not see that the future of the export trade in raw materials offers an encouraging prospect. The great hope seems to lie in manufactured products.

It might be supposed that the remarkable increase of imports, namely, 57½ million yen, was in anticipation of the high rates imposed by the New Tariff, which went into operation from the beginning of this year. But, whatever the influence of that factor may have been, it does not make itself conspicuously apparent in the returns. Here are the figures for the regular staples which ought to be chiefly affected by an appreciation of import duties:—

	Yen. 1898.	Yen. 1897.	Millions.
Cotton Yarns.....	8,547,582	5,895,258	Decrease..... 2½
Shirtings.....	7,099,477	5,835,347	Increase..... 12
Other Cotton Goods.....	9,458,090	8,474,083	Stationary.....
Camlets.....	4,398,457	3,835,881	Increase..... 1½
Station Cloth.....	1,604,270	1,815,582	Decrease..... 1
Flannel.....	2,386,283	1,187,656	Slight Increase.....
Woollen Cloth.....	2,809,378	2,913,536	Increase..... 1
Watches.....	1,960,372	1,502,813	Increase..... 1

The total increase under these headings does not exceed 2½ million yen. It is to the following imports that the greater part of the growth in the returns must be attributed:—

	1898. Yen.	1897. Yen.	mil.
Raw Cotton.....	45,744,899	43,620,214	Increase 2
Sugar.....	28,256,359	19,799,092	" 8½
Rice.....	48,204,197	21,528,429	" 19½
Alcohol.....	2,698,039	969,360	" 1½

These five articles account for 32 millions of the increase. Among them rice is the most remarkable. The import of rice under normal circumstances ranges from 4 to 6 millions of yen, but the exceptionally bad harvests of 1896 and 1897 created an extraordinary demand which will, of course, disappear in the face of the fine yield for 1898. Should the rice crop in the current year be of average quality, we may anticipate that, under this heading alone, the imports for 1899 will show a diminution of fully 40 million yen. Increments of more or less importance appear in many branches of the import trade independently of those we have quoted, and they would indicate a healthy growth if the disturbing factor of the new Tariff did not appear in the account. But importers themselves are alone competent to say how much they have forestalled the Tariff. The Report of the Chamber of Commerce may, perhaps, give us some information about that subject. Meanwhile we shall probably be right in affirming that had not the course of trade been influenced by bad rice crops and an impending appreciation of customs duties, the imports would not have shown a total growth of more than 15 or 16 million yen, and the total development of Japan's foreign commerce would have been 18 or 19 million yen, approximately. That is not a very striking result. Indeed it seems a fair conclusion that the only essentially healthy feature is the growth of manufactured exports. We may also conclude that, in spite of two bad rice crops in succession, the people found themselves in very comfortable circumstances. The increased import of sugar from 19½ million yen to 28½ millions is an infallible indication in that sense.

INTERPRETERS IN COURTS OF LAW.

In the Budget for next fiscal year, the Government included an appropriation of 37,636 yen to defray the expenses of interpreters for twenty-five courts of law, in view of the imminent operation of the Revised Treaties. The House of Representatives cut down this appropriation to 25,707 yen. It will therefore be necessary to reduce the proposed number of interpreters correspondingly. No serious inconvenience will necessarily result, for the interpreters can be sent to whatever Court they are required, there being no likelihood that more than two or three tribunals will be simultaneously occupied trying cases in which foreigners are concerned.

TRANSLATION OF THE TARIFF.

It is a perplexing and difficult matter to secure absolute accuracy in a document like a tariff where translations—especially translations from a language like Japanese—have to be relied on. Mr. Keil's compilation of the various tariffs is naturally a book on which reliance will be placed by the mercantile public, in view of the author's connexion with the Chamber of Commerce and his reputation. But even Mr. Keil's work does not appear to be free from error. Here, for example, are a few points:—

In the preface it is stated that modifications may have to be inserted when the Austro-Hungarian Treaty is at hand and published. But the Austro-Hungarian Treaty has been already published.

In several cases where the rates of duty are the same under the Conventional Tariff and the Statutory, he quotes the latter, forgetting, apparently, that the Statutory Tariff is liable to alteration, whereas the Conventional is unalterable. This, of course, is only a question of method.

Under No. 114, "Bromide of Potash" is shown, but "Other Bromides" are omitted, though they appear in the German Tariff.

Under No. 239, we find "Steel mild, Pig, Ingot, Plate and Sheet," the rate shown being 5 per cent. under the French Tariff. But the French Tariff mentions only "Pig, Ingot, and Slab."

Under No. 241, "Steel, Plate and Sheet" is put at 5 per cent., whereas it ought to be 7½ per cent. according to the British Tariff.

Under No. 258, we find "Blankets of all kinds, single or in piece," 7.458 under the British Tariff. But the British Tariff covers only "Woollen Blankets and whipped Blankets in piece."

Under No. 368, we find "Handkerchiefs, cotton, linen, or of linen and cotton, single or in piece," and the reference is to the British Tariff. But the British Tariff covers "Cotton Handkerchiefs in piece" only.

Under the heading "Perfumery" the exceptions made by the French Tariff, namely "Musk, Artificial Musk, and Grey Amber," are omitted.

We do not write in a critical spirit, but merely because importers may possibly be betrayed into erroneous calculations if these mistakes are left unnoticed.

THE UNLUCKY "KINSHU MARU."

FIVE MEN SWEEP OVERBOARD.

The Kinshu Maru, which seems to have an endless run of ill luck, had a rough experience on her voyage from Seattle. On the morning of the 31st December a stiff north-easterly gale blew, and there was a very high sea. The crew were engaged in securing hatch covers, and all moveable fittings on the after deck, when a very heavy sea broke on board and washed overboard one apprentice and four sailors, Chief Officer Laprack narrowly escaping the same fate. Capt. Brady put about, in search of the men, but, as might be expected, could not find them. Owing to the state of the weather, he hove to for 24 hours. The gale moderated at about 7 a.m. on Jan. 1st; and moderate weather was experienced the rest of the voyage. The ship received damage to her bulwarks.

SPIRIT OF THE VERNACULAR PRESS.

Under the Shimonoseki Treaty Japan acquired the privilege of special concessions at various places in China, and practical effect has been given to that provision of the Treaty in the case of Tientsin, Hangkow and Foochow. Arrangements will soon be completed, also, at Amoy and Chungking. The only place that presents any difficulty is Shanghai, no space being readily available there. At Yingkow, too, negotiations for a settlement have been carried almost to a conclusion, not directly under the Shimonoseki Treaty, however, but on the plea of most-favoured-nation treatment. All these new settlements have been carefully marked out. But what about their occupants? As yet they are only hostleries for insects and nurseries of weeds. The commercial enterprise of the nation lags far behind its military and diplomatic achievements. The tenantless settlements will soon become a laughing stock.—Asahi Shimbun.

Is it worth while to help China, or is her doom irrevocably sealed? That is the first question to be answered by those that have to shape Japan's policy. Surely she is very sick, but, for our own part, we do not think her sick unto death. There is still time to succour her. But the talk of stretching out hands of aid in obedience to pure chivalry is empty rhetoric. If we help her, it must be primarily because we are deeply interested in her fate, and in a very secondary degree because, as her neighbour, we wish her well. What, then, should be the method of aiding her? There is but one: to induce her to throw her whole territory open to trade. Western countries, in their strong rivalry, are devoting themselves to establishing spheres of influence within her borders. If they continue to pursue that route they will inevitably come into collision. But among them there are some who share the view that her integrity ought to be preserved. With such Powers Japan must join hands. They are wrong who say that China offers no grounds for hope. She is enormous in size, wealthy in productions, and peopled by a vast population of clever, capable, and civilized persons. There is nothing the matter with her except that the poison of Confucianism circulates in her veins and that her Government is rotten. If she embraced Occidental civilization her future would be assured, and already she has a strong tendency in that direction. What inspires most uneasiness is her foreign politics. Her Government is quite impotent to preserve good order, and foreigners are exposed to frequent outrages which furnish pretexts for embarrassing demands. From that point of view, it is plainly essential that the government should be strengthened. The army and the navy must be properly organized. Not less important is it to reform the administration. Feudalism is in the grain of the Chinese and advantage should be taken of the fact. The power of the provincial governors should be extended. They should be entrusted with the duty of treating with foreign States and of providing for the protection of the districts they administer, and their responsibilities should be clearly defined. As for Japan, it devolves upon her to take steps for forming a league of Powers to protect China. Happily the Chinese have begun to feel confidence in her. Care must be taken not to alienate their trust. Thus, while it is Japan's duty to give asylum to the political refugees who have fled hither from China, she should not show such favour to them as would alarm and offend her neighbour. Above all, she must definitely make up her mind whether she will help China or not, and having come to some resolve, must shape all her doings in accordance with it.—Fiji Shimpō.

Without pretending that legislative reforms were not essential and would not have been undertaken in any case, it can not be denied that much of our law-making has been inspired by the desire of fitting ourselves to assume jurisdiction over foreigners. With that object we have been content to frame laws which, in many respects, conflict with the customs of our country. Yet it seems that we have not done enough, and that now, on the eve of the operation of Treaty Revision, all sorts of changes have to be effected. Truly it might be better if we took the laws of foreign countries and adopted them wholesale. Be that as it may, however, we understand that among the proposed reforms, one relates to the treatment of foreign convicts. They are to be imprisoned in Kobe, Yokohama, Nagasaki, or Tokyo, and they are to have foreign food. It seems that for economical reasons bread is preferable to a mixed diet of rice and barley, to say nothing of other reasons. It seems, also, that if the Revised Commercial Code receives the Diet's consent, it will go into force from the 1st of July. Certainly we live in an era of reforms.—Nippon.

The House of Representatives does not sit for more than three months in the year at the outside. The business to be discharged by it during the present session is exceptionally large. Even if it worked unremittingly throughout its full period, it would have to leave several Bills undiscussed, and some of them may be very important measures in view of the near approach of the operation of the new Treaties. But the House is proceeding in the most leisurely manner imaginable. Not only have its daily sittings been short, but it rose on the 24th of December, and took a recess until the 16th of January, the sole reason of this lengthy vacation being that the party politicians wanted to stump the country. It does not appear that the House has any very vivid sense of its legislative responsibilities.—Hochi Shimbun.

The business capacity of the Japanese trader appears to be considerably below that of the Chinese. He has but a poor conception of the value of combination, and does not trust his confrère sufficiently to work in union with him. Then there is no to-morrow for him in his dealings. The profit of to-day suffices. He never looks ahead, never thinks of establishing his business on a really permanent footing. He is also essentially a spendthrift, squandering what he gains as fast as it comes to hand. There is no evidence that he possesses any effective desire of wealth, for he shows no disposition to accumulate capital. His pleasures, too, are paltry and demoralizing—said drinking and geisha buying. It is a pity that he can not strike out some more elevating lines of amusement. And it is above all a pity that he seems to have no conception of the responsibilities of riches. The good example set by Mr. Okura Kihachiro unfortunately finds no imitators.—Jinmin.

There is a bad spirit of militarism now prevailing in the country. It has established itself in educational circles. Loyalty and patriotism are very fine things, but they may be perverted into abuses. They may become synonyms for feudalism, for national isolation, for military narrow-mindedness. They may lead to the adoption of a mistaken creed in everything. The men who are the slaves of these perverted ideas know nothing of the imperial policy which would found a great Japan. They shrink from the wholesome atmosphere of competition. Their sole idea is that a man must be ready to sacrifice his life if the country is in danger and the throne shaken. They have no conception of the main use of military and naval power, namely, to secure the maintenance of peace. The old notion of taking vengeance on an enemy is their main motive. They distinguish Liaotung by a special colour on the maps provided for schools, and they tell the lads that the loss of the peninsula must never be forgotten. There has been a case of a schoolmaster who sent his students out into the snow telling them they must prepare for the climate of Russia, so as to be able to fight their country's natural foe. Peace honourably guaranteed by constant readiness for war, is an idea which has not presented itself to these blundering patriots.—Jinmin.

Progress and liberality are supposed to be the bases of Japan's national policy. Unfortunately the fact is not discernible in our educational methods. Against technical education nothing need be said, but in the field of general education there is a good deal of the spirit of anti-foreign isolation. We are on the verge of Mixed Residence, yet the question as between a Japanese policy and a cosmopolitan policy is still discussed. Why should we be in any doubt about a standard? We have had our own precedents for the past 2,000 years. If any country can be said to have a national policy, surely the national policy of Japan from time immemorial has been the most liberal eclecticism. Can not our educationists appreciate the fact? It is a common saying that bigoted religionists make the worst possible men of business, they are so narrow-minded and so lacking in versatility. The same remark might be made of the teachers in Japanese schools. Prejudice and Conservatism are their dogmas, and they allow no departure from them. Youth emerges from their teaching with a conviction that the highest duty to a prince is to commit suicide at his bidding, and that the way to show patriotism is to throw stones at a foreigner. Thus are sown seeds that will one day bear a crop of disaster for Japan. Let the Educational Department look to it.—Kokumin Shimbun.

Once a fortnight there appears in Rome a journal called Vox Urbis. It is written entirely in Latin, and in this tongue discusses the most modern events. The Dreyfus case does not puzzle it in the slightest, and M. Clémenceau becomes "ferox vehemensque homo"; and Vive l'Armée, becomes Bene emeritius.

LORD CHARLES BERESFORD.

Mr. J. P. Mollison, Chairman of the local branch of the China Association, has received the following telegram from Lord Charles Beresford, dated at Osaka:—

Accept dinner 23rd January with pleasure, BERESFORD.

Mr. Mollison telegraphed the invitation to Lord Charles both at Nagasaki and Kobe, and two hours after receiving the above telegram a letter turned up, dated on board the Coptic, January 11th, and posted at Kobe on the 13th inst., which also conveyed his Lordship's acceptance of Yokohama's invitation.

We understand that the subscribers to the dinner—which will take place at the Oriental Hotel—now number 130, but as names will be accepted up to the last day we fully expect 150 will sit down. The project is evidently most popular.

At a meeting on Monday afternoon the following were elected as a committee to make arrangements for the dinner to Lord Charles Beresford: Mr. J. P. Mollison, Mr. W. W. Till, Mr. E. Flint Kilby, Mr. R. D. Robinson, Mr. J. Dodds, Mr. W. F. Mitchell, Mr. F. Lowder, Mr. W. B. Walter, Mr. H. M. Bevis, Mr. Alfred Woolley, Mr. A. B. Wallford, Mr. G. Syme Thompson, and Mr. F. S. James, Mr. W. F. Mitchell was elected as Chairman and Messrs. Robinson and Dodds as Vice-Chairmen.

On the morning of Wednesday, the 11th inst., Lord Charles Beresford visited the Mitsu Bishi Company's Shipbuilding Yard and Dock at Tategami, and the Engine Works and Dock at Tategami, Nagasaki, Mr. Clark, Foreign Consulting Engineer to the Company, showing him everything that was to be seen. At Akunoura, Mr. Shoda also accompanied Lord Charles through the works. The recent extensions of the works both at Tategami and Akunoura have so much increased the area of the works as to make the survey of the whole in a single morning quite onerous. Lord Charles, however, examined everything with the keen interest of the expert, and was, the Nagasaki Press believes, considerably impressed with the docking, repairing, and shipbuilding facilities of Nagasaki.

After the tiffin at Kobe on Friday, the 13th, Lord Charles Beresford had a long conference at the Kobe Club with members of the local branch of the China Association. Later in the day he left for Osaka accompanied by Mr. Hall, H.B.M.'s Consul. Twenty delegates of various bodies met at the Station to welcome his Lordship. Mr. Nishizawa, Secretary of Osaka Fu, was also there to accompany him to the Osaka Hotel. On Saturday Lord Charles Beresford inspected different mills. He visited the Osaka Boseki (Cotton Spinning), Seitō Kaisha (Sagar Refinery), Seisui Kaisha (Match Factory) and Seigo Kaisha (Brick Factory.) An entertainment in his honour was held in the evening under the auspices of the Osaka Chamber of Commerce, at which Major-General Oseko, Chief of the Staff Department of the Fourth Division, was present.

Lord Charles Beresford arrived at Kyoto on Jan. 15th at 11.06, from Osaka, accompanied by Mr. Hall, British Consul at Kobe. He proceeded to the Kyoto Hotel. After tiffin, he paid visits to the temples and other buildings, and at 5 p.m. proceeded to the City Hall, where Japanese citizens welcomed him.

Lord Charles Beresford arrived in Tokyo on the 17th inst. and proceeded to the British Legation. On Wednesday, the 18th he paid visits to Marquis Yamagata, Marquis Saigo, Minister of Home Affairs; Viscount Katsura, Minister of War; Viscount Tanaka, Minister of the Imperial Household; Viscount Aoki, Minister of Foreign Affairs; and Admiral Yamamoto, Minister of the Navy.

The members of the Toho Kyokwai (National Oriental Association) invite Lord Charles to the Imperial Hotel on the 21st.

IMPERIAL DIET.

SATURDAY, 14TH JANUARY.

HOUSE OF PEERS.

The House of Peers met at 10.15 a.m., and the following Bills, presented by the Government, having been read for the first time, were handed to Special Committees:—

AMENDING THE COMMERCIAL CODE.

1. A Bill for amending the Commercial Code. This Bill was debated and passed by the House of Peers in its twelfth session, but failed to come up for discussion in the House of Representatives owing to the latter's dissolution. The Minister of Justice introduced the Bill in the present session, and explained that the amendments it embodied were chiefly owing to the necessity of bringing the Commercial Code into harmony with the Revised Civil Code. His Excellency added that the Law of Bankruptcy was still in the hands of the Revising Committee, but would be laid before the House in a few days.

CRIMINAL PROCEDURE.

2. A Bill for amending portions of the Code of Criminal Procedure.

The changes proposed by this Bill have reference chiefly to the assumption of jurisdiction by Japan over foreigners. According to the present law, all documentary statements made by an accused person or by the witnesses for the prosecution or for the defence must be signed and stamped. Foreigners, however, do not use stamps, nor, indeed, is any special benefit secured by requiring that a stamp shall be added to a signature. It is therefore proposed to amend the law in the sense that when the person making a statement has no stamp, his signature shall suffice; and when he can not either make a signature or employ a stamp, the document may be signed for him in his presence by a duly authorized substitute. The second amendment is the abolition of the "secret cell" (misshitsu) as a means of obtaining a confession from a suspect at the preliminary examination. It is not considered desirable, however, to do away with all means of eliciting information from a person under examination. Hence the proposal is to substitute the "segregated cell" for the secret cell in cases where there appears to be a necessity for obtaining information. The third amendment is the insertion of a provision that where an examining judge refuses to grant bail, the prisoner shall have the right of appeal to the Court under whose jurisdiction he is being examined.

3. A Bill for amending the Regulations relating to the lodging of Security in connexion with Appeals in Cases of Crime.

The Regulations, as they now stand, provide that a person accused of a crime who appeals from the judgment of a lower tribunal, must lodge a sum of 20 yen in Court as security for expenses; but that, if he is unable to find such a sum, the Court may relieve him of the obligation on receipt of a documentary statement of his impecuniosity signed by his district head-man. Inasmuch, however, as no district head-man exists in the case of foreigners, it is proposed to provide that, in their case, a statement by the Consul of their nationality, or, failing the Consul, by the police-inspector of the district, shall suffice.

BANKS.

4. Two Bills for amending the Bank Regulations so as to bring them into harmony with the Revised Commercial Code.

PARCELS POST.

The Special Committee then reported favourably on the Government Bill for amending the Postal Regulations in the sense of enlarging the limits of size for parcels sent through the post, and increasing the maximum sum sendable by post office order, from 30 yen to 50 yen. The Bill was read a second and a third time without opposition.

The Bill (Government) relating to security in certain civil procedure was then passed.

REVENUE MEASURES.

A favourable report having been presented by the Special Committee on the Bill (sent up from the Lower House) for increasing the Statutory Import Dues on alcohol, tobacco, sanshu, &c., the Bill was carried through all its Readings.

ANCIENT TOMBS.

Mr. Kinoshita introduced a Representation urging the Government to take steps for the preservation of ancient tombs. He dwelt upon the fact that reverence for the memory of ancestors was a fundamental principle of Japanese morality. In many districts throughout the empire there were numbers of tombs which, though not identifiable as the burial places of special personages, were known by certain indications to be the sepulchres of members of the Imperial Family. The province of Yamato contained over eight hundred. Hinga was almost equally conspicuous, and Yamashiro, Kawachi, Izumo and Settsu had great numbers. Only a fraction of the tumuli were in the possession of the State, the majority being owned by private individuals, who did not hesitate to cut down the trees, and sometimes levelled the mounds to make barley-fields. Thus, in Nara Prefecture there were 742 tombs, of which only 283 were in the hands of the Government. The national sentiment was favourable at present to antiquarian and historical research, and it seemed particularly regrettable that these revered relics of a remote past, including perhaps, the sepulchres of the Emperor Jimmu and the Empress Kogo, should be suffered to fall into a state of dilapidation. Another consideration was that the places chosen for such tombs in old times had been elevated spots commanding fine prospects; just such places in short, as foreigners would desire to acquire for villa sites after the inauguration of mixed residence. That result was to be sincerely deprecated, for which reason the Representation urged the advisability of the State's purchasing all the tombs now in the possession of private persons.

It was suggested that direct reference to the names of the Emperor Jimmu and the Empress Kogo should be ruled out of the record, as wanting in respect, but the suggestion did not obtain support. The House voted the Representation unanimously, and rose at 12.15 p.m.

MONDAY, 16TH JANUARY.

HOUSE OF PEERS.

The House did not meet, the Committees alone assembling.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House met at 1.10 p.m.

SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

The following Bills having been favourably reported by Special Committees, with slight amendments, the House voted for their Second Readings:—

Bill for amending the Law of Registration.
Bill embodying a Project of Stamp-Tax Law.
Bill for levying Tonnage Dues.

The following Bills having been favourably reported on by Special Committees, their Second and Third Readings were voted at once:—

Three Bills for including the Tobacco Monopoly among the ordinary State Industries, instead of keeping it as a separate undertaking, and for transferring its fixed-capital and working-capital funds to the accounts of the State Industries instead of making them matters of special account.

Bill empowering the Government to make issues of Public Undertakings Bonds and Railway Bonds in advance of the time fixed by Law, if the condition of the money market made such a course advisable.

Bill empowering the Government to make drafts upon the Indemnity in lieu of issuing Bonds, should such a course seem advisable; provided that the amount of the drafts be subsequently restored to the Indemnity out of the proceeds of Bond issues.

In answer to questions with reference to this Bill, the Government Delegate explained that the residue of the Indemnity now in hand, in the form of ready money and securities, aggregated 132,310,000 yen, in round numbers, and that, if the Bill were passed, the Government would probably employ 70,650,000 yen of that total during the fiscal year 1899-1900 instead of immediately issuing the Public Undertakings and Railway Bonds sanctioned under the post bellum programme. It was expected, however, that the amount would be made good within the course of the year.

Bill empowering the Treasury to temporarily draft portions of the Indemnity in the Ordinary Revenue, provided that the monies thus drafted be subsequently restored.

Mr. Kudo Kokan (Opposition) spoke strongly against this measure. He denounced it as calculated to remove the revenues and expenditures of the State beyond the supervision of the Diet, which would be entirely unconstitutional; and he declared that money in the hands of the present Cabinet was like meat set before a hungry tiger: the temptation to consume it was irresistible.

Mr. Hoshi Toru understood that this Bill had been drafted by the preceding Cabinet, of which Mr. Kudo's Party were supporters. Was that the case?

Mr. Kudo said that was a very strange question. It did not matter to him what Cabinet had drafted a measure. The measure was to be considered on its merits. He was not, like Mr. Hoshi Toru, a blind follower of persons rather than of principles.

Mr. Hoshi failed to perceive that his question had been answered. What he asked was simply whether or not the Bill now before the House had been drafted by the last Cabinet.

Mr. Kudo replied that he knew nothing about it, and quitted the rostrum.

Bill for abolishing the system of Special Account with regard to Consolidated Bonds, the whole issue having been already floated.

Bill for increasing the Working Capital of the Mint. According to the present system, gold bullion in the vaults of the Mint is stated in terms of coin without reference to the alloy which is added for purposes of coinage. Hence the account value of the bullion appears less than its real value by the weight of the alloy. The Bill provides that the difference shall be carried to the Working Capital of the Mint.

Bill for amending the system of Accounts of Government Railways in Hokkaido.

Bill for including in the Government Undertakings Account a sum of 4½ million yen, being the Permanent Working Capital of the Iron Foundry.

NEW BILLS.

The following Bills were read for the first time, and handed to Special Committees:—

Bill embodying a project of Nationalization Law (sent down from the Upper House.)

Bill for prolonging the operation of Law No. 63 of the year 1896—i.e. the Law conferring legislative power on the Governor-General of Formosa—(sent down from the Upper House.)

Bill for amending the Chemists and Druggists' Regulations—in the sense of permitting foreigners to engage in these occupations—(sent down from the Upper House.)

Bill for changing the Jurisdiction Limits of certain Law Courts (sent down from the Upper House.)

Bill for interchanging the Classifications of certain Districts (sent down from the Upper House.)

The President announced that there would be no session on the following day in consequence of the funeral of the Princess Sada, and the House rose at 3.05 p.m.

WEDNESDAY, JAN. 18TH.

HOUSE OF PEERS.

The House did not sit.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House met at 1.10 p.m.

FORMOSA.

Mr. Numa Gogo, who recently returned from Formosa after a residence of 5 years there, presented a series of Questions with reference to the administration of the island, the development of its resources, the establishment of order, the building of railways, the protection of the coasts against Chinese trespasses, and so forth. He spoke for over two hours.

BUDGETS.

The Chairman of the Budget Committee reported favourably on two Supplementary Budgets, embodying appropriations for the extension of the accommodation available for storing alcohol and kerosene in the Yokohama Customs, and for a loan to the Sōul-Chemulpo Railway Company. He moved that the Order be changed for the purpose of discussing these Budgets at once, but the House rejected the motion.

NEW BILLS.

The following Bills were then passed:—

Bill for the better Protection of the Aborigines in Hokkaido.

Bill for amending the Law relating to the relief of the Families of deceased officials.

The following Bills were handed to Special Committees:—

Bill (presented by the Government) for granting a measure of Aid from the Treasury to the Bank of Formosa. The Bank is already invested with power to issue 5 million yen worth of bills payable at sight to bearer, but the privilege has hitherto proved of little value, owing to the fact that the people of Formosa have not yet acquired confidence in the Bank, and Japanese capitalists show little disposition to invest money in local enterprises. The Government contemplated granting a loan of 3 million yen without interest, and introduced a Bill for that purpose in the 12th session of the Diet; but it did not come up for discussion. The present Bill provides that the Treasury shall purchase one million yen worth of the Bank's shares, pledging itself not to sell any of them for the space of one year, and agreeing not to receive any dividend on them for that time.

Bill (sent down from the Upper House, where it had been presented by the Government) for amending the Press Law in the sense of allowing foreigners to engage in journalistic enterprise.

Bill (sent down from the Upper House and presented by the Government) for amending the Law relating to security in Civil Procedure.

Bill (private) for exempting from urban, prefectural, or communal taxes all lands, rural as well as urban, which are to be brought under the operation of the increased Land Tax.

Two Bills (private) for amending the Organization of the Board of Audit, in the sense of providing that all disciplinary measures taken against the members of the Board, shall not be adopted by the Board itself, as is at present the case, but shall be decided by a special tribunal forming part of the Supreme Court; and that any member absenting himself from his duty for more than 90 days in consequence of sickness which offers no prospect of cure, shall be retired, as is the general rule with regard to officials.

Bill (private) for altering Divisional Boundaries in Yehime Prefecture.

Bill (private) for granting State aid to the extent of 150,000 yen in Agricultural Experimental Stations in cities and prefectures, in consideration of the fact that the burden imposed upon the communes by the increased Land Tax will render them unable to support these stations, the value of which has nevertheless been proved by experience.

The Chairman of the Petitions Committee asked permission to postpone the discussion of 9 petitions which had been placed on the Order, and the House rose at 4.15 p.m.

FATAL FIRE AT A MISSION HOUSE.

The Methodist Mission House at Hirotsuki, occupied by the Rev. R. P. Alexander and family, has been destroyed by fire. Mrs. Alexander received fatal injuries, while Mr. Alexander and their little son were also injured, though slightly. The cook's wife is said to have been so seriously burned as to be in danger of her life. Mr. and Mrs. Alexander have a large circle of friends both in Japan and America.

THE COLLISION NEAR KOBE.

The Kobe Herald of Monday says:—The P.M. liner City of Peking, which arrived in harbour at 10 o'clock last night, from Yokohama, had a perilously narrow escape in coming up the Bay, a Japanese gunboat—the Amagi Kan, we believe—having run into her. Full particulars are not available at the time of writing, but from what we have been able to gather the gunboat was steering a very erratic course, first her red light, then the green, and then again the red being seen from the bridge of the Peking. When the collision occurred the mail boat was going astern, at least her engines had been put full speed astern, we understand, and to this, very possibly, is due in some measure her escape. The Amagi Kan struck the Peking right amidships, carrying away No. 34 deck and about 20 feet of the rail and indenting three of the plates. Luckily the plates were not cut through. The blow was a sliding one, thanks to the skilful handling of the two ships when within a few yards of each other. From passengers who have gone on to Hongkong by the mail boat we learn that the warship did not stop at all, a proceeding which certainly calls for some explanation and enquiry. For a time it was feared that the Peking was in immediate danger, and orders were at once given for the boats to be got out. The shock of the collision brought all the passengers and most of the crew on deck, and in a very few minutes all the boats' crews were at their stations and everything ready for the lowering of the boats. The passengers speak in the highest praise of the coolness maintained by Captain Smith and his officers, and attribute their escape in a large degree to his splendid seamanship. The City of Peking was able to proceed on her voyage and left next day for Hongkong, via Nagasaki and Shanghai.

The Amagi Kan, we hear, sustained no damage whatever.

FATAL ACCIDENT AT THE JAPAN BREWERY.

A serious accident occurred on Saturday morning about eight o'clock at the Japan Brewery, Yokohama. About a hundred coolies were engaged on the new cellar in course of construction when part of the framework, loosened by the heavy rain of the previous night, collapsed, together with a portion of the brickwork. Over a dozen coolies who were at work were buried in the debris, and one of them named Nakamori Seijiro, was so badly injured that he died shortly after being taken to the General Hospital. Superintendent Okada, the able and efficient Superintendent of the Buff police station, was apprised of the disaster, and with the assistance of some of his men the unfortunate coolies were extricated. It was found that two besides Nakamori were seriously injured, while five others had received less severe wounds. One was taken to the General Hospital, where he was treated, and the others who were badly hurt were conveyed to a Japanese hospital. The police are enquiring into the question of responsibility for the disaster. The contractor is Mr. Shimizu Mannosuke.

FOREIGN AUCTIONEER AND A JAPANESE BUYER.

The Yokohama Chihō Saibansho delivered judgment on Thursday in the case of Eytan and Watanabe. Defendant, an ironmonger, refused to take delivery of 330 lbs. of sheet rubber sold to him by auction on April 11th by Mr. Eytan, and owing to this default Mr. Eytan was compelled to temporarily pay his client the proceeds of the sale from his own pocket. The defendant still refusing to take delivery of the goods, they were sold, with the defendant's consent, for 89 yen on the 17th inst. The plaintiff claimed the difference between his advance to the original seller and the receipts of the second sale, amounting to 99 yen, and his commission for the last sale at the rate of 5 per cent. The defence was that the lower portion of the sheet rubber was inferior in quality to the upper part. Judgment for plaintiff.

DEVOTION TO THE EMPEROR [KINNO.]

The interesting essay which we publish below, from the pen of Mr. T. Kuroda, was written in French, and reached us in that language, but we have thought it wiser to translate it, with the author's consent, because in an English form it is better suited to an English newspaper, and is also calculated to reach a larger circle of readers. We do not wish to be understood as endorsing the opinions of the essayist in every respect. For example, it seems to us a somewhat extreme view to hold that the Diet "assumed the initiative power in bestowing upon the Emperor a portion of the Indemnity." Such a description of the Diet's course is scarcely consistent with the facts. What the Diet did was to pass a Representation to the Government embodying suggestions from both Houses that a portion of the Indemnity might be transferred to the Imperial estate instead of being spent for ordinary national purposes. The Emperor is the head of the Government. It was to the Emperor that the Diet's Representation went in the first instance, and by the Emperor's orders it was acted upon. In short, the transfer of the 20 millions was made by the Emperor's direction, and could not have been made without that direction. No violence was done, in form at any rate, to the principle that the Indemnity belonged to the Sovereign and could not be disposed of without his sanction. One thing, however, is quite certain, namely, that whatever theory may be formulated as to the Emperor's right of property in the Indemnity, His Majesty would never have entertained, or conceived, the idea of diverting so much as a sen of it to his own use had not a suggestion in that sense come from the Diet. If it was expedient that the Imperial estate should be enriched out of the Indemnity, only one way of effecting that end presented itself, namely, the way adopted by the Diet. To which consideration, then, should the greater importance have been attached, the practical desirability of making an addition to the Imperial estate, or the sentimental expediency of clinging to a principle which rendered such an addition impossible? The inauguration of parliamentary institutions has produced a great many changes in Japan, and it might often be found that administrative and financial impotence would result from attempting to observe old doctrines too closely under the new conditions. Nor are we by any means convinced that Mr. Kuroda's theory can be reconciled with history. For many centuries the Sovereign's financial authority was extremely limited in Japan. In the days of the Fujiwara and the Hojo the Throne's means of support were entirely beyond its control, and in the days of the Bakufu it received a regular yearly stipend fixed by the Tokugawa regents. It is probable that few Japanese of the present time would be found willing to deny Mr. Kuroda's theory, but the precedents furnished by the national annals certainly do not appear consistent with it. One word may be added about the peculiar and beautiful relation described by Mr. Kuroda as existing between the Sovereign and his people. If we look back to remote times in Japan, we find, not so much that an obligation devolved upon the Emperor "to manifest the most constant care and beneficent vigilance for the welfare of his subjects," as that His Majesty occupied the position of the nation's high priest. It was for him to pray to heaven, and propitiate the gods, on behalf of his people. They were not required or expected to perform those functions for themselves. Out of that relationship the theory of mutual helpfulness and interdependence indicated by Mr. Kuroda may have grown, though democracy is scarcely the name we should have been disposed to apply to it.

Much is said in Japan, especially in recent days, concerning the spirit of devotion to the Emperor; and it has become in some sort a common belief that the phrase embodies an idea so uncontested that no person may presume to question any course of action, of whatever nature, with which it is associated. That it represents the highest duty of the people, and stands as the foundation of our social and political structure, is beyond dispute; but this does not warrant the assumption that the community must place itself blindly at the discretion of all who make use of it in support of their projects. To guard against misunderstanding, an inquiry may advantageously be made into the true meaning of the words, so simple in themselves yet so easily diverted from their just purpose.

When the principle of devotion to the Emperor is spoken of, the fact should be borne in mind that our Sovereign is the ruler of this Empire of Japan, and not of any other country or countries. Each nation has its own history and institutions, and each Emperor holds his own peculiar station, differing more or less from that of others, although the same title is given to all monarchs of imperial dominions. In Japan, from the time when the first ancestor of the ruling house founded his dynasty, his successors have continued to reign and govern, through all developments of history, and the promulgation of the Constitution has not only introduced no change into the political system, but has established and confirmed that system with additional strength and clearness. There can be no doubt that our Sovereign is the absolute head of the State. He holds in his hand the power to regulate, according to his will, everything that concerns the empire. The parliament is nothing else than his legislative organ, as the Cabinet is his administrative organ; this being an express provision of the Constitution itself.

There is one important and essential point to be considered in connection with the Emperor's possession of absolute and supreme control. This is, that the monarch who occupies the throne is immutably bound to be ever mindful, in the exercise of his power, of the obligation, inherited from his ancestors, to manifest the most constant care and beneficent vigilance for the welfare of his subjects. A vital moral principle is thus united with the political system by which Japan is governed; and it would be a grave error to judge the methods employed in ruling this country, by the standards of authority which prevail in the various nations of Europe and America. The relation between the Sovereign and the people, in Japan, is in a measure that of father and child. On both sides a moral sentiment is mutually recognized, as binding together the fabric of society; and it was one of the consequences of this moral sentiment, and the influences proceeding therefrom, that by the will of His Majesty the Constitution was decreed, a Constitution totally different in spirit and purpose from that of any foreign State.

While the Emperor of Japan is wholly absolute in sway, he fulfils at the same time the moral function of watchful and protecting guardianship over all who live under his rule. These two attributes of supremacy, entirely distinct, yet inseparable and happily united, have always guided the political history of the country, from the foundation of the imperial line through the numerous centuries of its unbroken descent. To their influence we trace the distinguishing conditions of our national existence—conditions upon whose faithful maintenance the future of the State depends, and the intelligent recognition of which is the first duty of all who are concerned in the direction of public affairs.

During the third of a century that Japan has sought to utilise the advantages of Western civilization, attempts to imitate whatever bears the stamp of Europe have been far too frequent, many having been carried even to the point of utterly disregarding the basis to our social and political constitution. While free and vehement expression is given to the feeling of devotion to the Sovereign, we find a common tendency to assimilate the position of our Imperial house with that occupied by one or another of the ruling families of Europe. These efforts to apply a general rule to totally different conditions, never judicious, become grotesque when the sovereignty of Japan is treated as comparable with that of England, whose government has undergone so many modifications in the last three hundred years that the controlling power of the throne is now merely nominal. Such errors must not be too lightly judged. In my belief, they lead to public demoralization,—perhaps to the destruction of elements in which our national strength chiefly resides.

Within comparatively a few days, a striking example of these misapplied ideas has presented itself, under circumstances so extraordinary that the escape of those responsible for it from condemnation by the country at large can be accounted for only by the ignorance of the masses, by gross misconception, or, it may be, by the hesitation of individual members of society to publicly discuss so delicate a topic. I refer to the almost unanimous vote of Parliament, offering to the Imperial house the sum of twenty million yen, remaining from the indemnity taken from China. In justification of its motive, it was alleged to be a token of the sincere devotion of the people towards the Sovereign, and the measure was consequently passed without debate by the two Chambers.

Let us examine the true significance of this offer,—this sadly misnamed "grant,"—on behalf of the people. To whom does the money exacted from the defeated adversary belong, if not to the State and to the head of the State? Does any one dispute that the war was declared by the will of our sovereign ruler? Will it be gainsaid that the peace which followed was his act, with all its conditions and material results? The victory was his, in the sense of every conviction to which the souls of the Japanese people are pledged; and the fruits of the victory were his own, to be disposed of in conformity to his judgment and authority. That he would avail himself of the experience and sagacity of his chosen counsellors in making use of them for the best interests of the State is, no doubt, a natural conclusion; but the attempt of Parliament to assume the initiative power of bestowing upon him a portion of that which he already possesses by his prerogative, is an abuse of privilege from which the sober sentiment of the community will assuredly revolt, when reflection has demonstrated its real character. I have been amazed that, among the entire Parliamentary body, not a single member was alive to the duty of probing this question, and endeavouring to throw upon it such light as should enable the legislators to realize the imprudence of the course they were pursuing. Outside of Parliament, it is true that some dissentient voices were heard. A few newspapers spoke in disapprobation, but their objections were apparently suggested by mere expediency, and showed no appreciation of the principles which should be most solicitously guarded.

It is not my purpose to analyze the arguments presented in defence of this procedure. I think the time will come when the simple statement of them will be their most effective refutation. But I am tempted, incidentally, to touch upon the plea that the increased cost of commodities necessitates an addition to the funds of the Imperial Household, and to inquire why, if this augmentation were deemed essential, it was not proposed to meet the need by an appropriate amendment to the Budget. This would have been a legitimate means of providing for the emergency, supposing that the emergency existed; and by its adoption, Parliament would not have exposed itself to the censure of travelling beyond its proper sphere, as it has done in claiming the right to parcel out the indemnity. With regard to another plea, less offensive at first view to the dignity of the throne, though scarcely less unbecoming as a declaration of public opinion, some words of protest are more urgently called for, since it appears to have been accepted and supported by many who honestly believe themselves actuated by the true spirit of devotion (Kinno). We are told that in consequence of the development and growth of democratic ideas, expediency demands that the Imperial house be endowed with an abundant and substantial fortune; and especially that, as a means of maintaining its prestige, it should have ample provision for the exercise of charity on a bounteous scale. If any are misled by theories of this sort, it can only be because they do not rightly estimate the principles upon which our Imperial house is founded; for in our system of monarchy there is nothing incompatible with the development or growth of democratic ideas, and no misapprehension could be more groundless than to suppose that its prestige, so-called, can be affected by material acts of any description. It should be evident, moreover, than in any case where the employment of funds for large beneficent purposes is thought necessary by the Emperor, he has only to command that such funds be supplied from the public treasury, without recourse to his private means.

It may be reasoned that among the royal families of Europe there are many that look with dread upon the progress of democracy, which they regard as hostile to the continuance of their power; and that the instinct of self-preservation leads them to impose restraints upon all popular movements of a social or political nature. This is not the case in Japan. The strength of our imperial house is sustained by the sentiment of eternal devotion that dwells in the hearts of the people, and the Sovereign governs by virtue of his constant and unchanging participation in the welfare or misfortune, the joys and the sorrows, of the entire nation. Upon this ground-work our form of government was created, and has been maintained for ages, to our pride and honour; and no departure therefrom is possible without imperilling the destinies of the country.

The lessons of universal history are not hard to read. Do they not teach us that the utmost efforts of the rulers of mankind have never succeeded, either by violence or dexterity, in arresting the gradual spread of democratic ideas? And shall we listen to those who would counsel even the first step in a course which has led to nothing but failure elsewhere, while, by adherence to the principles which have hitherto given us unity and strength, we may confidently hope for the lasting prosperity of our race? What our government has been, it must be, if our national life is to be prolonged. The moral influence of the Sovereign must dominate, and this will never be dependent upon the accumulation of wealth, nor upon the mere performance of superficial deeds which, though they may receive grateful acknowledgment, can add nothing to a loyalty so profound and ardent as that of the Japanese masses. The glory and majesty of the throne cannot be enhanced by riches, and the glitter of great possessions would awaken no fervour in the popular heart. What constitutes the claim of our imperial house to reverence and devotion is the knowledge that its existence is bound up with that of the people, and that it shares with every subject, however humble, the duties and the privileges of the State. To forget this would be to deny all that our ancestry held most sacred, and to renounce the faith we have been taught to cherish forever.

Devotion to the Emperor, finally, does not consist in empty forms and shallow protestations. It cannot find fitting expression in ostentatious material endowments nor in presumptuous proffers of charity funds. Least of all can it be harmonized with incessant and frivolous appeals to the highest source of national authority; with rude encroachments on the sanctity of the throne, or with audacious invocations of the august name by petty political and financial intriguers. It is a simple and noble sentiment, based—as I believe, and as I have endeavoured to show—upon a simple and noble law of our nature; and the power to inspire it, however it may have been transmitted to its earthly possessors, is as surely divine as any blessing ever conferred upon humanity.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE RELIGIOUS ASPECTS OF THE SINGLE TAX.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

SIR,—Will you kindly permit me a little space in your paper on the eve of my departure from Japan?

I think my friends will bear with me under the circumstances when I beg them to consider carefully and prayerfully the religious aspects of the Single Tax. It was not a political burden laid upon Mr. Garst's soul that caused him in overwork and made him moan in his last illness, "This is my body broken for you," and "the zeal of thine house hath eaten me up, over and over again. A man of intense sympathies, the physical misery of these Oriental nations had been a deadweight upon him for fifteen years, to say nothing of the anxiety he felt about the masses in so-called Christian and other lands.

To us the Single Tax, (or righteous land law) is Divine, and clear as any other law of God stands out Lev. 25 23, "The land shall not be sold in perpetuity, for the land is mine, saith the Lord, and ye are strangers and sojourners with me;" (R.V.) and Psalm 115, 16, "The earth hath He given to the children of men;" and Eccles. 5, 9, "The profit of the earth is for all" (in other words the rest of the land belongs to the people). The lamentable torpor of the Church on this and kindred subjects of vital importance in bringing in the reign of righteousness hung over Mr. Garst like a pall day and night sapping his strength.

When Dr. Scriba said if his head could stand the strain he would recover, I thought the weight it was bearing from disease was as nothing to the terrible burden that it had borne for weary years. Some good Christian people even have affirmed that none need be poor if they would work—that poverty is the direct outgrowth of drunkenness and laziness. Let such open their Bibles and try to substitute the drunken and lazy in the beautiful promises God has given to the poor. If there is one thing that stands out distinctly in the Bible it is that God has an oppressed people on the earth, whose cause He espouses.

The well-fed comfortably housed Christian appropriates joyfully the sweet promises of God that as He feeds the birds and clothes the lilies so He will supply them, and reaptuously sings, take time to be holy. But how about the lilies when potted and the birds when caged—in other words, when they are both removed from their connection with God's earth? How about those so ground down by cruel toil for the soulless millionaire that they have no time or strength to consider God's love and do not sensibly appreciate His bounty? Shut a little child in a dark unwholesome room, give it little or nothing to eat or wear, and stand on one side and talk to it of the over-flowing wisdom and abounding love of its fond parents!

More than once Mr. Garst has been pained by the remark, "all right brother, you preach Single Tax and I'll preach the good old Jerusalem Gospel!" But the love that suffereth long and is kind, that thinketh no evil, that seeketh not her own, was his in an unusually large measure, and no unkind speech in return betrayed the suffering he endured. Sometimes after I have been out calling he has asked me what subjects were discussed in my hearing. Once I well remember I had to confess, with shame, that it was the Carrot case; another time—dress! "Yes," he said, "and if I had been there and mentioned the Single Tax, they would have exclaimed 'Why don't you preach the Gospel!'" Verily we are not always consistent!

John Baptist said, Bring forth fruits meet for repentance; Our Saviour, by their fruits ye shall know them; and it was as much part of the Gospel message to Mr. Garst to teach people what their sins were as to teach them to repent and be baptised.

I venture to say no missionary in Japan in an equal length of time has preached more sermons on the Resurrection or reasoned more faithfully on straight Gospel lines than Mr. Garst. With waraji on his feet and the word of God in suitable portions for ready distribution, he has tramped this Empire almost, sleeping and eating, often times, in places that few missionaries would enter.

During a recent visit in China I learned some of the suffering of the people there through landlordism. In some districts land is not rented unless the would-be-tenant has a water buffalo, farming tools, and sufficient to live on for two years. The landlord says if he has not that much he will steal, and then the landlord must be responsible for his depredations. Sixty per cent. of his crops go to the landlord, twenty to the idols, and if the paltry fraction left is lessened by famine of water or from untoward circumstance, he must sell his belongings and, when all is gone, beg, and thousands of people die outside the walls of Nankin every winter.

Do Christian workers suppose that such a state of affairs does not shut the hearts of millions against God, whom we preach as a God of love, and breed atheism? It would lighten my burden of grief now if I could feel I had always been as zealous about this much needed reform as I should have been, and also if I could dare hope that many hitherto indifferent ones would take the trouble to investigate, especially reading Henry George's "Progress and Poverty," and Patrick Edward Dove's "Theory of Human Progression."

We do not claim that the Single Tax will prove a universal panacea for every ill, but a scheme that will "give to all the Father's children a seat at the Father's table" as some one has well put it, is worth considering. With most tender, grateful memories of Japan, and prayer for her prosperity and advancement in the highest and best sense,

Very sincerely yours,

LAURA DE LANY GARST.

THE DOSHISHA.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

SIR,—In your issue of the 7th inst. you give prominence to the report that the action of the Trustees of the Doshisha in Expunging Christianity from its fundamental place in the school "would probably have escaped protest had not the quality of Mr. Yokoi's Christianity been open to doubt." Without waiting to consult any one I write to say that this report is without foundation. Such a fundamental change would have been opposed even though made by Dr. Niishima himself.

If this Doshisha agitation were simply a matter of doubt or dislike of Mr. Yokoi it would cease the moment he resigns his position. The fact that the representatives of the American donors will be satisfied with nothing short of the restoration of the "Fundamental Principles" of the school conclusively shows that there is no truth in the report that it is a personal crusade against Mr. Yokoi.

I am, truly yours, M. L. GORDON.

A CORRECTION.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

SIR,—In the Monthly Summary of the Religious Press published in your issue of Jan. 7th, in quotations from the Kirisutokyo Shimbon and Shinri, the Lutheran Church is classed with the Unitarian, and spoken of as a representative of liberal as opposed to orthodox theology. Let some of your readers should be led astray by these statements, I crave your space for the insertion of this letter.

By the terms "The Lutheran Church," the writers of the statements in question referred to the work that has grown up under the Evangelical Protestant Missionary Society, with headquarters in Koishikawa, Tokyo. As applied to it the statements are doubtless true.

But it is a misnomer to call that work Lutheran. Acceptance of certain historic creeds is the distinguishing mark of Lutheranism; but the Evangelical Protestant Missionary Society repudiates every creed of the Lutheran Church. Moreover, the members of that Society do not speak of themselves as Lutherans, and they have no right to the name. The only representative of the historic Lutheran Church in Japan is the Evangelical Lutheran Mission (American) in Kyushu. As the above-named body prides itself in being "liberal," this body prides itself in being strictly orthodox. We stand firmly by what is termed nowadays "traditional theology"—the historic faith of the Church.

Should anyone think that the statements quoted from the Kirisutokyo Shimbon and Shinri represent our opinions, or the view of the Lutheran Church at large, he would greatly err. The Lutheran Church in the United States, which ranks third numerically among the religious denominations there, is a thoroughly evangelical body, jealous of its orthodoxy; and in this respect the Lutheran Church of Sweden, Norway, Denmark, and a portion of that in Germany, does not differ materially from it. Lutheranism is by its nature and history conservative.

To avoid misunderstanding, the work of the German mission in Koishikawa should never be spoken of as Lutheran.

Sincerely yours, R. B. PEERY.

THE "GLENAVON'S" MAILS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

SIR,—I beg to inform the public, through the medium of your paper, that the mail matter for Singapore dispatched per steamers Omi Maru, Coptic, and Empress of China on the 15th, 19th, and 20th December, 1898, respectively were lost in the steamer Glenavon, which was wrecked shortly after leaving Hongkong for Singapore.

Yours faithfully,
K. YAGUI, Director.

A CONTRAST.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

SIR,—Since taxation and land values are absorbing topics in Japan at the present time, the following facts may not be without interest to your readers.

A few years ago Mayor Swift, of the city of Chicago, appointed a special committee to assess the valuation of the real estate in the business district of that city, known locally as "downtown." One square mile of that district was estimated to be worth $438,447,180. "This estimate includes the ground and improvements, and is exclusive of personal belongings of any kind." "This district comprises the area bounded by the lake on the east, the South Branch of the river on the west, the main river on the north, and Twelfth street on the south." Of this 438 million dollars of real estate Marshall Field owns $22,000,000 and L. Z. Leiter owns $16,000,000. The latter is the father of Lady Curzon of Kedleston, who presides over Government House, Calcutta.

According to the Japan Mail of June 5th, 1897, the total value of building land throughout the empire of Japan is assessed at 142,302,500 yen, of which 32 millions represent the taxable land in Tokyo, Osaka, Kyoto, and 38 provincial towns. This contrast reads like a story from the Arabian Nights. One square mile of real estate in Illinois that was used by Indians as hunting and fishing ground less than eighty years ago is now worth more than fourteen times as much as the total area of Japan's 41 largest cities. This well illustrates the marvellous growth of the cities in America.

Yours truly, WILL PATILLO.

YOKOHAMA GENERAL CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.

With reference to the Imperial Decree No. 385 of October 29th, 1897, relative to certificates of origin, as amended by Imperial Decree No. 363 of December 29th, 1898, the Yokohama General Chamber of Commerce is in receipt of information as follows:—

The amendments provide that certificates will not be required in the case of Postal Parcels, nor in that of goods not exceeding one hundred yen in value, and that from places of shipment where there is no Japanese Consulate or Commercial Agency (which excludes Honorary Consulate) certificates of origin signed by Chambers of Commerce will be accepted.

It should be explained that a commercial agent is a paid official of the Japanese Government and not a merchant consul.

The effect of the decree in its amended form is consequently to give validity to certificates of origin attested by Her Majesty's Customs, Mayors, Magistrates or Chambers of Commerce at ports where there is no Japanese Consul de carrière, and also to exempt Postal Parcels and shipments under Ten pounds (£10) in value from the necessity of being accompanied by Certificates of Origin.

Ten pounds (£10) or one hundred yen (yen 100) in value means the value to be declared at the port of entry, which includes cost of insurance and transportation as well as commission, if any exists, besides cost price.

IMPERIAL DECREE No. 385 OF THE 29TH OCT., 1897, AS AMENDED BY IMPERIAL DECREE No. 363 OF 29TH DEC., 1898.

(The Amendments are enclosed in square brackets.)

Art. 1.—If it is desired that goods imported into the Empire shall enjoy, in accordance with the provisions of the Treaties, the benefits of the conventional Tariffs, they must at the time of importation be accompanied by Certificates of origin.

[Note.—Postal Matter coming under the Parcels Post, and goods not exceeding 100 yen in value, do not come under this rule.]

Art. 2.—A certificate of origin is a document certified by the Imperial Consulate or Commercial Agency, at the place of shipment, or, where there is no Consulate or Commercial Agency, by the Customs or other proper office [or Chambers of Commerce], and stating the marks, numbers, names, numbers of packages, and quantity, or weight, of the goods in question, the place of production or manufacture, and the place and date of shipment.

A certificate of origin is valid for the term of one year from its date.

Art. 3.—If a certificate of origin does not accompany the goods imported, or if it does so but the facts stated are incomplete or do not correspond with the actual goods, or are considered by the Customs to be incorrect, duties will be levied on the goods in question according to the Statutory Tariff. If, however, a correct certificate of origin is produced within six months after the date of importation, the amount of duty collected on the goods will be reduced to that leviable under the Conventional Tariff. January 1, 1899 is the date of operation of the decree in its amended form.

THE BOOKSHELF.

The Day's Work, by Rudyard Kipling; Macmillan's Colonial Library; Yokohama, Messrs. KELLY and WALSH, Ltd.

MR. RUDYARD KIPLING'S new book The Day's Work has already reached its thirty-sixth thousand. It is not surprising, for although the stories which go to make up the portly volume have appeared in various Christmas numbers, serials, magazines, etc., during the past two years many admirers in that large reading circle Kipling now commands are, or will be, glad to have them in a collected form. For with the thousands of home-side readers can be included the even larger circle that patronize the "Colonial Library" reprints. What a huge blessing has the Anglo-American copy-right agreement proved to residents in the Colonies and the Far East! Not so many years ago the only means available for getting speedy possession of a popular book outside the old country was recourse to the pirated "Seaside" and other "libraries" of American publishers. Cheap and nasty in the extreme were these productions. The paper was as vile as the type was bad, while the utmost liberty was taken with the text to suit the exigencies of the American pirate. But now the Colonials are better served than dwellers in the home lands. The publishers of England outvie each other in producing tasteful, correct, and attractive reprints of the latest and best in the literary output of Great Britain, and for half—and even less than half in many cases—the price of the original work. It is a pleasure to read the books of this new era, and as pleasant to handle and collect them on our shelves.

The best stories in The Day's Work are undoubtedly those that deal with Indian subjects, such as "The Bridge-Builders," "The Tomb of His Ancestors"—a capital yarn dealing with hereditary and its effects on the morals and religious morbidities of an aboriginal Indian tribe;—"William the Conqueror," a tale of the great famine in Southern India; and "The Brushwood Boy," though this comes back to England for its denouement. The marvellous faculty of sympathetic observation that forms such an illuminating side of Kipling's genius has here full sway. The stories dealing with animals—with which the Jungle Books familiarized us—are decidedly clever, and in "The Maltese Cat," the tale of how a polo pony won the Upper India Free For All Cup "off its own hat," to borrow a phrase from another branch of sport—the author reaches, perhaps, his highest level in this branch of his art. At any rate we like his talking animals better than his talking engines and steamships: though these show the wonderful assimilative powers of Kipling's mind. Yet this faculty of assimilation is responsible for the only unsatisfactory story in the book, "The Walking Delegate," a satire on the "delegates" who parade the States of the Old world as well as the New misapplying the gospel of the rights of humanity and the wrongs of the workers. The story is put into the mouth of a mob of farm-horses on a New England pasture and the dialect ranges from Kansas to Maine; but somehow it doesn't ring true.

We lay down the whole volume, however, with a feeling that Kipling's genius is as vigorous and capable as ever it was in days of his dauntless "Soldiers Three."

Her Memory, by Maarten Maartens; Macmillan's Colonial Library; Yokohama, Messrs. KELLY and WALSH, Ltd.

THIS is a very pleasant little story told with that quiet grace and rare literary refinement which we have come to associate with Maarten Maartens. Anthony Stollard, the second son of an English baronet of wide territorial possessions, loses his wife after ten years of married life. Their all too brief union had been as perfect as human character will permit, and the sudden blows stuns the sensitive, high-strung painter and dilettante, and drives him from the society of his fellow-men. With his little eight-year-old daughter he seeks refuge in Florence and devotes his life to her service, filling in his spare moments by painting a marvellous picture of his ideal of earthly love. The memory of the lost wife and mother colours all their actions, their outlook on life, and their meditations on the future, and Anthony Stollard is in danger of becoming a morbidly introspective dreamer and the spoiler of his daughter's character when the death of his elder brother forces him out of the life he had voluntarily chosen into one of the greatest activity and publicity—the life of a rich country gentleman of England with a seat in parliament and all the hereditary offices in county life that gradually cluster round an old family of means and more than average intelligence. Yet through all the changes of their lives father and daughter still find the hallowed memory of their long-lost one still hovering around them and insensibly influencing all their thoughts and actions. Gradually, however, it is brought home to Sir Anthony that his daughter requires a living mother's protecting care and the manner in which he brings himself to face the situation is admirably told. The book should appeal to a wide circle.

A Romance of Canvas Town and other Stories; by Rolf Boldrewood; Macmillan's Colonial Library; Yokohama, Messrs. KELLY and WALSH, Ltd.

IT is difficult, as the Athenaeum justly remarks, to know what to say about the stories in A Romance of Canvas Town, &c., they are so elementary in construction that they almost defy criticism. In none of them is there the slightest suggestion of inventiveness; they are incidents which probably happened, told with some detail, but with very little point. None the less, as a social study, the book is interesting for its obvious insight into life in the Australian bush. Adventures at the gold diggings or out sheep farming, the difficulties of domestic service, and such like matters are told with the air of a man who has experienced what he writes about, and are brought out clearly before the reader. It is just the same quality, although on a slightly different topic, that was displayed in "Plain Living."

That Little Cutty; Dr. Barriera and Isabel Dysart, by Mrs. Oliphant; Macmillan's Colonial Library: Yokohama, Messrs. KELLY & WALSH, Limited.

THE late Mrs. Oliphant was a past mistress in her craft and a most indefatigable one, too; but the three short stories that Macmillans have collected in this volume scarcely do her justice. Sooth to say, the last two are rather of the "shilling shocker" variety and the first is a very decided contrast to them. Still they should while away an idle hour pleasantly.

CHINESE MATTERS.

A Hankow dispatch received in Shanghai on January 8th and printed in the N. C. Daily News reports the discovery by the authorities of that port of a formidable revolutionary society, called the "Heroic Association" (Ping-hsiung Hui), the ramifications of which extend through the whole of the Liangkang and Hukwang provinces. The Heroic Association is said to consist entirely of young men, and is an outcrop of the Kelao Hui society, the members of the former hiding themselves to "do or die" for the aims of the parent society, instead of adopting the lethargic way of doing things that has always characterised the older Kelao Hui.

General Sung Ching was Junior Brevet Guardian of the Heir-Apparent, Premier Banton, and Provincial Commander-in-chief of Szechuen when the China-Japan war broke out. Owing to the defeats that he suffered at the hands of the enemy he had all these titles taken away, though, in accordance with Chinese usage, he lost none of the substance attaching to them—in grosser words, the salaries and the monetary perquisites. The whirligig of time has now brought back the lost honours, and on January 6th it was ordered by Imperial decree that the penalty of "degradation but to remain in office," hitherto placed against his name in the records of the Board of War, be erased. Further, the lucky General, in company with General and ex-acting Vice-President of a Metropolitan Board Yuan Shih-kai, are granted the privilege of riding on horseback within the precincts of the Western Palace gates, and are further allowed to ride in the Imperial barges in the lakes within the Palace precincts.

The French, says the China Gazette, are very reticent about their programme re the Ningpo Joas House and Settlement Extension, but we gather that all that the Tsung-li Yamén has conceded is that the French Municipality can take over control of Puh-sien-jao if they could arrange the business with the local officials, which, after all, may mean nothing or a very great deal, unless other Foreign Powers interested choose to have the dispute with the Chinese transferred to their own shoulders.

According to the Wuchang correspondent of the Universal Gazette, the Viceroy of the Liang Hu Provinces, Chang Chih-ang has ordered a large body of soldiers to proceed to Shanhi by steamer and march to Chang Yung through Yue Yang-kwan, in the district of Yie To, to quell the rebellion which is causing so much trouble there.

Six Chinese shops on the Seward-road, Shanghai, were destroyed by fire on Jan. 9. The outbreak occurred about 7 o'clock in the evening and somewhat interfered with the Engineers' dance at the Astor House, a number of ladies invited to this function having to wait until their escorts had been dismissed from duty at the fire.

News has reached Shanghai from Newchwang of the appearance near the latter treaty port of several thousand mounted bandits. So far they have not threatened to raid the treaty port itself, but several outrages have occurred in the vicinity of the Chinese city of Newchwang, twenty-seven miles to the north of the port. There is, accordingly, quite a panic amongst native merchants in the latter place, most of whom have branch homes in the former town.

Major Bower, says the N. C. Daily News, has enlisted his first recruit, a Kiangsu Moham-medan, who is an excellent bugler.

Confirmation is found in Shanghai papers to hand by Thursday's mail of many of the Chinese telegrams we have printed this week. There is no doubt that Liu, the Viceroy of Nanking, has been denounced by Kang-yi, the rabid anti-reformist Manchou, and that he has been called upon to answer seriatim the charges preferred against him. Liu asked to be allowed to resign, but the request was not granted, his excuses being held to have been written in a sarcastic vein. Fears are expressed lest Kang-yi, who is thoroughly hated in Peking, be sent to Nanking—a strong cabal having been formed against him—and if this event comes off, the N. C. Daily News says it will "land the Empire before long in some disastrous predicament."

A dispatch from Shasi, printed by our senior Shanghai contemporary, reports a very gloomy outlook for trade in that new port. Owing, it is stated, to the rebellion in Szechuan the large import business from that province has of late been entirely stopped, while the import trade from other portions of Western Hupeh province, of which Shasi has always been the distributing centre, has also all but ceased, through the recent petty insurrections and the fear of more anti-foreign riots. In consequence of all this, many exporting hongcs and banks—several of very old standing—have had to close their doors. To make matters worse, the wealthy gentry and notables in Shasi and the neighbouring city of Chinchou have recently been calling in their deposits in the banks and pawnshops owing to the insecurity of the times, thereby making ready money still scarcer—almost in the vanishing point.

Says the N. C. Daily News:—The new Chinese regiment is to be an infantry one, armed with the Martini-Metford rifle, a weapon which has been highly spoken of as the result of experience in various parts of Africa. The men will be paid $8 a month, and when the other advantages of the service are taken into account there should be little difficulty in obtaining a select body of men. Major Bower's first difficulty will, apparently, be that of securing accommodation for the new troops at Wei-hai-wei, for, at present, so far as can be learned, there is nothing ready in that respect. The uniform has not yet been settled, but in all probability it will be a picturesque but serviceable adaptation of the dress of the Chinese soldier. As to the fighting qualities of the men it is, of course, too early to speak with certainty, but, knowing the class from which they will probably come, Major Bower is sanguine that in due time he will command a really effective force. It is undeniable that Chinese troops at times have shown conspicuous bravery, and, if illustrations were needed of the power of British officers to make a good army out of the most unpromising material, no better one could be given than that of Egypt. In 1882, when the organisation was commenced, the Egyptians were looked upon as likely to make, at the best, but indifferent soldiers. How they have, under British guidance, won a most honourable record is too fresh in the public mind to need comment. If the new Chinese regiment—which starts with far more promise—only equals the Egyptians, the labour and expense will be well rewarded.

A telegraphic dispatch from Tientsin received by the Shanghai manderins, who—as the N. C. Daily News remarks—apparently love round numbers, reports that the Russian Government is pouring troops into Port Arthur and Talienwan under the pretence that the force now garrisoning those places is too small, in view of the apparent discontent of the inhabitants of the Liaotung Peninsula, who have within the last two months risen against the Russians in thirteen different townships and districts. Further, that no less than 9,000 men have landed at Port Arthur within the past month or so, and that it is intended to add 25,000 men more before the end of the Chinese 1st moon, making a full strength Army Corps of some 36,000, in addition to the garrisons of 15,000 men for Port Arthur and 8,000 for Talienwan.

Over $15,000 has been sent from Canton as a first contribution to the fund for relief of the sufferers by the Yellow River floods.

Mr. T. L. Bullock, late of the British Consular Service, in China, has been appointed Professor of Chinese at Oxford, in succession to the late Dr. Legge.

Mr. W. B. Pryer, whose death while on a voyage to England was reported a week ago by Reuter, was an old-time resident of Shanghai. He went out to China as bookkeeper for the firm of Thorne Bros. & Co. in 1864, and was an ardent naturalist and athlete. He was the first white man and Resident in British North Borneo when it was taken over from Mr. Torrey by Sir Alfred Dent and Mr. Overbeck, and passed the rest of his life in furthering the progress of that territory. His health failing recently, he started for home, but as he got worse he had to be sent to the hospital at Port Said, where he died in his 60th year, leaving a widow but no children. He was the son of Mr. Thomas Pryer, a well-known London solicitor, and was very popular with all during his residence in Shanghai.

Lieut.-Commander H. D. S. Watson, R.N., hoisted his pennant at Shanghai, at nine o'clock on Jan. 12th on board H.M.S. Woodcock in presence of Capt. Cochran, who represented the Reserve. Her crew consists of her commander, a doctor (W. M. Keich), and twenty-four men. The vessel left Tungkadoo a couple of hours afterwards, and was heartily cheered by the Britishers on their several vessels. She then moored off the Pootung Police hulk, taking in coal and stores preparatory to receiving orders from the Commander-in-Chief. This is Lieut. Watson's maiden command.

An Imperial Decree was issued at Peking on the 11th repealing the order that no more Chao Hsin Bonds were to be sold, and that no one who had subscribed for them and had not paid was to be asked for payment, so that there may be no more of the extortion and oppression that have been exercised in this matter.

Lieutenant Wood, son of General Sir Evelyn Wood, has been selected for service with the new Chinese battalion.

It is said by the Universal Gazette that the Provincial Treasurer of Chékkiang, taking into consideration the heavy expense it entails, has decided to abandon the scheme of erecting a smokeless powder factory in Hangchow, as was proposed some time ago.

RIOI NEAR NINGPO.

DESTRUCTION OF PROPERTY OF THE PAO-WO MINING CO.

ATTACK ON THE FOREIGN MANAGER.

Mr. J. E. Rennie, foreign manager of the Pao-wo mine at Ninakong, near Ningpo, has arrived in Shanghai with a thrilling tale of outrage and attempted murder. On Sunday, the 8th instant, the third attempt to open the mine was made, Mr. Rennie, the Chinese manager, Mr. Chu Tse-ping, two Chinese officials, and forty soldiers being present at the ceremonies, which included the propitiation of the guardian spirit of the mountain. The officials brought a hundred soldiers altogether, but sixty were lost a short distance off at Fungwo. There were about a hundred country people looking on, but there was no disturbance of any kind. After the ceremony was over, the Chinese officials went away, unfortunately taking their troops with them, and Mr. Chu Tze-ping went away on business to Songau, a town near-by. Mr. Rennison returned at noon to the temple where he was staying, and where the stores, etc., for the mine, to the value of something under $10,000, were deposited. About six o'clock, as Mr. Rennison was about to sit down to dinner, two soldiers, who had thrown away their uniforms, came rushing in for safety. Shortly afterwards, Mr. Rennison's boy came in, looking very scared, having armed himself with a chopper, and advised his master to take the carving knife—he had left his gun at Ningpo—as a mob of between two and three thousand men were coming up to attack the temple, and murder every one in it connected with the mine. Mr. Rennison, with his interpreter, a young fellow named Kang, who stuck to him most gallantly all through, declaring that if Mr. Rennison were killed he would die with him, barred the front gate of the temple, but at eight o'clock he was assured by Kang that it was hopeless to attempt to defend the temple, and they must fly to the hills. Mr. Rennison with his interpreter and his boy succeeded in scaling the back wall, about seven feet high, and getting to the hills, their movements being hastened by the noise made by the approaching mob. Kang succeeded by promises of a big camshaw in getting a native with a lantern to guide them. They soon lost the boy, but Kang struck to Mr. Rennison, and the two of them spent the night on the hills, hiding themselves in paddy fields or wherever they could find temporary shelter from the pursuit of the infuriated country people. In the morning, on their way down to the river, they got food in a native house, and met fourteen of the priests belonging to the temple, who reported that the mob had utterly cleaned it out, destroying or carrying away everything they found in it. Mr. Rennison and his interpreter got back to Ningpo in a boat, where the former, who has lost every scrap of his worldly gear except the clothes in which he escaped, laid the facts before Mr. Playfair, the British Consul, who is making the necessary claim for reparation on the Taotai. It is stated that a fight occurred between the soldiers and the country people, in which two of the latter were killed and several wounded.

Mr. Rennison's experience is a warning to foreigners who are sent up country to open mines or make surveys of any kind without sufficient escort, relying on the power of the Chinese officials to preserve them from injury at the hands of the ignorant country people. We may add that Mr. Rennison is very anxious to publicly acknowledge the courage and devotion of his interpreter, Mr. Kang.—N. C. Daily News.

THE COLLISION IN MOJI HARBOUR.

COURT OF INQUIRY.

A naval court of inquiry was held in the British Consulate, Nagasaki, on Jan. 13, before H.B.M. Consul Mr. J. H. Longford, into the circumstances attending the collision in Moji Harbour on the 13th ult., between the P. & O. steamer Brindisi and the Japanese steamer Yayayama Maru, whereby the former vessel was considerably damaged, the latter being sunk. Captain I. F. Curtis, of the British sailing ship West Lothian, and Captain W. Fraser, of the British sailing ship Glenlee, acted as assessors. The owners of the Japanese steamer were not represented during the proceedings. The evidence of Captain Watkins; Mr. Vine, the chief officer; Mr. Randall, the chief engineer, a Malay quartermaster, and a Lascar A.B., of the Brindisi, showed that at the time of the accident the latter vessel was lying in the usual anchorage and was properly lighted. This evidence was also corroborated by Captain W. Black, an Inland Sea pilot.

The finding of the Court is as follows:—

That the collision was caused by the Yayayama Maru attempting to cross the bows of the Brindisi while at anchor, without making sufficient allowance for the strong ebb tide.

That the Brindisi was well found and sufficiently manned; that she was securely anchored in a proper place; that her anchor lights were burning brightly; and that a proper and efficient anchor watch was maintained.

That no blame can be attached to the master, first mate, or crew of the Brindisi in respect of the collision.

That immediately on the occurrence of the collision all the officers and crew of the Brindisi proceeded to their stations, and that efficient discipline was maintained on board; and

That the measures taken by the master of the Brindisi subsequent to the collision were seamanlike and proper.

The Court considers that the conduct of the whole of the engine room staff of the Brindisi is worthy of high commendation for the promptitude with which they took up their stations below and continued to carry on their duties when their ship was making water and in a dangerous position; and also that the Master is worthy of commendation for the promptitude with which he ordered a ladder to be extended to the Yayayama Maru, by means of which the whole of the crew of the latter was saved.—Nagasaki Press.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

We understand that the newly reconstituted Kobe Choral Society are putting Smart's "Bride of Dunkirk" into active rehearsal.

British makers are so full of orders, it is said, that the Indian Government contemplates buying several locomotives from the United States.

On the 16th at 6 a.m. Mr. Nakamura Shikwan, the famous actor, died from consumption, from which he had been suffering since the end of November last.

Mrs. Hatley and child, who were rescued from the Glenavon, left Hongkong for England by the German mail steamer Prinz Heinrich. For her passage home, Mrs. Hatley is indebted to the kindness of the agents of the "Glen" Line, Messrs. Jardine, Matheson, and Co.

The property No. 89 Bluff, containing 659 tsubo, was sold by Mr. Jno. W. Hall on Monday afternoon at public auction for the sum of yen 12,000. Lot 214 was not sold, the bidding not reaching the upset price. Lot 42-3 was not offered, having been previously withdrawn.

The cruiser Chitose, built at the Union Iron Works, San Francisco, for the Japanese Government, has had her preliminary spin on the bay. The contract between the Japanese Government and the Scotts calls for a speed of 22½ knots, and it is thought the Chitose will make at least a knot better than that.

Supt. Morgan received an alarm of fire on Sunday afternoon from 213, Bluff. Six men of the Brigade were sent to the premises, but they found that the fire had already been extinguished by the occupant with the help of the neighbours. A wooden mantlepiece had become ignited, probably owing to the over-heating of the grate, but the damage done was very slight.

Colonel Nienstead's death was due to Bright's disease, from which he had suffered for some time. Some years ago he was in the service of the United States as Marshal to the Kobe Consulate, and afterwards went to Korea, where he was engaged as a drill-instructor. Returning to Japan a few months ago, he entered the service of Messrs. Vantine & Co., to superintend their Nagoya business. Deceased was about 47 years of age.

Details of the discovery of an active volcano in the Atlin gold district of British Columbia have been received. The volcano furnishes the miners with light by which to work their claims during the long darkness of Arctic winter. The glare from the spouting lava is reflected against the sky, and resembles a continuous twilight. It was early in October when smoke was first seen issuing from the mountain, and in November it burst forth into flames.

A telegram to the Times of Ceylon dated Bombay, the 13th of December, confirms the news of the flight of the Mad Mullah to the Indus and Kohistan. He lost heavily in the late engagement with the Nawab of Dir, including six standards and one-hundred firearms; and is now entirely discredited by the Swatis. The Dir's forces have returned.

Admiral Correjeilles, the newly-appointed Commander-in-Chief of the French Squadron in the Far East, was obliged to give up the idea of going out in the new cruiser Entrecasteaux, which was to have been his flagship, in consequence of the repeated breakdown of the ship's engines. The cruiser is one of the largest ever built for the French Navy, but has never yet been able to complete her steam trials. She has gone into dock again.

The Queen has been pleased to grant permission to Dr. Edward Divers, Professor in the Imperial University, Tokyo, to accept and wear the Insignia of the Imperial Order of the Sacred Treasure of the Second Class, and to Mr. Alexander J. Hare, the Imperial Order of the Rising Sun of the Fourth Class, conferred by the Emperor of Japan.

The writer of a book on cycling was so anxious to show the exact position of the bones when pedalling that he hired a skeleton, mounted him on a machine, and fetched a photographer to make the bony picture. The photographer fixed his eye upon the skeleton, pressed the button; and then, from mere force of habit, with a bow to the sitter, he remarked, "Thank you, sir."

At the North Borneo dinner held in London on 29th November, Sir Charles Mitchell referred to the excellent tobacco-producing capabilities of the colony, and expressed the opinion that the idea of fortifying one or two of the North Borneo ports must be relegated to the future. Fortified positions were very expensive. At Singapore £2,000,000 sterling had been spent. Labuan might in the future become a strongly fortified port, but it would have to wait until the completion of the arrangements for ports already agreed upon.

Consequent upon the promotion of Admiral Sir F. W. Richards, G.C.B., to be Admiral of the Fleet, already announced, the following promotions take place from the same date:—Vice-Admiral Sir Richard Edward Tracy, K.C.B., to be Admiral in Her Majesty's Fleet; Rear-Admiral Cyprian Arthur George Bridge to be Vice-Admiral in Her Majesty's Fleet; Capt. Henry Rose to be Rear-Admiral in Her Majesty's Fleet. Rear-Admirals Richard George Kinahan, Francis Richard Blackburn, Richard Henry Napier, to be Vice-Admirals on the retired list.

It is evidently not for nothing, says a home paper, that the German Emperor showed such anxiety to conciliate his Roman Catholic subjects in Palestine on his recent tour. The new Reichstag shows a most formidable preponderance of the Centre or Catholic party. While the Conservative members number 52, the National Liberals 48, and the Social Democrats 56, not to mention the smaller factions, the Centrists are 106; and the Centrists can be depended upon to act together to a man, while they may generally count upon the support of 14 Poles and 10 Anti-Semites.

Which city in Europe receives the largest number of foreign visitors? This is a matter which M. Griesalich, a Viennese statistician, took upon himself to decide. He gives the result of his researches in the Zeitung der Verins, and, according to his remarks, it appears that Paris is still the centre of attraction. In 1884 Paris was visited by 684,000 foreigners; in 1897 the number reached 890,000.

In the same lapse of time the foreign visitors to Berlin increased from 268,000 in 1884 to 507,000 in 1897; and those to Vienna from 184,000 to 364,000. London is omitted from consideration.

American Lady (to shop assistant, the better to impress him with due admiration for her blue blood):—"Yes, we've had that farm for several generations; you may guess that, when our ancestors came over in the first steamer after the Mayflower."

In the name and on behalf of the Prince of Wales, who was nominated in Grand Lodge of Freemasons, on December 7th, for re-election as Grand Master, a motion was made expressive of the feelings of Grand Lodge on the melancholy occasion of the lamented death of the late Earl of Lathom, Most Worshipful Pro Grand Master. At the same meeting, Grand Lodge was recommended to grant five hundred pounds in relief of the terrible sufferings occasioned by the recent disastrous hurricane in the West Indies, such sum to be placed for distribution in the hands of Mr. John Locke, District Grand Master of Barbados, according to his discretion, but not to be confined to the families of Freemasons.

The trial of Lieutenant R. T. Wark, R.A., Woolwich, for having wilfully murdered a young lady of independent means, named Jane Yates, residing in Liverpool, by performing upon her an illegal operation, has concluded. The social position of the parties, and the sensational circumstances of the crime, excited wide-spread interest in the case. Counsel for Wark made the most of the fact that the prisoner had endeavoured to dissuade Miss Yates from undergoing the operation, whilst counsel for the prosecution pressed home the very ugly circumstance that only Wark benefited under the dead girl's will. The jury found the prisoner guilty, with a recommendation to mercy, and the Judge pronounced sentence of death. There is much sympathy for Wark, and the sentence is almost sure to be commuted.

A sample of Chinese iron made by ordinary native methods was analysed for the Chinese Government some months ago by Mr. Joseph Bedford, of Sheffield, the well-known steel expert. The sample of iron was sent from the arsenal at Foochow, with the request to Mr. Bedford to analyse and report as to its suitability for conversion into high-class tool-steel. Crude as was the sample, Mr. Bedford was struck by its purity, and had no hesitation in declaring it to be equal to the best Swedish iron coming into Sheffield. The analysis gave a result fully confirming the statement so freely made of late that China contains most valuable ore deposits. The iron appears to be thoroughly suitable for conversion into the best crucible-steel. Out of it Mr. Bedford made an engineer's turning tool, and had it employed in a 6 in. lathe turning steel cranks, forgings, &c., and also in general engineers' workshop work. The tool gave perfect satisfaction, and in the analyst's opinion was fully equal to one made of any Sheffield steel of the same character.

The late Mr. Ernest Hart's Japanese collection was so well-known among connoisseurs in that branch of art that, it goes without saying, the sale at Christie's attracted attention. The following are a few of the best specimens disposed of—a figure of Benkei, armed, kneeling, and using a shell as a war trumpet, by Ritano, seventeenth century, 44 gs. (Lever); a piece of old Satsuma, representing a kylin playing with a ball and cord, decorated with the rare blue enamel and other colours, inscribed "Made by Botan, when he was 68 years old," 10 gs. (Mason); a figure of Jurojin, finely modelled, in ivory crackle, fifteenth century, 18 gs. (Savage); a cake-box, in gold lacquer decorated with wisteria in relief, eighteenth century, £13 10s. (Salting); a pair of old Nankein blue and white jars, hawthorn design, £15 (Landsfort); and a chased silver incense burner decorated with chrysanthemums in relief and translucent enamels, £11 (Lewis).

THE LITERARY SOCIETY.

The chief item at the last meeting of the Literary Society was a paper on "The Progress of the Genius of Tennyson" by the Right Rev. Bishop Awdry, D.D. The lecturer showed a firm grip of his subject, and illustrated his remarks by copious quotations from the poet, including his "Idylls of the King" and ending with the exquisitely pathetic "Crossing the Bar." Dr. Awdry pointed out that one of the characteristics of a great thinker or a great poet was that he was in advance of his time. He showed how Tennyson in his earlier work did not attain this point, but, tracing him through the whole of his long and noble life, pointed out that his later poems were of a grander, more comprehensive and more spiritual character. He dwelt on the tenderness, as well as the breadth of view, shown in their greater of the late Laureate's poems, and gave a happy description of Tennyson and his wife as they appeared in later years, when he (the lecturer) had the privilege of visiting them in the Isle of Wight retreat. The musical programme was as follows:—Overture, "Egmont" Beethoven, Mrs. Doering and Mr. Dobin; Song, "Der Heiss am Rhein," Hill, Mr. Schmaedecke; Recitation, "The Revenge," Tennyson, Rev. Robert A. Thomson; Song "Spielmann's Lied" Hofferon, Mr. Schmaedecke.

INTERNATIONAL CONVENTION FOR THE PROTECTION OF COPYRIGHT.

The address concerning the International Copyright Protection Union recently given before the members of the Kokkagakkwai by Mr. Midzuno Rentaro, a councillor of the Home Department, who has been in Europe chiefly for the purpose of investigating the subject, has been reported in the magazine of that association. We translate the more important points:—

In the new Treaties with Great Britain, France, Germany, Belgium, Switzerland, and other countries, Japan stipulates that she shall enter the International Copyright Protection Union before the abolition of the extraterritorial jurisdiction in Japan. The so-called Union was formed in September, 1886, when the deputies of Germany, France, Great Britain, Belgium, Spain, Italy, Switzerland, Hayti, Tunis, and Liberia (Japan and the United States of America sent deputies simply as visitors) attended the meeting held in Berne for the formation of the International Copyright Protection Union, and signed and affixed their seals to the present International Copyright Protection Treaty which came into force in December of the following year. The Treaty, however, underwent some alterations in 1896 at a meeting of the Union held in Paris. Thus there now exist two Treaties, the original of 1886 and the amended document of 1896. The following are the important points of these Treaties:

(1) The countries which belong to the Union are at present France, Germany, Great Britain, Belgium, Switzerland, Italy, Spain, Hayti, Tunis, Norway, Luxemburg, Monaco, and Montenegro, thirteen in all. The United States Government is not a member. After Japan's entry into the Union, the consent of the author of a work must be obtained for its publication in Japan if the author belongs to a contracting State, or if the work has been first published in a contracting State; any other course would be an infringement of copyright. A work published in a contracting State is protected even though its author be not a native of that State. For example, it would be an infringement of copyright to reprint or translate a book written by a subject of Austria, which is not a contracting State, but published in Germany, which belongs to the Union. The right of action against the infringement of the copyright in this case was at first given to the German publishers, but the law was altered by the Paris Treaty, 1896, so that the right would belong to the Austrian author.

(2) Works to be protected are ordinary books and pictures, dramatic and musical works, sculptures and models, etc. Thus the protection is far wider than that given by the present Japanese Copyright Law. Such protection would also be given to a foreign photograph in a contracting State where a photograph is protected as a work of fine art. In Japan, the present Photograph Copyright Law gives photographs a sort of protection, so that a foreign photograph may be protected as above stated. With regard to buildings, the Treaty of 1886 protected only the pictures and designs of buildings, but the additional Treaty of 1896 provides that where protection is given to a building itself in a contracting state, the same protection shall be given to a foreign building. Such protection is given in France and Russia, but not in Japan.

(3) With regard to the right of translation of a work, such right shall lapse within ten years if no translation is published within that time, but the right will exist during the same period as the copyright of the original work, if the translation is published within ten years.

(4) With regard to the necessary formalities for obtaining international copyright, only those formalities and conditions prescribed in the law of the country where the work is first published need be observed. Thus, supposing a book published in Japan is registered in accordance with Japanese Copyright Law, such copyright is protected in England, France, and other countries without any further steps.

(5) The term of copyright varies in different countries. In Spain, which allows the longest period, it is during the lifetime of the author and eighty years after his death; in France and Belgium, during the lifetime of the author and fifty years after his death; in Germany, Switzerland, and Austria, during the lifetime of the author and thirty years after his death; in England, during the lifetime of the author and seven years after his death, or during forty-two years from the first publication of a work. Japan, which grants the shortest term, allows the lifetime of the author and five years after his death, or thirty-five years from the first registration of copyright. The International Copyright Protection Treaty gives a rule for such conflict of laws. By it, the shortest term is adopted. For example, in the case of a French author who possesses a copyright for fifty years after his death in his own country the right in Japan continues for only five years after his death; and a Japanese author does not enjoy in France a longer term than that prescribed by Japanese law.

(6) With regard to the copyright of newspapers and magazines, Art. 15 of the Japanese Copyright Law provides that no leaders, articles, or novels published in two or more issues of a paper, or those not so published, but prohibited from reproduction, shall be reproduced without the consent of the editor. But the Paris meeting of 1896, which altered the former Treaty, provides, as the present international rule, that no novels published in a paper or magazine shall be reproduced without the consent of the author or publisher, and that other articles shall be treated likewise when their reproduction is prohibited. But it also provides that the prohibition shall not apply to political leaders and articles, and notes.

(7) All sorts of piracy are strictly prohibited. The works of others may be reproduced only—(a) for educational use, (b) for criticism or essays, or (c) for the compilation of a handbook or as extracts—according to the treaties and the laws of the contracting States.

(8) With regard to translations or reprints of a work published in a contracting State, and reproduced or translated before the signature of the International Copyright Protection Treaty by Japan, they are to be deemed lawful. They may, if published, be sold and distributed; if not published, they may be published; and the mechanical appliances for use in the publication of such translations or reprints can be used for a certain term, say, two to four years, after the carrying out of the Treaty. This was the case in Germany, Belgium, and other States, and the Japanese Authorities will, Mr. Midzuno believes, probably make similar regulations to protect the interest of Japanese authors and publishers.

GERMAN NOTES.

The success of Bismarck's Memoirs, states a Berlin correspondent, has been unprecedented. Towards the end of December 318,000 copies had been ordered, representing a value of nearly m.6,500,000—£325,000. And this is only the beginning. It is utterly impossible to keep level with the demand. The great Leipzig bookbinding firm of Fritzsche required the following quantities of material to bind the work:—1,024 cwt. of pasteboard, which would fill five railway vans; over 18,000 yards of cloth for the cloth editions, 400 calf-skins for fancy editions, 65,000 sheets of gold brocade, m.18,500 worth of gold, m.14,000 worth of glue. The manipulation of the material occupied 732 workpeople four weeks, and the binding took fifteen days.

A law is to be laid before the Diet to enlarge the German army to the number of 36,576 men to be divided among the different arms. Such enlargement is to take place successively until 1902, when the German army will consist of 625 battalions of infantry, 482 squadrons on horseback, 574 field batteries, 32 batteries on foot, 28 battalions of pioneers, 11 battalions of railway troops, &c., and 28 battalions of train soldiers—in all 502,505 men, without the subaltern officers and officers.

Herr Zimmermann, one of the directors of the Stettin Maschinenbau Act. Ges., Vulcan, recently left for China to contract there for some large ironclads for the Chinese navy. The Chinese Government has declared its intention to have two of these vessels built by the Vulcan, while three others are to be constructed by Messrs. Armstrong. Having finished his business at Shanghai, Herr Zimmermann is to visit Kiao-chow to be shown over the territory for the new harbour, for which latter a couple of iron-clad turrets are to be constructed by the Vulcan.

In the circles of straw hat manufacturers in Germany complaints are heard about the fact that straw-plaiting imported from China and Japan has to pay an import duty of m.18 per 100 kilos, whereas the same article, if imported from France, Great Britain, or others of the most-favoured States, only pays m. 10 per 100 kilos. By this fact the German straw hat makers are forced to import refined straw-plaiting from England, and in consequence several German houses engaged in the trade have been forced to stop working. As regards Japan the difference in question ceased to exist as soon as the new tariff treaty between Germany and Japan was enforced.

In the case of the Jona v. the Maria Rickmers, taken in the British Admiralty Court, for services rendered by the Thomson liner Jona to the steamship Maria Rickmers, of the North German Lloyd line, in the Atlantic Ocean and English Channel in September last, Mr. Justice Barnes, in giving judgment, said that the Maria Rickmers was quite helpless and unmanageable, and it was highly desirable for the reputation of the North German Lloyd Company that she should get into port as soon as possible. He had decided to award the plaintiffs the sum of £4,900 in this proportion: owners of the Jona £4,000, master £300, and crew £600, with costs.

Lieutenant Tschai, of the Chinese navy, who was sent to Europe to superintend the building of some torpedo-boats at Elbing, lost his heart to a German lady, and married her last month in Heligoland. He does not, however, propose to take her to the Far East, and has resigned his appointment, with a view to starting in business at Hamburg.

In Southern and Central Germany earthquakes have again taken place, and damage has been done by them in several districts. Earthquakes also have been felt lately in the province of Holstein, to the north-west of Hamburg, to the astonishment of the geologists, as this province is always described as being non-alluvial land. Beyond the trembling of houses and the shaking of furniture no damage was done.

From the German possessions in South-West Africa a telegram has brought the news that diamonds have been found in that country within the district of Great Nama. A place containing blue-ground—the characteristic sign of the existence of diamonds—had been met with already some time ago between Gibeon and Berseba, but so far had not yielded any of the precious stones. It seems, however, that of late diamonds have actually been found there.

The German textile industry is at present not a prosperous one, and a curtailment of production in the spinning mills is contemplated. It is announced that a congress of textile operatives will be held to discuss measures to be adopted in view of the present condition of affairs. On the other hand the manufacturers of woollens are also holding a meeting for the purpose of opposing the threatened duty on raw wool, and in pursuing that policy the central association of the woollen manufacturers has sent petitions to the Imperial Councillor, the Bundesrath, and the Reichstag, against the wool duty.

THE PHILIPPINES CRISIS.

PROCLAMATIONS AND COUNTER PROCLAMATIONS.

THE FILIPINOS WAITING FOR THE FIRST AMERICAN MOVE.

AGUINALDO'S CALL TO ARMS.

(FROM THE "CHINA MAIL.")

Manila, January 7.

"The crisis is on to us," as Artemus Ward would say.

There is no definite news as yet from Iloilo; but we are informed that the American troops have not landed there. The native General now in Iloilo, Delgado, acting on orders from President Aguinaldo, has refused to allow the American expedition to land, and threatens to burn down the town if a hostile movement is made. This announcement foreshadows the native action. General Delgado evidently realises that he cannot hold the town itself against the American forces, supported as they will be by formidable cruisers, but in the country behind the natives can more than hold their own, and will give General Millar a great deal of trouble.

The 1st Californian Regiment is now on board the transports in Manila Bay, awaiting orders to proceed south.

The following is the U.S. proclamation that has caused the Filipino Government to prepare for fighting eventualities:—

THE AMERICAN PROCLAMATION.

Office of the Military of the Philippines Islands, Manila, P. I., January 4th, 1899.

To the People of the Philippine Islands:—

Instructions of His Excellency, the President of the United States, relative to the administration of affairs in the Philippine Islands have been transmitted to me by direction of The Honourable the Secretary of War, on the date of December 28th, 1898. They direct me to publish and proclaim in the most public manner to the inhabitants of these islands that in the war against Spain the United States forces came here to destroy the power of that Nation and to give the blessings of peace and individual freedom to the Philippine people; that we are here as friends of the Filipinos to protect them in their homes, their employments, their individual and religious liberty; that all persons who, either by active aid or honest endeavour, cooperate with the Government of the United States, to give effect to these beneficent purposes, will receive the reward of its support and protection.

The President of the United States has assumed that the municipal laws of the country in respect to private rights and property and the repression of crime are to be considered as continuing in force, in so far as they may be applicable to a free people, and should be administered by the ordinary tribunals of justice, presided over by representatives of the people and those in thorough sympathy with them in their desires for good government; that, the functions and duties connected with civil and municipal administration are to be performed by such officers as wish to accept the assistance of the United States, chosen in so far as it may be practicable from the inhabitants of the islands; that while the management of public property and revenues and the use of all public means of transportation are to be conducted under the Military authorities until such authorities can be replaced by civil administration, all private property, whether of individuals or corporations, must be respected and protected. If private property be taken for Military uses it shall be paid for at a fair valuation in cash if possible, and when payment in cash is not practicable at the time, receipts therefor will be given to be taken up and liquidated as soon as cash becomes available. The Ports of the Philippine Islands shall be open to the commerce of all foreign nations, and goods and merchandise not prohibited for military reasons by the Military Authorities shall be admitted upon payment of such duties and charges as shall be in force at the time of importation.

The President concludes his instructions in the following language:—

"Finally, it should be the earnest and paramount aim of the Administration to win the confidence, respect, and affection of the inhabitants of the Philippines by insuring to them in every possible way the full measure of individual rights and liberty which is the heritage of a free people, and by proving to them that the mission of the United States is one of beneficent assimilation, which will substitute the mild sway of justice and right for arbitrary rule. In the fulfilment of this high mission, while upholding the temporary administration of affairs for the greatest good of the governed, there will be sedulously maintained the strong arm of authority to repress disturbance, and to overcome all obstacles to the bestowal of the blessings of good and stable government upon the people of the Philippine Islands."

From the tenor and substance of the above instructions of the President, I am fully of the opinion that it is the intention of the United States Government, while directing affairs generally, to appoint the representative men now forming the controlling element of the Filipinos to civil positions of trust and responsibility, and it will be my aim to appoint thereto such Filipinos as may be acceptable to the supreme authorities at Washington.

It is also my belief that it is the intention of the United States Government to draw from the Filipino people so much of the military force of the islands as possible and consistent with a free and well constituted government of the country, and it is my desire to inaugurate a policy of that character. I am also convinced that it is the intention of the United States Government to seek the establishment of a most liberal government for the islands, in which the people themselves shall have as full representation as the maintenance of order and law will permit, and which shall be susceptible of development on lines of increased representation and the bestowal of increased powers into a government as free and independent as is enjoyed by the most favoured provinces of the world.

It will be my constant endeavour to cooperate with the Filipino people, seeking the good of the country, and I invite their full confidence and aid.

E. S. ORIS,
Major-General, U. S. Vol.,
Military Governor.

PRESIDENT AGUINALDO'S PROCLAMATION.

The following is a translation of President Aguinaldo's proclamation:—

Official.

Manifesto issued by the President of the Revolutionary Government:—

To my Brothers, the Filipinos and all accredited Consuls and foreigners:—

The proclamation of His Excellency General O'is, Major-General of Volunteers of the United States, published yesterday in the newspapers of Manila, obliges me to circulate the following manifesto in order to make known to all those who can read and understand it that the present document is my most solemn protest against all that is contained in the proclamation hereinafter referred to, because my conscience compels me to do so in fulfilment of my pledges to my beloved country and the special and official relations with the North American nation.

General O'is gives himself the title in the proclamation in question of Military Governor of the Philippine Islands. I protest against a thousand times and with all the energy of my soul against such authority.

I proclaim solemnly, that I have not promised, either verbally or in written document, either in Singapore, Hongkong, or the Philippines, to recognise the sovereignty of America on this beloved soil.

On the contrary, I say that I returned to these Islands, transported on an American man-of-war, on the 19th of May last year, with the distinct and manifest intention of making war against the Spaniards in order to recover our liberty and independence. This is stated in my official proclamation of the 24th of the said month of May, and published in the Manifesto addressed to the Filipino nation on the 12th of June last, when, in my native town of Cavite, I unfurled for the first time our blessed national flag as the sacred emblem of that sublime aspiration; and afterwards reasserted to the American General, General Merritt, the predecessor of General Otis, in the Manifesto I addressed to the Filipino Nation, a few days before, demanding from the Spanish General, Janderes, the surrender of the city of Manila, in which manifesto it is clearly and distinctly stated that the forces of the United States, on sea and land, came to give us our liberty and to overturn the corrupt Spanish administration. I declare, once and for ever, that both natives and foreigners are witness that the U. S. forces on land and sea have recognised by this the belligerency of the Filipinos, not only respecting our national flag but according to public honours, as it was triumphantly navigated in our internal waters before all the foreign nations here represented by their respective Consuls.

With reference to the instructions from His Excellency the President of the United States, alluded to in his proclamation by General Otis, dealing with the administration of the affairs of the Philippine Islands, I protest solemnly, in the name of God, the root and fountain of all justice, on behalf of my beloved brothers against the intrusion of the Government of the United States in the sovereignty of these Islands.

I thus protest in the name of all the Filipino Nation against the instruction referred to, because in reposing their confidence in me by electing me—unworthily though I may be—to the position of President of this nation, they have imposed upon me the duty to maintain, even to death, the liberty and independence of the Filipinos as a nation.

Lastly, I protest against this unexpected act of the American Government in claiming sovereignty in these Islands, in virtue of the documents in my possession dealing with my relations with the American authorities, the which state, in the most unequivocal manner, that the United States did not bring me here from Hongkong to make war against the Spaniards in the interests of the United States but for the sake of our liberty and independence, for the preservation of which I received verbal pledges, together with a promise from them of help and efficacious co-operation. That is the position of affairs, and oh, my dear brothers, if we stand united throughout the country, they cannot flick from us the idea of the liberty and absolute independence which has been our noble aspiration.

Help all of you to effect the end desired with the force that comes from conviction of the justice of our demands. There must be no turning back in the path of glory upon which we have already entered.

(Signed) AGUINALDO.

Manila, January 5th, 1899.

The above proclamation was posted throughout the city this morning, but was torn down by order of the U. S. authorities.

I hear the Americans are sending out troops to protect the pumping station at the water works at Santolan. If they do this, I feel sure hostilities will commence. The natives will not make the first move, but they will resist any hostile move on the part of the Americans.

The situation is certainly very threatening. It is lamentable to think that it is due to the procrastination of the Americans to declare a firm and definite policy with regard to the Philippines.

TELEGRAMS.

LORD CHARLES BERESFORD AT KOBE.

SPEECH AT THE CHINA ASSOCIATION Tiffin.

THE KOBE MEMORIAL.

GREAT BRITAIN TO HELP JAPAN CARRY OUT THE NEW TREATIES.

A HOPEFUL OUTLOOK.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Kobe, Jan. 14, 9.30 a.m.

Lord Charles Beresford tiffined with the local branch of the China Association yesterday. Mr. A. H. Groom, the Chairman, said he was sure the visit of Lord Charles Beresford would assist in bringing about a good understanding between foreigners and Japanese. He referred to the anxiety felt in connection with the new experiment that would come into force in July next, when foreigners would be placed under Codes administered by a practically untried and inadequately paid judiciary, who were necessarily inexperienced in the newly framed laws. Referring to the Kobe Memorial, he hoped to learn that satisfactory assurances had been given by Tokyo. He was satisfied that the Government in Tokyo were as anxious as foreigners were to remove all obstacles from the path of the smooth working of the treaties, and promised that the Association would do all that was possible to promote good feeling.

Lord Charles Beresford, in replying to the toast of his health, emphasized the fact that his mission was to promote a commercial alliance between Japan, Great Britain, America and Germany; it would not be an offensive alliance unless the allies received annoyance. He then referred to the vast changes that had taken place in Kobe since his last visit. As to the difficulties of the new treaty, he could not believe in all the difficulties that some foreshadowed. After all, the British as a nation, were apt to consider possibilities more than realities, and he was satisfied that the British Government intended to help Japan to carry on under the new treaties. He conceived that there would be no difficulty in the future that could not be found capable of a satisfactory solution. As to backing Koheites up, he would be only too glad to do so from his place in Parliament. He promised to ask a question in the House with reference to the Memorial the Association had seen fit to address to the home authorities. The opening-up of China was inevitable, and would necessarily benefit Japan materially, which in turn would necessarily benefit the British merchant in Japan materially.

THE "PEKING" IN COLLISION. STRUCK BY A JAPANESE GUNBOAT.

Kobe, Jan. 16, 7.45 p.m.

The City of Peking narrowly escaped total loss coming up the Bay last night, the Japanese gunboat Amagi running into her port side amidships, and carrying away a number of her lifeboats and davits, and 20 feet of the bulwark rail.

The passengers tell me the order maintained on board at the time of the collision was splendid and they pay a high tribute to Captain Smith's coolness and seamanship.

It was first feared that the worst consequences would follow, and all the boats were swung out. It is reported that the gunboat did not stop. The Peking arrived at ten o'clock last night, and proceeded to-day at eleven. The collision took place at 6.45.

THE ABOLITION OF SUGAR BOUNTIES.

London, Jan. 12.

At a crowded meeting of the Anti-Bounty League, at which all the sugar producing colonies were represented, a resolution was adopted requesting the Government immediately to conclude a convention with Germany, Austria, Belgium, and Holland, abolishing the bounties on sugar.

THE DREYFUS CASE.

The French Chambers have re-assembled and calmly re-elected the former officers, but various interpellations on the latest Dreyfus incidents were announced.

London, Jan. 13.

M. de Beaurepaire belongs to the Civil Section of the Court of Cassation. His denunciation and bias are largely based on hearsay reports, but by them the Anti-Dreyfusites are enabled to repudiate beforehand the decision of the Criminal Section.

London, Jan. 14.

An uproarious debate has taken place in the French Chambers relative to the Beaurepaire incident. M. Lebreton, Minister of Justice, explained that the alleged partiality of Judges merely consisted in their treating Colonel Picquart with the same consideration as the other witnesses. Nevertheless further inquiry is proceeding.

London, Jan. 16.

The decision of the Court of Cassation on the Dreyfus Case is expected shortly. The newspapers state it will report that the proofs of Dreyfus' guilt are insufficient.

London, Jan. 17.

The Court of Cassation has summoned Colonel Esterhazy to appear, as his evidence is considered important. Immunity from arrest is assured him while in Paris. AMERICA AND THE PHILIPPINES.

NO PERMANENT OCCUPATION INTENDED.

London, Jan. 13.

During a debate on the Philippines in the American Senate, Senator Foraker, speaking apparently on behalf of President McKinley, said that while the country was unanimously against restoring the islands to tyrannical Spain or abandoning them to disorder and anarchy, the American occupation would not be permanent. Neither President McKinley nor the Senate desired anything but the ultimate independence of the Philippines.

THE FATE OF THE PHILIPPINES.

London, Jan. 14.
It is declared at Washington that Senator Foraker's statement in regard to the Philippines was wholly unwarranted.

London, Jan. 16.
The debates in the American Senate on the Philippines are revealing strong Anti-German feeling.

London, Jan. 17.
President McKinley is appointing an influential commission including Admiral Dewey, General Otis, and certain civilians, to investigate the situation in the Philippines and advise as to the wisest course.

An American commission sails for the Philippines at the beginning of February and will remain for an indefinite period as general advisory board to President McKinley.

CZAR'S DISARMAMENT PROPOSALS.
London, Jan. 17.

Count Muravieff, Russian Minister for Foreign Affairs, in a circular to the European Cabinets, states that although the horizon has been somewhat overclouded since his first communication, the convocation of a peace congress is still advisable. The proposals include the prohibition of submarine torpedo boats, of new and more powerful weapons or explosives or other new warlike inventions and also of ships with prohibited arms. The Times regards the scheme as visionary and impracticable.

Notes (abridged) by Emil Kemeny, in The Ledger, Philadelphia.

(a) The text move gives the Q B a favourable development, yet most players prefer the 3—B to Kt 5 move.

(b) Since White played 11 takes B P, he should have continued with P takes P, isolating the Black Q P.

(c) In order to guard against the threatening P to K 4. Better, perhaps, was P takes P.

(d) R to Q 4, followed by B to K 2 and Castles, was much better. By Castling Q R White can not pursue aggressive tactics without exposing his King.

(e) Preferable was the Kt to K 4. The text move is not sufficiently aggressive, and gives Black the opportunity to develop the Q B.

(f) Necessary, since B to Kt 5 was threatening. (g) Hardly satisfactory, for it will enable Black to play Kt to B 4, where it occupies a commanding position. Much better was P to K 5.

(h) A disastrous mistake. Better was K to Kt 2, or Q to K 2.

(i) After this move White is bound to lose a Pawn.

(k) The winning move.

(l) White's game at this stage was a hopeless one. Black was a Pawn ahead and bound to win at least another one.

(m) Much superior to R to B 7 ch or B to B 6, in which case White might have prolonged the struggle by interposing the Rook.

31 K Kt 4	62 K B 2

Notes (abridged) by Emil Kemeny, in The Ledger, Philadelphia.

(a) P to K B 4 or P to K Kt 3 is the usual continuation.

(b) A tempting move, which, however, proves disadvantageous. White can not answer Q takes B, followed by B takes Q, for Kt takes Q and B to B 4 ch would give Black an easy win. Nor could he play B takes Kt and K takes Q, for Black, with B takes Q and B takes R, wins the exchange. Obviously, White can not move Q to K 3 or Q to B 2 on account of B to Q B 4 winning the Queen. White has thus no other answer than Q to K 4 or Q to Q 2, which enables Black to continue R to R 5 and eventually P to Q Kt 4, winning the Bishop. Black, however, overlooked White's P takes K P; B takes Kt and Q to Kt 3 continuation, which would regain the piece, with a decided advantage in position.

(c) A defensive move, which, however, involves the loss of a Pawn. It seems Black abandoned too quickly his Pawn.

(d) The exchanges of pieces were rather favourable for Black, for having a Kt against a Bishop, and White's Q B being doubled, he had the best drawing chance. The text move, however, is inferior, and actually causes defeat. The move will enable White to obtain a strong majority of Pawns on the Queen's wing, which will suffice to enforce a win. Black should have moved P to Kt 5, followed by Kt to B 3. It seems Black missed a pretty safe draw.

(e) White on the Queen's wing threatened P to Q Kt 4, establishing a passed Pawn. Black will be unable to defend both wings.

(f) Well played. Black can not move K to B 3, for K to H 5 would follow. He is thus obliged to move his Kt.

(g) White calculated accurately. He can afford to lose the K P, since Black will be unable to stop the K B P.

(h) The final effort, which of course does not prove a success. If White captures the Pawn, then Kt to Q 3 ch and Kt takes P would draw the game.

END GAME.

By W. B. MASON, Tokyo.

BLACK.

WHITE.

White to play and draw.

This interesting position, our correspondent points out, occurred in actual play in Tokyo, White having conceded the odds of Q Kt to his opponent in the game. We will publish the solution in our next issue, to give our solvers opportunity to study the position.

THE CHAMPIONS

For two years the World's Champion has been devoting himself to serious study in Heidelberg and Berlin, and it was a question whether or not the World would lose a great master of Chess to find a great master of mathematics; but now that he has finished his university course, Lasker comes back to the world of Chess. He is now on a tour in England, winning everything in sight. In the Ladies' Chess-club, London, he made a clean sweep of twenty boards; at the Town Hall, Basingstoke, it was the same thing—twenty straight. In Plymouth, he lost only one game out of thirty games, ten were declared draws on account of lack of time, and at Falmouth he won all the games. He has declared his intention to play in the great London Tourney of 1899; and there is a possibility that he may visit the United States. He has lectured on Chess before several of the London clubs, and made his mark as a most interesting and instructive teacher.

Mr. Steinitz is on different lines at present; he has become chess tutor and correspondence player. He is engaged with the Liverpool Club, also a game with the Dublin Chess Club. He offers to play the Vienna Chess Club by correspondence, and is willing to take either the Steinitz Gambit, or the Evans Gambit, against Lasker's defence; or the Giuoco Piano, at the option of the opponents; and in the other he proposes to defend the King's Bishop's Gambit with his new move, 3 Kt to K 2.

Showalter and Janowsky are at present engaged in a match. The former left New York for home as soon as the cable reached him that the latter had started from Europe, but he proposes returning. After the match Janowsky intends sojourning in the States till the London Tournament, in which he hopes to take part.

Under the management of The American Chess Magazine, Pillsbury, the American Champion, is making a tour of the United States. The purpose of this tour is to bring Chess, a very praiseworthy object, for Mr. Pillsbury is not to restrict the exhibition of his wonderful powers to the cities or the large Chess-clubs. He goes as a Chess-missionary, to find those who are interested in the great game; to instill life into small clubs, and to inspire the thousands who play Chess with the desire to do better—to become Pillsburys. We are glad to know that the financial part of the arrangement is assured; and, indeed, Chess-clubs or societies of players should avail themselves of this opportunity to see one of the greatest of the masters and receive the very valuable instruction which his playing imparts.

Considerable publicity has been given to a rumour that the American Champion, Pillsbury, had challenged the World's Champion, Lasker, to play a match for the championship of the world, and that Lasker has accepted the defi. Pillsbury, however, denies the truthfulness of this, but declares that this match is only a matter of time. All the big guns will be heard of in the great Tourney in London, in May, 1899. After that we may expect the greatest of all matches, Lasker v. Pillsbury—Europe v. America—for the championship of all creation.

YOKOHAMA: SATURDAY, JAN. 14TH, 1899.

BIRTHS.

On the 7th January, at No. 57, Bluff, the wife of W. T. CARLETON, of a son.

At Nagano, Shinshu, on Jan. 5, 1899, the wife of the Rev. FRANK S. SCUDDER, of a daughter.

MARRIAGE.

At Christ Church, January 10th, 1899, by the Rev. E. Champneys Iwano, LAURA NATHALIE, daughter of N. F. Smith, of Yokohama, Japan, to CHARLES HENRY WILSON, of the Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation.

DEATH.

At Kobe, on the 8th instant, Captain JOSEPH THOMAS, late of Fishguard, Pembroke-shire, South Wales, aged 67.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

PRINCESS SADA NO MIYA youngest daughter of the Emperor, died on the 13th inst.

The electric railway in Kawasaki is to be opened for traffic on the 17th instant.

On the 6th inst., Viscount Tanaka, Minister of the Imperial Household, left for Oiso to visit Marquis Yamagata. It is said that he was the bearer of an Imperial Order to the Premier.

MATTERS in the Philippines are very disturbed. Aguinaldo's followers getting out of hand.

THE Washington Government has ordered three gunboats and another regiment in the Philippines.

SOME wealthy merchants in Tokyo entertained Marquis Ito to dinner on the 9th at the Charyo, Hoshigaoka.

THERE were seven fires less in Yokohama in 1898 than in 1897; and the decrease in houses destroyed was 54.

MR. IWAMURA SADATAMA, a member of the Peers' House, died on the 7th. The funeral took place on the 10th.

MISS SMITH, daughter of Mr. N. F. Smith, of Yokohama, was married at Christ Church on Tuesday afternoon.

CAPT. SIR EDWARD CHICHESTER, of H.M.S. Immortalite, has been made a C.M.G. for his services at Manila.

BISHOP AWDREY lectured on the Genius of Tennyson at the last meeting of the Yokohama Literary Society.

A FANCY DRESS DANCE was given at the Public Hall, Yokohama, last week, in aid of the funds of Christ Church.

THE laying of the Formosa-Japan cable in Moji Straits has been completed with the exception of a small part at Akamagasaki.

THE Chief Officer and a quarter-master were the only two who lost their lives in the wreck of the Glenaven near Hongkong.

TRANSLATIONS of the additional tariff conventions concluded between Japan and France and Germany will be found in this issue.

A very successful concert was given by the members of the Tokyo Dramatic and Musical Society on Tuesday at the Gora-no-mon.

THE House of Peers has passed the bill increasing the import duty on alcohol to 250 per cent., and raising the duty on tobacco by 100 per cent.

THE Public Prosecutor Cayenne has examined Dreyfus, who denied making any confession on the day of his degradation and reiterated his innocence.

LORD CHARLES BERESFORD arrived at Nagasaki on Wednesday. He left the Coptic at Kobe and travelled overland to Tokyo, visiting Kyoto en route.

A SMALL fire broke out in the Chinese kitchen attached to the premises of Grosser & Co., Yokohama, on Thursday, but was put out before much damage was done.

ARRANGEMENTS are being made by British residents, the Japanese Chamber of Commerce, the Oriental Association, and other bodies to entertain Lord Charles Beresford during his stay in Yokohama and Tokyo next week.

DURING the eleven months ending November, the foreign trade of Japan was as follows:—Exports, yen 165,693,479; imports, yen 277,044,072. Gold and silver coins exported, yen 86,987,805; imported, yen 42,564,070.

DR. AND MRS. WHEELER celebrated their Silver Wedding in Yokohama on Saturday last. The Doctor was a recipient of a handsome silver punch bowl subscribed for by grown-up patients and friends, and of a massive silver claret-jug subscribed for by patients of younger years.

TRADE is still very dull in Yokohama and it seems likely to remain so for some time to come owing to the scarcity of money. Some considerable movement is to be noted in silk, the States and Europe equally dividing the trade.

THERE is much speculation as to Lord Salisbury's object in publishing the Madagascar Blue-book at the present juncture. The French press keenly resents it after the satisfaction given by the evacuation of Fashoda, and accuses Britain of encouraging dangerous irritation.

SENSATION has been caused in the American Senate by Mr. Hoar, a prominent Senator, opposing the ratification of the peace treaty and declaring that the acquisition by America of territory in another hemisphere destroys the Monroe Doctrine.

ON the 9th inst., the Tokyo Cotton Spinning Company held its general meeting. The profit for the half-year amounted to yen 21,130, of which yen 2,000 was put to reserve, yen 18,750 allotted to a dividend at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, and yen 380 carried forward to the next account.

THE Times correspondent travelling in Russia found, despite the Czar's manifesto, feverish activity in dock-yards. The numbers enrolled in the army and navy in October and November were larger than in any previous years, and reinforcements are being sent to the Far East as fast as transportable.

THE letter written by M. de Beaurepaire explaining his resignation as Sectional President of the Court of Cassation is strongly anti-Dreyfus in tone. In it the writer denounces the other Cassation Judges and the Minister of Justice, charging them with partiality and even with corruption, and declaring himself the avenger of the insulted honour of the army.

COLONEL LEWIS stormed and captured Ahmed Fedil's position at Roseires, on the Blue Nile, on December 25th, after severe fighting. Five hundred Dervishes were killed and many wounded. 1,500 prisoners were taken, but Ahmed Fedil escaped. Major Ferguson, of the Grenadiers, and six Egyptian officers were wounded, and 145 men were killed and wounded.

LORD CROMER has laid the foundation stone of the Gordon College at Khartoum. Receiving the Sheikh and notables, he said that the country would be governed in future by the Queen of England and the Khedive, but no attempt would be made to govern from Cairo or London. The Sultan would be the sole representative of the British and Egyptian Governments.

A BLUE-BOOK on Madagascar affairs discloses that Lord Salisbury vigorously protested against French trade restrictions, and especially against the decree confining the coasting trade to the French. M. Delcandé replied on the 29th December that the decree was not enforced and would be revoked. The Times, discussing the subject, says: "The French must not suppose that, because we do not splutter and flame, we are unaware of the shabbiness of the policy of French Government, which under grandiloquent phrases habitually acts with the capidity and cunning of a peasant."

DEATH OF HER IMPERIAL HIGHNESS PRINCESS SADA.

Her Imperial Highness Princess Sada expired at 11.50 p.m. on the 11th inst. The little Princess's illness appears to have been very sudden. The first intelligence suggesting that any ground for uneasiness existed seems to have reached Tokyo during the night of the 10th, and on the morning of the 11th Imperial Chamberlains and physicians were despatched to the detached palace at Shōtō-yen in Kanagawa Prefecture, whither the Princess had proceeded on the 9th instant. The symptoms are said to have been nausea and convulsions, and the malady took its fatal course rapidly and unrelentingly. According to the Official Gazette, the Princess died in Tokyo, whither she returned on the afternoon of the 11th, but the etiquette observed with regard to these announcements renders it impossible to be sure about the place of death. Princess Sada, or Taki-ko Denka, as she was also called, was born in 1897, and had therefore just completed her second year. No announcement is yet made about Court mourning.

THE COLONIES AND THE TARIFF.

The British Colonies seem to occupy a somewhat peculiar position during the interval between the first enforcement of the new Tariff and the operation of the Revised Treaties; that is to say, the interval from January 1st, 1899, to July 17th in the same year. When the Revised Treaties become effective, the Colonies will belong to the category of countries not having treaties with Japan, and all goods imported from them will be subject to the rates fixed by the Japanese Statutory Tariff. But, in the meanwhile, the fact that they are excluded from the purview of the Revised Treaty secures them against some of the disadvantages resulting from Treaty Revision. For while their goods will be subject to the import duties determined by the new Conventional Tariff, they will not be subject to any of the rates determined by the Japanese Statutory Tariff. To put the matter in another form:—The Colonies remain a part of the British empire for treaty purposes so long as the Treaty is not abrogated, because all the privileges secured by that Treaty are explicitly extended to them. Now the old Treaty has already been partially abrogated, since some of the customs dues fixed by its appended Tariff have been changed to higher rates from the beginning of this year. But the duties upon articles not set forth in the new Conventional Tariff must remain on the old basis, so far as the Colonies are concerned, because the Colonies are independent of the Revised Treaty, which leaves the duties on British goods to be determined by the Japanese Statutory Tariff where they are not determined by the new Conventional Tariff. It is difficult to state the facts in a simple form, but not difficult, as we think, to understand the situation. All goods imported by British subjects paid duties formerly under a Conventional Tariff. A portion of such goods has now been brought under a new and considerably higher Conventional Tariff. The remaining portion is left to be dealt with by the Japanese themselves, according to the terms of the Revised Treaty. But since the Revised Treaty does not apply to the Colonies, such of the latter's goods as are not affected by the new Conventional Tariff will apparently continue to enjoy the protection of the old Treaty until the latter passes out of force finally and completely next July. Practically speaking it is probably a point of no great importance, but it certainly has some interest.

Above we speak of the position occupied by the British colonies towards the new Tariff, and explained what at first sight seems to be a rational view, namely, that goods coming from the Colonies to Japan will not be subject to the Statutory Tariff until the Revised Treaties actually go into force next July. That contention is based on the hypothesis that the new Conventional Tariff, which became operative from the commencement of this year, supplants the old Tariff only in so far as the goods enumerated in the former are concerned, and that goods not enumerated therein remain on their original footing if imported from British Colonies which have not been brought within the purview of Treaty Revision. But there is another and apparently a more logical view of the matter. It is that, from the beginning of the current year, the old Tariff became wholly ineffective, though a change of rates had not been diplomatically arranged with respect to all the articles scheduled in it. In short, the new Tariff, having been negotiated by the British Government and definitely substituted for the old Tariff, must be considered equally binding on all subjects of that Government, without distinction, who paid duties under the old Tariff. When the latter was framed, its privileges were claimed for the British Colonists, and, when it is abrogated, a portion of its privileges can not be reserved for the Colonists though abandoned for the people of the United Kingdom. An alternative way of stating the proposition is that the Colonies are not entitled to enjoy the advantages of freedom and dependence simultaneously. Privileges which they obtained in their capacity of complete subordination to the mother country can not be retained on the plea that they have ceased to be subordinate. It is a curious and interesting question, but we do not see how these latter arguments can be traversed. Her Majesty's Government stood proxy for the Colonies forty years ago, and though the engagements it then entered into on their behalf and the commercial advantages it negotiated for them internationally, might have been held to lapse when they ceased to recognise its right to control their international commerce, those advantages certainly should not be considered more permanent in the case of the Colonies than in the case of other British subjects.

SINGULAR ACCUSATIONS.

A grain of fact is worth a peck of theory. The Japanese are accounted a particularly patriotic people. Some foreign writers have almost lost their heads over the evidences they discover of this trait, and Japanese writers, as a rule, seem to take it for granted that their nationals are gifted with quite an abnormal love of country and reverence for the Throne. Yet occasionally our confidence in such a pleasant state of affairs is rudely disturbed. When, for example, we find a newspaper like the Yomiuri Shimbun sacrificing country to party, and blackening the character of the whole Japanese nation in order that the reputation of its own political opponents may be seen in shadow, we begin to doubt whether this fine theory of patriotism has great practical value. The Yomiuri alleges that the Japanese are insincere folks, and it bases the charge on their attitude towards Chinese and Korean reformers. The movements of reform in both of the neighbouring empires were encouraged by Japan—indeed the Yomiuri goes even so far as to assert that the Japanese Government actually fomented the insurrection of Kim Ok-kiun in Sōul,—yet when the movements failed, and their promoters fled to Japan for refuge, they received scant courtesy. Our contemporary's immediate purpose in making these strange statements is to create an impression that whereas the former Cabinet took successful measures to check the Chinese Government's ardour of resentment against the reform party, the present Cabinet remains supine, and thus becomes vicariously responsible for the recently reported renewal of the Empress Dowager's persecuting mood. It will be generally admitted, we think, that the Powers principally interested in China's progress should endeavour to employ their good offices on behalf of the unfortunate Chinese whose chief fault is that they are more enlightened than the bulk of their nationals. But Japan would show a great lack of judgment if she acted alone in such a matter. The duty devolves mainly upon England. Neither she nor Japan will be slow to take any steps consistent with due regard for prudence—not prudence on their own account, of course, but prudence for the sake of the cause of progress which might only be jeopardised by precipitate interference. As for the refugees, they seem to us to have received quite as full a measure of protection in Japan as they had any title to expect. The Yomiuri complains that Kim Ok-kiun was sent to Hokkaido and afterwards to the Bonin Islands, and condemns such treatment as inhospitable. Our contemporary's memory of modern history might be easily improved. Kim would have been suffered to live where he pleased in Japan had he abstained from intrigues which threatened to involve several Japanese subjects.

NEW YEAR LUNCHEON.

The Emperor entertained a large party at luncheon in the Homei-den, or Hall of Abundance and Brightness, on the 3rd instant. The Princes of the Blood; the Ministers of State; the Foreign Representatives; several members of the two first Orders of Nobility; the President of the Privy Council; the Privy Councillors, and the Court Councillors had the honour of being present. The Emperor expressed his pleasure at receiving the Foreign Representatives and his principal subjects, and wished them the Compliments of the Season; to which gracious speech Marquis Yamagata, on behalf of the Administration, and Baron d'Anethan, on behalf of the Foreign Corps Diplomatique, replied in suitable terms. The Nichi Nichi Shimbun states that the entertainment was in pure Japanese style.

THREE INTERESTING REFORMS.

It is stated that three important amendments of the Code of Criminal Procedure will be embodied in a Bill for submission to the Diet at an early date. The first relates to the manner of attesting legal documents. These, according to the present system, must carry not only the signature but also the stamp of the attesting party. Foreigners, however, do not use stamps: with them the signature is everything, and if the existing method of procedure were insisted on, they would be subjected to the disadvantage of not being able to prepare documents that comply with the full requirements of the law. It is proposed, therefore, to abolish the stamp.

The second reform has to do with solitary confinement as ordered by a judge conducting a preliminary examination. The compilers of the present Code, following French practice, endowed the judge with competence to order into solitary confinement for a limited time any prisoner showing a recalcitrant disposition under investigation. There has long been a sentiment that such a power is liable to great abuse, and that, under any circumstances, the principle of the procedure is to be condemned. The probability is, therefore, that the system of misshitsu hankin will be done away with.

Finally, the question of bail is to be dealt with. There are some people who imagine that without the Anglo-Saxon institution of habeas corpus, no criminal procedure can be satisfactory. Habeas corpus is an excellent institution, no doubt, but the ends that it is designed to attain are not unattainable by other legal devices. The framers of the Japanese Code thought that they had attained these ends, first, by providing that examination by a judge must take place within 48 hours of the time of arrest, and, secondly, by investing the Judges with power to grant bail. At first sight such arrangements seem calculated to guarantee a suspect against arbitrary or needless detention. But the system has not worked well in practice. Several times during the past seven years instances of apparent abuses have been referred to in these columns, and a feeling has grown up among foreigners that this phase of Japanese jurisdiction may prove very irksome. A memorandum on the subject was placed in the hands of Mr. Barrett by certain United States Missionaries on the occasion of his recent visit to Japan, and in common with other foreign Representatives he appreciated the importance of the apprehension. What the Government now proposes, it is said, is to create a right of appeal from the decision of a Judge refusing to grant bail. The working theory to-day is that a Judge refuses bail when he considers that the ends of justice might be defeated by setting the accused at liberty; not so much lest an escape should be effected, as lest proofs of guilt should be destroyed or rendered inaccessible. Whether the examining Judges take too timid a view of such contingencies, or whether they have not yet entered fully into the spirit of the law of bail, or whether, as many allege, the accused persons themselves often fail through ignorance to press for their lawful privileges, it seems pretty certain that the system does not work satisfactorily. We are not prepared to say that the creation of competence to appeal against a refusal to grant bail would entirely meet the requirements of the case, but it certainly would be a substantial improvement.

THE ARMAMENT OF THE NAVY.

Japan is gradually achieving the very desirable condition of uniformity in her naval armament. We can recall the time when anything but uniformity prevailed; the time when a gun's crew taken from one ship would have been practically useless for immediate service on another. The fault did not rest altogether with Japan. She had to take her ships where she could find them, and their armaments were purchased with them. Thirty years ago, opinions were much divided among artillerists as to the best weapon of the time. Japan's advisers were strongly in favour of breech-loading guns, although, as Englishmen, they adopted that view reluctantly; for England had then turned her back upon the breech-loader. She was the first to introduce it, but her experience with the best breech-closing mechanism that the wit of man had then devised did not encourage her to continue in the new line. Krupp, therefore, found his opportunity, and when Japan began to organise her Navy, the Essen weapon was the only gun in the world that fulfilled the conditions laid down by her advisers and endorsed by her own intelligence, namely a breech-loading cannon approved and adopted by the Government of the country where it was manufactured. Thenceforth during several years the German breech-loader held first place in Japanese estimation, and there seemed to be a strong probability that the unification of her naval armament would be on the lines of Krupp. But when England reverted to her old love, her proverbial mechanical skill, to say nothing of the exceptional theoretical knowledge that her artillerists had always displayed, soon brought her into prominence. There is a story told of von Moltke in his comparatively youthful days. Asked to endorse a panegyric on a new piece of artillery, he replied that if an angel from heaven pronounced a favourable verdict about a gun, he should not believe him unless the weapon had been approved at Woolwich. If the great Marshal were alive now, he might substitute Newcastle for Woolwich, inasmuch as Armstrong and Whitworth have no superiors. Into their hands the arming of Japan's ships seems to have fallen almost entirely. The first-class cruisers now building in France and Germany; the second-class cruisers now building in America; the three line-of-battle ships building in England, and probably the fourth line-of-battle ship for which Messrs. Vickers and Company have obtained the order, are all to receive their armaments at Elswick. We learn from the Nichi Nichi Shimbun that the name of the fourth line-of-battle ship has not yet been fixed. The three now approaching completion are to be called the Shikishima, the Asahi, and the Hatsuse, but the fourth remains nameless. The same journal says that the torpedo-destroyer ordered at the Yarrow Yard was handed over on the 29th ultimo to the Japanese crew sent home to receive her, and that she will start for Japan in a few days.

THE SŌUL-CHEMULPO RAILWAY.

The Japanese have finally taken over the Sŏul-Chemulpo Railway according to the original programme. The construction of the line was to have been completed before its transfer to the Japanese company, but in consequence of some technical questions, the details of which have no interest for the general public, it has been decided that the last stages of the building operations shall be carried out by Japanese engineers. No objection to the transfer has been raised by the Korean Government, and the transaction may therefore be regarded as definitely closed. It is not without political significance, but upon that phase we need not comment. A tribute must be paid, however, to Mr. J. R. Morse, the projector of the line. We do not mean a tribute to his enterprise, nor yet to the courageous perseverance and tact with which he met and overcame all difficulties. Those qualities are, of course, deserving of all praise, but they are happily common among American and British merchants. Our reference is rather to the remarkably scrupulous loyalty shown by Mr. Morse throughout the affair. The story was told pretty fully in The Times a year ago, and its principal incident alone need be recalled here; namely, that while Mr. Morse was still practically free to deal with the line, a French syndicate offered to purchase it from him at a price which would have put a clear profit of half a million of yen into his pocket. We say that he was practically free at the time, because the Japanese Company had no legal claim upon him other than that provided by a clause involving a forfeiture of 30,000 yen in case of failure to implement the contract. In short, by forfeiting thirty thousand yen, Mr. Morse could have gained half a million. But he declined the offer, considering himself morally bound to the Japanese Company which had helped to finance the line at a somewhat critical time. It is a fine record.

THE FORMOSA-AMOI CABLE.

There is, it appears, no foundation for the statement that opposition has been offered by France to Japan's acquisition of the Formosa-Amoy Cable. An explicit contradiction of the rumour is now published by the vernacular journal which received the erroneous telegram from Peking. We learn further that our own version of the negotiations between Japan and China was misleading. The facts are these: At the time of the cession of Formosa the question of handing over the cable was mooted, but China declined to consent, and for a considerable time maintained her attitude of objection. Her view of the case seems to have been that Japan, having obtained so much, both morally and materially, ought not to press for petty concessions such as the transfer of a few miles of submarine cable. To Japan, of course, the matter presented itself in a different light, but she did not urge her proposal. Thenceforth the cable was worked by the two Powers jointly, Japan taking the payments collected in Formosa, and China taking those collected on her side. Very extensive repairs had to be made from time to time, at Japan's expense, and ultimately it became apparent that fully half of the cable would have to be renewed. Japan was not disposed to undertake such a costly operation unless some definite arrangement were effected as to the ownership of the cable. Hence, although full preparations for the renewal were completed, the work was temporarily suspended. The Chinese Authorities now saw the advisability of handing over the cable, and accounts were compiled, giving due consideration to the claims of each side, the result being that an agreement was reached on the basis of a payment of 100,000 yen to China. This settlement appears to have been considered more or less prejudicial to Danish interests; in other words, to the interests of the Eastern Extension Company and the Great Northern Company. Hence the Russian Minister in Peking, who also represents Denmark, showed some disposition to oppose the ratification of the agreement, but his opposition does not appear to have been of a very resolute character, for the bargain has been concluded and China is now in receipt of the money.

THE FORMOSA RAILWAY.

The Formosa Railway threatens to assume the character of a farce. The date for its commencement has been postponed again and again. People supposed that the postponement granted until the 15th of the present month would prove final, but again the indulgence of the Governor-General has been sought, and again he has responded by conceding another period of grace until the 28th of February. The Company started with rosy prospects. Its capital was fixed at 15 million yen in 300,000 shares, but applications were received for 700,000 shares. When it came to calling in the subscriptions, however, the holders of 155,000 shares alone showed any disposition to respond. An unsuccessful attempt having then been made to enlist the cooperation of the Treasury and the Imperial Household, the Bank of Japan was asked to place the shares on its list of negotiable securities, but that application also proved abortive. The next proposal was to have the capital reduced to 10 million yen, the projectors taking the balance of 45,000 required to make up this amount. But the project did not mature, and recourse was had to Messrs. Peacock and Company and to French capitalists. Foreigners, however, declined to lend any money except on Government security. Whether there is any other scheme on foot we do not know, but it would seem that the assumption of the responsibility by the State is the only chance of getting the line built. There is, however, a marked reluctance to dissolve the Company and abandon the enterprise to official hands; reluctance which some critics attribute to the fact that 385,000 yen has been collected from the shareholders and 150,000 yen contributed by the promoters, which money the managing committee would now be puzzled to return.

THE RAILWAY QUESTION.

It has been generally supposed that if the proposal for the State purchase of private railways entered the field of practical politics, the method of assessing the purchase price would be to take the average net profits during the past five years and multiply the figure by 20. The Yiji Shimo, however, suggests that a different plan would be followed; the plan indicated by the Regulations for Private Railways, where it is provided that, after the lapse of a full period of 25 years from the time of granting a charter, the Government shall be entitled to purchase the line from the shareholders at a price determined by taking the average market value of the shares during the 5 years preceding the date of purchase. The law, therefore, furnishes a very explicit method of procedure. It is true that since the preliminary interval of 25 years has not elapsed in the case of any of the lines in question, the Government can not assert a right of purchase. But the volition of the shareholders would remove that objection. An interesting question then arises as to the prices that the shares have commanded during the past 5 years. The following table is published, the prices shown being those ruling during the second half of each year:—

	1893.	1894.	1895.
Japan R. Company—100 yen	245	197	194
Kiushiu R. Company—100 yen	110	101	124
Sanyo R. Company—100 yen	122	110	135
	1896.	1897.	1898.
Japan R. Company—100 yen	220	185	141
Kiushiu R. Company—100 yen	150	145	144
Sanyo R. Company—100 yen	174	140	124

Thus the averages for these 100 yen shares are, Japan Railway Company, 198 yen; Kiushiu Railway Company, 129 yen; Sanyo Railway Company, 134 yen. It is scarcely conceivable that the Kiushiu Company would be willing to accept 129 yen for shares now quoted at 144 yen, but the Japan Railway Company and the Sanyo Railway Company would gain largely by the transaction. These companies have 50 yen shares also, which, in the case of the Sanyo Railway, are not fully paid up. The quotations for the 50 yen shares at the end of last year were:—

Japan Railway Company—50 yen share, yen .	fully paid	70
Sanyo Railway Company—50 yen share,	44 yen paid	50
Kiushiu Railway Company—50 yen share,	fully paid	67

The Yiji says that the five-years average in the case of these shares would be 99 yen, 56.70 yen, and 67 yen respectively, but the basis of the calculation is not given, and we fail to see how the results are obtained. It appears, however, that the shareholders are by no means unanimous in their desire to sell to the State. Many of them hold their shares as investments from which they derive a regular income. The market price of the shares is a secondary consideration to them, and, in any case, they would be disposed to regard the average of the past five years as a rather poor figure.

BORNEO & THE JAPANESE YEN.

The Government of North Borneo is determined to have nothing to do with the Japanese silver yen. It has issued an ordinance totally interdicting the import of the silver yen for purposes of currency, and providing penalties of heavy fines and half a year's imprisonment for infractions of the veto. We hear nothing of the reasons for thus tabooing a coin which was formerly so much liked. It is true that the yen has now only bullion value, but it never had much more, and, though it has ceased to be legal tender in Japan, it remains at least as good as the Mexican dollar elsewhere. There is doubtless some good cause for the interdict in North Borneo, but we are not acquainted with it.

FOREIGNERS AND SHARES IN JAPANESE ENTERPRISES.

The Government in Tokyo seems disinclined to pronounce any definite opinion as to the legality of foreign ownership of shares in Japanese railways and commercial or industrial companies. According to the Kokumin, several inquiries have been addressed to the Authorities, but a discreet silence is preserved by the latter. The directors of the Kibe Tetsudo, whose affairs recently fell into such a lamentable state of confusion, are said to have pressed with special importunity for an official pronouncement, the regulations of the Company having been duly revised in the sense of admitting foreign shareholders. It always seemed to us a particularly naïve proceeding on the part of the Kibe Railway folk to open their arms to the foreign capitalist so soon as they found themselves in financial difficulties, but their conception of the stranger's disposition is at least flattering to his benevolence, though not complimentary to his business acumen. They failed, however, to elicit a conclusive answer from the Government. The Tokyo Beer Company is said to be the latest propounder of the query. Its stock is in considerable demand among foreigners, no less than 1,500 of its shares having been acquired by Yokohama residents in the names of Japanese banto and other "trustworthy natives," of whom every foreigner manages to find one for his own service, though nine foreigners out of every ten deny that such a thing is discoverable in Japan. In answer to the Beer Company's query, the Department of Agriculture and Commerce is reported to have pronounced an affirmative opinion, but the Foreign Office, though not prepared to deny the legality of the claim advanced by the Company, expressed the view that, in consideration of the course hitherto pursued, it seemed advisable to let the matter rest for the present. Well, life is not so very short after all. We presume that the enterprising foreigner can afford to wait a few months longer. Having waited for a quarter of a century, he may as well "take the opportunity" of waiting for another half year, as the operation would be expressed in the euphemistic phraseology of the Japanese.

This aspect of the operation of the Revised Treaties—a pending solvent of all difficulties—reminds us that the event has been viewed in that character by optimists and opportunists for a great many years. In 1886, the subject of a certain foreign Power established a rice exchange in Tsukiji. Rice exchanges were at that time forbidden by Japanese law. They were counted a form of gambling injurious not only to the morals of the persons carrying them on, but also to the interests of the public at large. The Governor of Tokyo applied to the foreigner's Consul for assistance. The Consul replied that, rice exchanges not being interdicted by the laws of the foreigner's native land, he (the Consul) had no competence to interfere. Then the Foreign Office approached the Legation of the enterprising gentleman. The Legation warned him privately that if he persisted in keeping open his exchange, things would be made hot for him, somehow or other, but publicly endorsed the Consul's attitude, and recommended the Japanese Government to let the matter drop, "in view of the near approach of Treaty Revision." It was a grim piece of humour; the near approach of Treaty Revision in 1880!

THE PHILIPPINES.

A suggestion is made by the Yomiuri Shimbun that Japan should act as intermediary to bring about a settlement between Aguinaldo and the United States Government. Present indications suggest a severe struggle for the possession of the Philippines; a struggle that will involve terrible bloodshed and a long interval of disorder. Why not hold a conference in Tokyo after the model of the recent conference between Spain and America in Paris. The Yomiuri thinks by Japan's intervention the leaders of the Independents could be induced to make an arrangement entirely satisfactory to the Washington Government. But it seems to us exceedingly doubtful whether the United States would, or should, go into any conference with Aguinaldo and his supporters. The Philippines are now an American territory. The so-called "independents" have no recognisable status there whatever. If they decline to bow to American authority, they become rebels, de facto, and can not be met in conference on equal terms.

A story without a grain of truth is published by the Yorosu Choho. It is to the effect that the Japanese Government was notoriously favorable to the Philippine insurgents when they fought against Spain, and that she is likely to be suspected of a similar sentiment now, emissaries from Aguinaldo having come to this country. It is singular that if such a mood prevailed in Japan no evidences of it were afforded either in the writings of the newspaper or in the utterances of public men. While Spain was endeavouring to crush the rebellion, Aguinaldo sent an agent to Japan to purchase arms and gunpowder, but the Japanese police were too vigilant and the agent returned re infecta. Recently the attempt was renewed, it is said, but with equally barren results. The Japanese authorities have always maintained an attitude of the strictest neutrality with regard to the Philippines.

A CENSON.

The Kokumin Shimbun does not believe all the hard things that foreigners say about Japanese commercial morality, but it draws up a bill of indictment on its own motion, and truly, when we come to examine the counts of its accusation, we fail to see that its nationals fare better at its hands than they do at the hands of their foreign critics. The Kokumin says, first, that the goods they deliver are not up to sample; secondly, that they do not keep their engagements as to time; thirdly, that they have no adequate appreciation of the permanent interests of business; fourthly, that they are without ability to work in combination; and fifthly, that they do not get to know either their customers or themselves. That is an ugly chargesheet as it stands, but no sign is more hopeful than the public and frank recognition of these faults by a leading journal. Of course, it is not by any means the first time that a Japanese newspaper has written in the same strain.

STATE FORESTS.

It will be a good thing when some final disposition is made of the forests owned by the State. They furnish a perpetual handle to the Government's enemies. In the first place, they present on paper the appearance of a large asset, and there is no apparent reason why they should not be made to return a substantial revenue. But in practice they yield scarcely anything, and there is consequently a perennial impression of mismanagement. Then, again, from time to time sales of forest land are made on terms which, though not too low in consideration of the apparently unremunerative character of the land, are quite low enough to suggest suspicions of jobbery. The Government of India recently engaged a German expert and placed him in control of the public forests. We presume that the Japanese House of Representatives has too much confidence in the ability of its nationals to sanction recourse to German aid (or any foreign aid), but if Japan did not know a great deal more about the profitable management of forests than the British Government knows, the Treasury in Tokyo might be deriving several millions of revenue from the huge areas of forest land now producing virtually nothing. The latest project journalistically suggested is that the whole of the State forests should be sold, and the proceeds set aside to form a capital fund in aid of primary education. The suggestion seems excellent in part, but we venture to think that instead of selling the forests at the miserable prices which they would now command, two or three German experts might be engaged to make them a paying asset. The revenue thus derived from them would probably amount to ten thousand yen for every hundred accruing as interest on the sum obtainable by selling them now.

THE NEWLY DISCOVERED ISLAND.

It has not been forgotten by the public that a Japanese traveller, Mr. Mizutani Shiuroku, discovered an island, in October, 1897, lying about 600 nautical miles to the east of the Bonins. It is a small space, only some 7½ miles in circumference, but it is peopled by myriads of penguin, and produces an abundance of bananas and coconuts. Some folks say that the place is really Marcus Island, and that it was discovered long ago. Be that as it may, the Japanese Government, on receipt of Mr. Mizutani's report last June, decided to call the island Minami-tori-shima, or southern bird island, in allusion to the immense colony of penguins—12 different kinds—that have their habitat there. The prefix minami is used to distinguish the island from Tori-shima (bird island) which lies farther north and nearer to the Bonins. There are no people living on Minami-tori-shima, and a ten years' lease of it has been granted to the discoverer, who is said to be making a very profitable speculation by exporting its fruits, as well as the feathers and flesh of the penguins. The climate is equable, the thermometer standing generally in the neighbourhood of 80° F.; there is an abundance of vegetation, but little rain, and a great scarcity of water, so that five stills have had to be erected.

THE JUDICIARY.

The present Minister of Justice, we read in vernacular journals, was not expected to pursue a vigorous course in weeding out incompetent and superannuated judicial officials, but he has agreeably belied the public's forecast, no less than 61 judges and public procurators having been induced to resign since he came into office last November. Analysing these resignations, it appears that 9 have taken place in the Supreme Court, 21 in the Appeal Courts, 12 in the Local Courts, and 19 in the District Courts; 36 of the total being judges, and 25, public procurators. His Excellency is reported to have said that the process of sifting can not be considered complete until the removals aggregate 200, but as there are only 81 officials now qualified to fill the vacancies it is necessary to proceed deliberately. What strikes an outsider in connexion with these changes is that, however desirable and inevitable they may be, they furnish a strange commentary on the so-called perpetuity of judicial offices. We can understand that judges and public procurators of the old school are not fitted to administer the new codes, and their replacement by competent men is most essential. But we can also understand that the men of the old school are likely to take a very different view of their own capacities. How, then, are their resignations contrived? The thing would scarcely be possible anywhere except in Japan, we imagine. The Japanese, however, have two remarkable qualities: amenability to reason and adaptability to circumstances. As a matter of common sense, the old judges can, without much difficulty, be brought to see their incongruity with the radically altered conditions of the time, and, once convinced of that, they quietly bow to the inevitable, and reconcile themselves to a greatly reduced scale of living and a finished career. The case of Mr. Takano has shown what kind of opposition a Japanese Judge can make to an official sentence which he considers unjust, but here we have 61 judges and procurators who seem to have quietly admitted their own unfitness for office, and stepped aside without a murmur to make room for younger and better trained men. May we not fairly call it a remarkable incident?

THE ALLEGED TRAIN ROBBERY.

A few days ago a somewhat startling account was published of a robbery with violence on the Japan Railway. Full details were given as to the nature of an attack made upon the guard of the train, the character of the injuries inflicted on him, the weapon employed by his assailant, and finally the admission of the unfortunate official to hospital, where the story left him lying in a precarious condition. We now learn that the whole affair was an invention so far as the alleged thief was concerned. The guard himself was the robber. What becomes of his wounds and his transportation to the hospital we do not discover, but it appears plain that he stole the money and concocted the tale about a murderous assault in order to cover his tracks. He is now discovered to have served in some inferior military post, from which he was dismissed for irregular conduct.

THE FINANCES.

The House of Peers on Monday read for the first time the Bill passed by the Representatives for increasing the import duties on alcohol, refined sake, and tobacco. In the case of alcohol the duty is to be raised to 250 per cent., and, in the case of cut tobacco, to 80 per cent., cigars and cigarettes being similarly penalized. That this measure would become necessary with regard to tobacco if the monopoly system were adhered to, was pointed out in these columns when the scheme for a monopoly came under debate for the first time. We are disposed to risk another prediction now, namely, that, unless the import of alcohol be prohibited altogether, sake will gradually cease to be the national beverage, and the very considerable income derived from it by the Treasury will disappear. Since the Sake Tax began to be increased, the adulteration of sake with alcohol has grown steadily. We do not refer to honshu, or mixed sake, which is a thing apart, capable of being independently dealt with, and is, at any rate, consumed by the lower orders only. We refer to refined sake, the beverage of the upper classes. In former days, it used not to contain more than 6 or 7 per cent. of alcohol, but its adulteration with the latter has steadily grown in proportion to the augmentation of the tax, and we have heard it confidently stated that refined sake contains to-day as much as 27 per cent. of alcohol. The character of the beverage is thus completely changed. Instead of being comparatively innocuous, as refined sake of the old type is, it becomes highly deleterious and intoxicating, and its use will not only impair the health of the nation but also tend to largely swell the criminal classes. Statistics compiled with great care during recent years in Europe reveal that excessive recourse to alcoholic beverages is responsible for the most terrible consequences, producing insanity, demoralization, and disease. The evil may to some extent cure itself in Japan, for sake charged with alcohol to the extent of 25 per cent. must soon cease to suit the palate of the upper classes. But, pending its loss of favour, wide-spread mischief will be wrought, and the least of the resultant evils will be a loss of thirty or forty millions of revenue. The Government incur an immense responsibility in this matter, for it is owing to the Government's financial policy that brewers are driven to adulteration. The obvious remedy is to place alcohol on the same footing as opium; that is to say, to prohibit its import altogether except for medicinal and manufacturing purposes. Why the Government hesitates to take that step it is difficult to imagine. The less alcohol the people consume, the better for them morally and physically. That is certain. Six years ago, there did not appear to be any danger of the evil now menacing the nation, but it is to-day a very real and imminent peril. Why should there be any hesitation about applying a remedy? A duty of 250 per cent. is not a remedy. We doubt whether it can even be called a palliative.

It is stated that the Government contemplates making experimental plantings of foreign tobacco, and that two American experts will be engaged to teach the processes of curing and manufacturing.

Presumably the idea is to extend the monopoly to cigars, of which the consumption is constantly increasing. The tobacco monopoly is among the sources of revenue which the Treasury is expected to draw upon for making good the deficiency caused by the Diet's alteration of the Land Tax Bill. It is not a very promising source. We presume that the Government has some solid, though to-outside-invisible, reason for persisting in the very clumsy method of monopoly planned in 1896. The defects of the method were clearly pointed out in these columns at the time, and events have vindicated the justice of our criticisms from point to point. Still no change is made, and, since the business is in the hands of intelligent men, we must assume that the incomparably simpler, less expensive, and less risky plan adopted in England is not applicable in Japan owing to the existence of conditions which do not admit of explanation. In the interests of sound finance, however, it is permissible to hope that the Treasury will not attempt to lean harder upon the bruised reed of the tobacco monopoly.

The Bank of Japan is not unlikely to escape without any taxation for one year at any rate. It appears certain that a majority in the House of Peers is determined not to approve of a higher tax than one per cent. on the Bank's note issues. Hence the Lower House's Bill will be rejected, and a conference of the Houses will ensue, when, should the Representatives decline to endorse the Peers' amendment, the Bill will be shelved. Such is the forecast of Tokyo journals, but we imagine that, as neither House is willing to interfere with the Government's projected sources of revenue, a compromise of some kind will be effected.

From the variety of predictions published by the vernacular press we may infer that no certainty exists as to the methods projected by the government for making good the deficit of 84 million yen of revenue resulting from the Lower House's impractical policy. An increase of the succession duties and the imposition of a tax on sugar are now spoken of, however, with some confidence. The new Law of Registration already provides for the levy of a tax upon succession to property, but it is thought that the rate might be increased so as to yield a substantial addition to the revenue. With regard to sugar, the intention apparently is to impose a tax of 0.35 sen per catty. The import at present totals 363,029,500 hin, which, however, will probably be reduced by one-fifth owing to the increased duty. Then the taxable quantity of home-grown sugar is 67,898,000 hin, and thus the total yield from the tax is estimated at 3,092,321 yen. These figures appear to be only approximations.

It is stated that at a Cabinet meeting held on the 11th instant, a final decision was arrived at with regard to means of supplying the deficiency of 53 million yen in the revenue for next fiscal year. The methods to be adopted are an increase of the price of leaf tobacco sold under the Government monopoly, and the imposition of a tax on houses. Such a tax is already levied for purposes of local expenditure, and the Treasury proposes to take a leaf out of the provincial book. There are some eight million houses in the empire, and an average payment of one yen per house would yield a substantial increment of revenue. But the tax will not be levied in that manner; it will be assessed on the renting value (chintai kakaku) of the buildings, and the total amount raised will be 34 million yen, leaving 24 to be obtained from the tobacco monopoly. If the Liberals have any economical conscience they ought to rest badly at night, for, by cutting down the Land Tax, they have brought about the imposition of one of the most irrational taxes conceivable. A tax on houses in proportion to their renting value is another name for a fine upon enterprise. By imposing such a tax, the State does its best to deter the erection of handsome and commodious structures; in other words, does its best to check the elevation of the nation's scale of living. Japan is deliberately throwing away her advantages and committing herself to pernicious systems which have an automatic power of establishing themselves irrevocably when they are once introduced.

By and by the Japanese will come to recognise that, under present conditions, there is only one way of obtaining foreign capital, namely, by pledging the Government's credit. In the course of time, railway or industrial companies may find it possible to sell their shares abroad, but most assuredly that will never happen until foreigners receive the full privileges of shareholders, and can have a voice in the management of the concerns in which they invest their money. We doubt whether there ever was a time when Japanese investments were regarded with less favour by foreigners than they are at present. The illiberal spirit displayed with regard to the tenure of land by foreigners, with regard to their purchase of shares, and with regard to their full admission to the position accorded to capitalists everywhere else—that spirit, supplemented by an unfavourable estimate of the state of the empire's finances, has created a general feeling of uneasiness. There is, of course, no warrant for the notion of Japan's financial unsoundness; but what is the use of the country's being competent to pay its way if party politicians will not allow it to exercise its competence? The parties may congratulate themselves on having impaired the nation's credit at precisely the juncture when recourse to foreign financial aid is essential to the continued development of the country's resources. The Government can obtain money abroad, but not on easy terms. If the Liberals had voted the Land Tax Bill in its original form, the situation would have been very different to-day. It is not merely a question of a deficit of revenue. It is a question about the political parties having any really earnest desire to place the finances on a solid footing. If the Government goes into the London market now as a borrower, it will be immediately reminded that its power to implement its pledges depends upon the coöperation of a House of Representatives which has not hitherto shown any responsible sense of sound finance, or any capacity for dealing radically with economical problems. Land-owners have been saved a few millions by the cutting down of the Land Tax Bill, but the country will find that the loss to itself must be measured in the end by many tens of millions.

A RECORD.

The Tokyo Asahi has made a record. It is the first Japanese journal to seriously call in question the adaptability of the Japanese nation to a constitutional form of Government. The argument is not very clearly worked out. It would apply to nearly all nations as correctly as to Japan; for the Asahi's principal plea is that parliamentary institutions have worked well in one country only, and that is England, where special conditions exist and where hundreds of years have been devoted to elaborating the system. The same conditions do not seem to exist in Japan, the Asahi thinks, and besides Japan has already an excellent principle of government which it seems a pity to discard for the sake of trying a new-fangled system which receives no recommendation from the precedents of other States. Our contemporary does not say what the "excellent principle" is, but it evidently refers to the exceptional attitude of the Japanese people towards the Throne.

We should much like to hear from a thoughtful Japanese some explicit statement of the "conditions" which render England specially suited for parliamentary institutions. It is so easy to talk vaguely of "conditions." What are they, after all? Very simple, probably. The whole "fitness" of the English people resolves itself into this, we think, that they are too practical to sacrifice the general weal upon the altar of individual crochets. An Englishman has views of his own, and he asserts them very stoutly—often with offensive stoutness. But as one of a party he is content that his views should find approximate representation in the platform of the majority. He will not break away from point to point. He knows that wisdom is the resultant of many opinions, and he regards himself simply as one of the component forces that go to determine the direction of the resultant. That, of course, is only another way of defining the spirit of discipline. It is apparently because the spirit of discipline is not practically effective among Japanese politicians that parliamentary institutions have not hitherto worked very successfully here. But before we allege that the want is inherent; before we affirm that the spirit can not be educated, we must wait until some large issues come upon the tapís. There have not yet been any great principles to fuse men together, and in the absence of such principles petty individualities have asserted themselves. Yet the Japanese certainly know how to compromise, and in that faculty may we not discern the germ of party discipline?

AN INVENTION.

One of the great impediments to the effective employment of torpedoes for purposes of coast defence is that, when laid in places where the tide's rise and fall are considerable, their destructive force at high water is seriously impaired. Thus it has always been a desideratum to provide some means by which the torpedoes could be automatically kept at a constant depth. Vernacular newspapers report that mechanism of that nature has now been invented by Commander Oda, of the Imperial Japanese Navy, and that, having been found thoroughly satisfactory on trial, it has been definitely adopted by the Naval Department.

RETROGRESSIVE RETRANCEMENTS.

We have the greatest respect for Mr. Taguchi Ukichi, but we are compelled to endorse the Nichi Nichi Shimbun's criticism that two of the corrections applied by him to the Budget during its passage through the House of Representatives are not conducive to the country's interests. He cut out the appropriation for a Consulate at Odessa, and also the appropriation for a committee to investigate the question of linguistic reform. Russia's doings in East Asia are of immense importance to Japan, and Odessa is one of Russia's principal bases of operations. It is true that the general function of a Consul is to look after the interests of his nationals in the country where he is stationed. But he has also to send reports to his Government. There are not many Japanese subjects to occupy a Consul's attention at Odessa, but there are a great many Russian matters which might well receive his consideration. As for the committee, or society, for linguistic investigation, we should have thought that an economist like Mr. Taguchi would have been the first to recognise its necessity. There is nothing in all Japan so uneconomical as the language. Hundreds of millions of yen worth of labour is wasted annually on the task of mastering the ideographs. So long as Japan is crippled by such a terrible handicap, she can never take a leading place among the nations, nor ever develop her resources to their full capacity. The Educational Department asked for a pittance of 10,328 yen—a thousand pounds sterling—in aid of a committee of investigation, and the House, in obedience to Mr. Taguchi's suggestion, expunged the item. The appropriation for the Odessa Consulate was only 31,000 yen and that went too. The Nichi Nichi Shimbun's progressive instincts never err. We wish that it could infuse a little of its wisdom into the House of Representatives.

YING-CHOW.

We read in the Chiu that the Japanese Government has induced China to agree to an extension of the settlement at Ying-chow. It is hardly necessary to explain that Ying-chow is the Chinese name of the place usually spoken of by foreigners as New-chwang. The town of New-chwang lies on the Liao River, some 30 miles from the mouth, whereas Ying-chow is at the mouth. The extension contemplated is described as stretching up the bank of the Liao for a distance of 17,700 yards, or about 10 miles. We find the figure scarcely credible, for when Mr. Meadows originally selected a site for a settlement in 1862, he was content with a thousand yards of river frontage, and it has not been shown of late that any large need of additional territory is experienced. Our Tokyo contemporary adds that the Chinese residents in the newly selected area are considerably perturbed, apprehending that they will be compelled to remove, and that they have petitioned the Taotai, who, in turn, has addressed himself to the Japanese Consul. Every extension of a foreign settlement in Northern China is a matter for congratulation, since it constitutes an additional wedge to keep the "door" open.

THE NEW BANK.

It seems certain that the Government has resolved to endorse the project of Mr. Kaneko Kentaro with regard to establishing a new bank which shall serve as a means of introducing foreign capital. The institution is to be called the "Industrial Bank of Japan" (Nihon Kogyo Ginko), and the promoters have opened an office in Yamashiro-cho, Tokyo. Three names are prominently connected with the enterprise, Messrs. Kaneko Kentaro, Yasuba Yasukazu, and Ozawa Takeo. The idea is to obtain funds for building railways, improving harbours, working mines, and carrying on other enterprises important to the development of the national economy. A capital of 10 million yen is to be subscribed in the form of public loan bonds, which will be placed in the custody of the State, and the Bank will then be empowered to advance funds to projectors of productive enterprises to the total amount of 100 million yen. Domestic and foreign capitalists are to be invited to subscribe, but evidently reliance is placed chiefly on the latter, for the money loaned by capitalists to the Bank is to be secured by a Government guarantee. In fact, the Bank will be nothing more than an agent for collecting foreign capital and distributing it among enterprising men in Japan, the foreigners lending their funds practically to the Japanese Government, and the Bank lodging security with the Government to the extent of 10 million yen. It appears that Mr. Kaneko and his coadjutors have already assured themselves of the possibility of obtaining capital in Europe and America, but indeed that point can never have been in doubt, for a loan guaranteed by the Japanese Government can always be placed abroad. We do not clearly gather what rate of interest is to be offered to foreign investors. From 3 to 5 per cent. is spoken of, and it is added that the Bank's bonds will run from 5 to 10 years without redemption, after which they will be redeemed in from 20 to 30 years. All enterprises on account of which the Bank gives accommodation will be under Government supervision, the various Departments of State undertaking the supervision of those falling within their respective spheres.

Two things are certain. The first is that foreigners will not invest money in any Japanese enterprise unless they can obtain open recognition as shareholders, and can also discharge the functions of directors. The second is that, even if the above arrangements were immediately possible, it would be a slow and difficult process to attract any large amount of foreign capital. If money is needed quickly and in considerable quantity, the Government must enter the field as a borrower. It is for that reason that the scheme for the State purchase of private railways seems to deserve more favourable consideration than it receives at the hands of some economists; for if railway extension is to be effected with foreign funds, and if foreigners are not to enjoy the full rights of investors but are to be limited to the title of lenders, then they certainly will not provide funds without a Government guarantee, and the Government, in order to be justified in giving a guarantee, should receive the already-constructed railways as security. Mr. Kaneko's plan takes full cognisance of the situation. The foreign capitalist is not invited to invest in the enterprises which are to be started with his money. He will have nothing to do with them, in short, but will merely purchase the Bank's bonds endorsed by the State. We see no reason why the scheme should not succeed if it is intelligibly placed before the foreign public. But the Bank will have to make certain concessions to the incredulity of foreigners. In the first place, it will have to give sterling denominations to its bonds. To call them 100-yen bonds, or 500-yen bonds, will not do. They must be £10 bonds, or £50 bonds. The interest also must be payable in sterling, and must be absolutely guaranteed: that is to say, guaranteed against any reduction on account of taxation. Finally the redemption must not be at the limited option of the Japanese Government. Japanese bonds, according to the present system, may be redeemed at par whenever the Treasury finds it convenient to redeem them. That deprives them of the character of an investment. If they can not be left in the hands of their holder so long as he does not offer them for sale, they should at least be redeemable in fixed and regular quantities spread over a definite term of years. There should be no valid objection to such modifications. If foreign money is wanted, its owners must be conciliated.

POIITICIANS IN THE PROVINCES.

The sun does not shine for the Progressists at present. Undoubtedly they received a staggering blow when the Emperor refused to entrust the conduct of State affairs to them after the resignation of the Liberal members of the Cabinet. From the Sovereign's point of view that course may have appeared imperative; for the Administration having been handed over to the political parties on the basis of their coöperation, neither of them could assert a title to retain it independently of the other. Yet it seemed natural that the disaffection of three Ministers should not disqualify the six remaining, especially when the latter included the Premier; and, if the roughly-judging public interpreted the disqualification in a sense directly injurious to the credit of the Progressists, we can not profess much surprise. Political sages judged justly when they said that Count Okuma should have resigned simultaneously with Count Itagaki. That would have been the best way to save the situation. Still there remained the supposition that the Progressists had a majority in the Lower House. They were out of power, indeed, but so were the Liberals, and if the former could have furnished a conclusive proof of the superior parliamentary strength they were believed to possess, they would have been virtually rehabilitated in popular esteem. When the day of trial came, however, the Progressists failed. They rallied all their forces to elect the President of the House of Representatives and they were beaten. Since that time not one ray of success has brightened their débâcle. Everybody supposed that they would strike a ringing note of challenge on the Government's shield after the dissolution of their great meeting at the Maple Club. They spoke and wrote as though they had been the victims of official arbitrariness and tyranny, but whether they knew that their case was not capable of defence, or whether they hesitated to invite another defeat, it is certain that they gave the impression of tamely submitting to a procedure which they were bound to attack in the Diet if they believed it to have been as improper as they themselves asserted. Then followed their fruitless agitation against the Land Tax, and then the disaffection of Messrs. Shimada Saburo and Taguchi Ukichi—a succession of reverses which seem to have shaken them seriously, for it is now calculated that a division in the Lower House would show their following diminished to 120. Their political campaign in the provinces has also given bad results. The northern districts are their stronghold; not the stronghold of the old Kaishin-to, Count Okuma's immediate followers, but the stronghold of the Shimpo section led by Mr. Kono Hiro-naka. Even there, however, they seem to have been beaten. In Awomori they are said to have collected 300 soshi, and Baron Suyematsu and his friends, repairing thither, were attacked with sticks and pelted with missiles which do not admit of refined definition. That triumph, if it can be called a triumph, being really a disgrace, is the only success the Progressists can claim, and it rests solely on the evidence of their own organs. Politically they have lost ground all along the line. Perhaps it is well, on the whole, that one party should possess largely preponderating strength just at present, but any permanent debilitation of the Progressists would be a national calamity, for their presence in the field is essential.

THE NIPPON YUSEN KAISHA'S SPECIAL SUBSIDY.

There seems to be much uncertainty, we regret to say, about the Nippon Yusen Kaisha's subsidy of 3½ million yen on account of its foreign services. The amount may be too large, for aught we know to the contrary, but that some subsidy should be granted scarcely admits of discussion. The subject is said to have come up for discussion at the Cabinet meeting on the 11th instant, and to have been postponed on two grounds; first the expediency of State aid for the Company's Seattle line is questionable, and, secondly, that in the present condition of the national finances such grants can not be made without the utmost circumspection. A little more delay on the Cabinet's part will, of course, put an end to all hope of passing any measure during the present session of the Diet. It would be a terrible fiasco if the Company had to abandon its European, American, and Australian services, to say nothing of the check that would thus be imposed on the development of Japan's mercantile marine; in other words, on the growth of her facilities of military transport. An idea now appears to be gaining vogue that Japanese steamers ought not to be placed, for choice, upon routes already occupied by foreign vessels. Thus the Toyo Kisen Kaisha is urged to give up its San Francisco service in favour of a service to South America. The pending emigration of 815 Japanese labourers to Peru seems to be at the root of that notion. But surely there is no tralad prospect justifying a line of steamers to any part of South America? Such a line would unquestionably need to be liberally aided by the State. The routes offering the best chances of remunerative employment are the routes to select, whether competitors have to be encountered or not.

THE TOKYO DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL SOCIETY.

The Tokyo Dramatic and Musical Society gave its first concert in the Shorei Kai on the 10th instant, the performance being for charitable purposes, as are all the Society's efforts. There was a good and appreciative audience, and the numbers were without exception excellently rendered. Several of those who kindly took part were heard for the first time in public in Tokyo, and they acquitted themselves in a manner that did much credit to the musical talents of such a limited community. Miss Dening's pure, full-toned soprano, Miss Divers' sweet, flexible notes, and Madame la Vicomtesse de Bondy's novel and delightful Swedish songs elicited hearty applause. Monsieur Braccialini was prevented by illness from singing, to the great disappointment of the audience, but a tenor of charming quality was revealed in Monsieur André, whom we hope to have many opportunities of hearing. Dr. Von Koeber's name appeared twice upon the programme. The audience utterly refused, however, to be satisfied with less than four pieces from its favourite, especially as the piano, kindly lent by Count Von Leyden, was not unworthy of the distinguished performer. There was a general reluctance on the part of the vocalists to respond to encores, the object doubtless being to conclude the concert in time for the Yokohama visitors to catch the last train, but Miss Divers and Monsieur André had to pay the penalty of the pleasure they afforded. Of the concerted pieces we need only say that they were played with the utmost precision. The Misses Perry are highly trained musicians, and they had able coöperators in Monsieur A. May and Monsieur Polianovsky. The following is the programme as given:—

PROGRAMME.

1. Duet. Czardas, (Hungarian dances),
Miss von Fallou.
Miss Schereschewsky.
2. Song. Winterlied Henning von Koss,
Miss Dening.
3. Quartette, Bocherini—
1st Violin Miss Perry.
2nd Violin Monsieur Polianovsky.
Viola Monsieur A. May.
Violoncello Miss E. Perry.

tesse de Bondy.
11. Violin Solo. Andante, Thomé, Monsieur A.
May.

THE DOKI CLUB.

There has been another club formed in Tokyo. Such institutions are very numerous, though the term "club" carries in Japanese practice a meaning very different from its English significance. The new institution seems to be intended to bring statesmen and business men together. Its promoters are Marquis Saigo, Count Itagaki, Baron Suyematsu, Baron Ozaki, Mr. Hasuda, Mr. Shibusawa, Mr. Amenomiya, &c. The head-quarters are at No 1, Himono-cho, Nihon-bashi.

STEAMSHIP SUBSIDIES.

IT has always been understood that the Government was prepared to grant a special subsidy to the Nippon Yusen Kaisha on account of its steamship services to foreign countries. In fact a bill in that sense was actually submitted to the Diet a year ago, but failed to come up for discussion; or was purposely held back by the committee appointed to examine it. If the principle of State aid to navigation be admitted at all, the Nippon Yusen Kaisha certainly seems entitled to special treatment, for the provisions of the Navigation Encouragement Law enacted in 1896 are not of such a nature as to warrant a company in investing a large sum for the establishment of lines which must be kept working for many years if they are to be at all successful. The present Cabinet is reported to have taken these points into careful consideration, and to have decided upon asking the Diet to make a special grant for a fixed term of years to the Nippon Yusen Kaisha on account of its European line. But it appears that the Toyo Kisen Kaisha has now come forward, and set up a claim that it has just as valid a title to public assistance as the Nippon Yusen Kaisha, and that, if the nature of its vessels be taken into account, it ought to be even more liberally encouraged than the older company. There is, of course, an obvious element of justice in such a claim. But we greatly doubt whether experts would rate the vessels of the Toyo Kisen Kaisha in a higher class than that occupied by the ships of the Nippon Yusen Kaisha. The chief difference between the two companies is one of a moral character, not a material. The Directors of the Nippon Yusen Kaisha were undoubtedly encouraged by the Government to start their European, American, and Australian services. Had they simply consulted the financial interests of the shareholders, they would never have embarked upon vast enterprises which, on the one hand, demanded a large outlay of capital, and, on the other, presented little prospect of commensurate profit. In order to furnish and equip steamers for these services, the shareholders had to abstain from pocketing several millions of yen which had been fairly earned by their vessels during the war. When that very praiseworthy and courageous sacrifice was made, every one understood clearly that the Directors of the Nippon Yusen Kaisha were actuated by considerations of a patriotic character and that they had the interests of the empire in view, not those of the company alone. We are not seeking to import any element of sentiment into a business transaction. Sentiment is out of the question. The whole matter rests on a most practical and intelligible basis. Japan must have a fleet of transports. To provide means of carrying her troops is just as important a part of her post bellum scheme of military expansion as is the provision of the troops themselves. Her army, as many of her publicists have justly pointed out, is her chief factor of potentiality for purposes of alliance with a Western State. A fleet can be placed in these waters without much difficulty, but no Occidental Power could supply, despatch, and maintain a strong military force for service on the East-Asian continent without straining its resources almost beyond endurance. Japan, on the other hand, has a quarter of a million of well-trained and well-equipped troops available at any moment for campaign purposes on the neighbouring continent. But could she carry them thither? Without means of transport her army might as well be non-existent. In recognition of that fact the ITO Cabinet, when it drafted the post-bellum programme in 1896, asked the Diet to pass laws for promoting navigation and ship-building. They consented, but the method of administering the laws has been such that one is led to suspect their administrators of altogether ignoring the true object of the legislation. Instead of applying the laws so that they should afford a maximum of encouragement to ship-builders and ship-owners, the great aim of the officials, in the beginning at any rate, was apparently to relieve the Treasury from all payments. A more intelligent spirit seems to have prevailed subsequently, but there is no denying that the necessity of providing mechanism for military transport receives at the hands of officials no serious recognition as compared with the expansion and organization of the army. The directors of the Nippon Yusen Kaisha have been more faithful to their national duty. They have procured ships at a heavy outlay, and placed them upon lines indicated by the Government as well as by public opinion. To us it appears that the duty of assisting them presses imperatively on the State so long as the scheme of military expansion is not abandoned. The position of the Toyo Kisen Kaisha presents itself in a somewhat different light. The Company's vessels would undoubtedly be useful for purposes of military transport, but the line upon which they have been placed offers an almost certain prospect of fine profits, and they have, moreover, been amalgamated with the fleet of two foreign companies plying on the same line. They are thus secured against foreign competition and practically assured of financial success. If the steamers of the P. M. S.S. and O. & O. S.S. Companies bring good dividends to their owners, as they have always done, then the steamers of their new partner, the Toyo Kisen Kaisha, must share their prosperity. The Toyo Kisen Kaisha, were it granted a special subsidy for the Yokohama-San-Francisco service, would have to dissolve its partnership with the two foreign companies or hand over to them a fair share of the subsidy. For these reasons it can not reasonably claim, we think, to be entitled to the same treatment as is accorded to the Nippon Yusen Kaisha. At all events, experience has proved that the Nippon Yusen Kaisha's European and American services can not be maintained at present without special State assistance. When the same fact has been established in the case of the Toyo Kisen Kaisha's San-Francisco service, it will be time enough to determine whether the Treasury should come to the rescue.

THE UNITED STATES AND THE PHILIPPINES.

SENATOR HOAR's action in the United States Senate suggests strange possibilities. He is a man of great influence, and is known to have the support of other prominent Senators in his opposition to the acquisition of the Philippines. The PRESIDENT, who favours annexation, recently offered the English mission to Mr. HOAR, and the latter's refusal to accept was rightly interpreted as an indication that he intended to fight the annexation project to the end. What lends special importance to the Senator's attitude is that a two-thirds' vote in the Senate is necessary for the ratification of a treaty, and although Mr. HOAR could scarcely hope for success if he sought—as is most unlikely—to procure the rejection of the Treaty en bloc, it is very conceivable that he might induce a body larger than one-third to vote for a modification in the sense, perhaps, of leaving the Philippines in Spain's hands provided that she gave some guarantee to institute a proper system of Government there. A precedent for such a course exists in the guarantee that Spain gave to Germany at the instance of the POPE. America would thus be relieved from paying 20 million dollars. The money itself is a bagatelle to her, but the intrusion of a pecuniary solatium places the bargain on a basis inviting objection. It is one thing to come into possession of foreign territory in the natural sequel of a victorious war. It is quite another thing to purchase territory in a remote region of the earth from a beaten foe. Any person desiring to object to the annexation of the Philippines can find plenty of reasons in support of his protest. But there is one tremendous consideration on the other side; namely, that the United States has paralysed Spain's capacity for governing the Philippines, and has created for AGUINALDO and his followers such an opportunity of developing force that his reconquest by Spain would be a stupendous undertaking, quite beyond her exhausted strength. Would Senator HOAR be prepared to employ the naval and military forces of the United States for the purpose of re-instating Spain in the Philippines; for the purpose of restoring her to the position she occupied before America interfered? That would appear to be the only logical course, for to ask Spain to give a guarantee of good Government must be either an obviously farcical subterfuge, or the prelude to a sanguinary and cruel war. America could not dictate to Spain the method of re-conquering the Philippines. A free hand would have to be left to the Government in Madrid, and it is not difficult to conceive what that would mean. It seems to us that America has gone too far to draw back. If she steps out of the arena now, she leaves it to be occupied at once by combatants who will fight to the death. She may have to do some fighting herself if she stands her ground, but if she abandons it she irrevocably condemns two other nations to fight until one is virtually exterminated or the other exhausted. At the beginning of the war and before Commodore DEWEY turned his ships towards Manila, we expressed our belief that the United States would not include the Philippines in the fighting area. That was because we did not then conceive the possibility of America's annexing the islands, and we saw that if, after destroying the Spanish foothold there, she refrained from annexation, terrible complications must ensue. We find it now difficult to imagine that the people of the United States will shrink from their obvious responsibility. The matter is one of great importance for Japan.

A CLOG-MAKING MACHINE.

Tokyo newspapers state that a German, whose name is given as Leopold, has invented a machine for making geta (clogs). It can be worked by one man and two children, and it turns out 300 pairs of geta daily. The first cost is 6,480 marks, and the expense of setting up a factory would be 1,250 marks, so that the whole initial outlay amounts to 7,730 marks, or about 3,714 yen. Putting the working expenses and interest at 2,500 yen annually, and assuming that there are 320 working days in the year, the machine produces 96,000 pairs of geta, at a cost of about 2½ sen per pair. We do not know whether the geta referred to are provided with loops. Probably they are, but, even supposing them to be without that appendage, there is still a fine margin of profit, since the cheapest geta sell in the market for 10 sen a pair.

IMPORTED WINES.

The French Tariff dispels the fear entertained at one time that the foreign resident would have to pay a long price for his wine owing to increased duties. Champagne will pass the Customs on payment of 1.55 yen per case, and claret will have to pay only 0.76 yen a case or 1.242 yen a hectolitre. Good champagne can scarcely be procured at less than 30 yen a case, so that the duty on it will be 5½ ad valorem; and after-dinner claret costing 24 yen dozen will escape with a payment of 3½ per cent.

PRINCE IWAKURA.

It has been stated that Marquis Ito's visit to Tokyo was prompted by political motives. In fact, Marquis Ito is such a power in Japanese politics that the public not unnaturally attaches significance to every move he makes. We believe, however, that the Marquis had no other purpose in returning to the capital than to pay his New-Year's respects at the Palace. The Asahi also attributes to him a desire to bring about a reconciliation between Viscount Tanaka, Minister of the Imperial Household, and Prince Iwakura. The Prince, as our readers know, has tendered his resignation, and persists in his desire to be relieved of office in spite of the Emperor's reluctance to grant his request. There have been various versions of the cause of difference between him and the Minister of the Household, but that there is a difference all are agreed, and Marquis Ito's efforts to compound it are said to have been unsuccessful thus far.

MARQUIS ITO ON CABINET RECONSTRUCTION.

Speaking to a member of the Nichi Nichi Shimbun's staff, Marquis Ito has expressed himself in a sense strongly opposed to any reconstruction of the Cabinet. He says, in effect, that an immense quantity of business presents itself to be discharged by any administration now in power, and that the only hope of accomplishing even a part of it is that the Cabinet should be left undisturbed. Ministries now-a-days are held in the maelstrom of political dissensions, so that it is impossible for them to turn their attention seriously to practical problems of either domestic or foreign affairs. The best interests of the State are suffering from these constant changes, this perpetual instability, and nothing is more essential than that the span of a Cabinet's life should be prolonged sufficiently for it to direct the progress of its own measures.

WORK OF THE INTERNATIONAL COMMITTEE.

The International Committee is evidently working earnestly and successfully to remove difficulties from the path of the Revised Treaties' operation. It has just circulated a document for which we are glad to assist in securing publicity:—

No. 13. Yokohama, 27th Dec., 1898.
The following letter has just been received and is circulated for your information:—

Foreign Office, Dec. 26th, 1898.

Dear Mr. ROBISON,—Having referred to the proper authorities the question raised in your note of the 10th inst., I beg to say in reply that, according to the amendment to the Business Law Tax, Foreign Insurance Companies, having their branch offices in Japan, are to pay the tax based only upon an estimated amount of capital employed by them in this Country—no matter whether the entire amount of their capital is registered or not; and that, in case of those who carry on Insurance business—not as branch offices but simply as Agents of such Companies—the tax is levied not upon the amount of Capital but upon the amount of Profit realized by them through such agencies.

Yours truly, (Signed) N. P. MITSUHASHI.
The International Committee are still endeavouring to obtain information as to the basis of calculation that will be adopted in estimating the amount of capital of branch offices of Insurance and Shipping Companies, who do not register any fixed amount of capital for use in Japan.

R. D. ROBISON, Chairman.

SPIRIT OF THE VERNACULAR PRESS.

The people of Japan do not comprehend their own condition or their own strength. The year upon which we are now entering will see this country take rank on an equal footing with the nations of Christendom. Yet the anti-foreign spirit has not entirely disappeared. An illustration of it is furnished by the proposal for a league of the yellow races. What is the purpose of such a league? It is simply an extension of the anti-foreign sentiment. Nations which find that singly they are not strong enough to hold the foreigner at arm's length, propose to unite their strength for that object. This, however, is an extreme illustration. The most serious phase of the question is that the people adopt a negative policy and maintain a passive attitude, allowing the national procedure to be shaped by alien influences, and that they seem to have no capacity for playing a positive part, or for striking out boldly on their own account and endeavouring to shape their destiny to their own advantage. Thus they speak of mixed residence as an inevitable outcome of Treaty Revision, regarding the advent of foreigners into their midst as a case of "what can not be cured must be endured." They ought, on the contrary, to count it an opportunity which, if utilized in a wise and liberal spirit, will inure to the great benefit of the country. The question of foreign capital is another instance of this strange mood. People talk as though the introduction of foreign capital were a contingency to be averted if possible. They would rather do without foreign capital if they could, but, as they can not, they are endeavouring to reconcile themselves to the necessity. They should be capable of appreciating that no real distinction of foreign and domestic applies to capital. It is a universal factor of wealth, to be obtained anywhere and everywhere under the easiest conditions. Nothing can be more unreasonable or narrow-minded than to attach an alien character to capital because it comes from abroad. Equally small-hearted and old-fashioned is the prejudice against foreign ownership of land. There is no conceivable defence of such a mood. The great need of the present generation of Japanese is that they should arrive at a clear conception of their own capacities and of the conditions existing in the world at large. (Finmin.)

It is understood that the Government talks of postponing until 1900 the transfer of prison expenditures to the charge of the Treasury. We can not endorse such a policy. This is a reform demanding immediate execution, and the responsibility of carrying it out rests with those in authority. Foreign newspapers speak in strong terms of the defective condition of Japanese provincial jails. They say that to be incarcerated in such places would be a hell upon earth. Their statements must be more or less discounted, but it can not be denied that there is room for criticism. The prisons of Japan need not be made precisely similar to those of Western countries. Since the manner of life of the peoples of the Occident and the Orient differs materially, their prison arrangements may justly differ to some extent. But the same consideration indicates that special provision should be made for the incarceration of foreigners in Japan. They can not be expected to endure the same system as the Japanese. Japan has taken a great deal of trouble to recast her laws so as to bring them into consonance with the principles of Western jurisprudence. It is claimed that the fullest attention has been paid to domestic usages and customs by the framers of the laws. That may be, but no one can doubt that the prime object of codification was to bring the country into line with Western civilization. Is it rational to stop short at the laws? Should not the prisons be similarly treated? Yet that is only a secondary consideration. The main point, the imperative argument, is that the system now pursued is not uniform. Prisoners are treated one way in one place and another way in another. The communes are unwilling to spend the necessary funds, and they will be more reluctant than ever now since they have to pay a higher Land Tax to the Central Government. Of course it is well understood that the action of the House of Representatives in cutting down the proposed increase of the Land Tax is the cause of the Government's inability to undertake this much-needed reform. Financial embarrassment was the reason of the transfer of the prison expenditures to the communes, and financial embarrassment is the reason of the Government's hesitation to undo that most injurious measure. But there is no financial embarrassment in reality. The Government has to devise means for making up the deficiency of revenue caused by the House's mutilation of the Land Tax Bill. It can easily take the opportunity to provide funds for the re-transfer of the prison expenditures to the Treasury.—(Fiji Shimpō.)

One of the great evils of the time is the granting of official positions as rewards for political services. An official is the nation's servant. He receives his pay from the nation, and the first thing to be considered in appointing him is whether he is competent to serve the nation properly. It is a flagrant abuse that administrative posts should be regarded as the perquisites of politicians. Unfortunately such a state of affairs is becoming habitual in Japan. And there are now symptoms that another epidemic of the office-hunting fever is about to break out. The Liberals are talking of claiming compensation for the services rendered by them in the Diet. Experience has shown what that means. Marquis Yamagata himself is not beyond reproach. He can not be entirely acquitted of suffering personal considerations to guide him in making appointments. There are some men now holding office by his nomination who never possessed the necessary qualifications, and have, at any rate, become too old to discharge their duties efficiently. That is a bad example. We should like to see it remedied by way of preliminary to drastic treatment of the office-hunting fever among politicians.—(Kokumin Shimbun.)

The state of affairs in Formosa may well cause grave anxiety. Dr. Goto, the Head of the Civil Administration, tells us that all is right; that the lenient measures adopted by the Government have been crowned with success; that the factors making for disorder have been removed in great part. On the other hand, the reports that reach us from the island indicate very different conditions. It is true that the Japanese newspapers issued there do not publish any particularly disquieting news. But the contents of their columns might be of quite another character had not the local government employed a sum of forty thousand yen for purposes of "pacification." We are not wholly dependent on the Japanese newspapers, however. We can learn something of the truth from the foreign journals of Hongkong and Shanghai. Never at any time since the cession of the island have the southern regions been in a state of greater disorder than they appear to be in at present. The facts ought to be recognised. It is of no use to blink them.—(Tokyo Asahi Shimbun.)

During the first ten years after the Restoration the country was ruled by a semi-despotic oligarchy. All power and all authority were in the hands of the central government. Then the people began to adopt measures of self-assertion. Political organizations sprang into existence. Their leaders were men of the Shōoku class, but the bulk of their followers were farmers. It thus happens that the influence of the agricultural element is now strong in politics. The merchants and manufacturers stood aloof in those days from all political movements. Their sole aim, above all in the case of the so-called "official merchants," was to curry favour with those in power. Thus it fell out that when the collision occurred between the official and the non-official classes, the traders did not figure in the field: no one took any account of them. But now they are beginning to raise their heads, and the prospect is very far from wholesome. Observe the figures that are prominent. Mr. Amenomiya, who had his palm well greased by a certain foreign firm in connexion with a loan of 40 million yen; Mr. Oye Taku, Mr. Takenouchi Tsuna, Mr. Inouye Kakugoro, Mr. Iwaya Matahei—when such men stand forward as the leaders of the business world and begin to go in and out among the corrupt elements of officialdom, is it not time for decent people to rise in protest? On the other side stand Viscount Tani and his crowd, who denounce the whole of the mercantile and manufacturing classes as share-jobbers, unscrupulous speculators, and so forth, and who do their best to stir up the people and make them discontented with taxes which are inevitable. In a word, the most prominent factors in the arena at present are political agitators who pander to the people's prejudices, and unprincipled politicians who, for the sake of personal profit, assume the name of business-men and in reality are pure schemers. Those that have the welfare of the country at heart should not sit with folded hands.—(Mainichi Shimbun.)

Politics present a curious aspect in Japan to-day. The so-called "great parties" are behaving like children. One calls itself Kensei-to and the other calls itself Kenseihon-to, and they are as keen about the ownership and the distinction of their titles as though some great principle were at stake. They fight about their sign-boards and care nothing about the wares within. For by whatever names they seek to differentiate themselves their policies are one and the same. It is mere child's play. As for the Progressists, they appear to have laid aside their old straightforward methods, and to have devoted themselves uniquely to currying favour with the land-owners. They are no longer the party that they once were. Politics, in truth, have fallen upon evil times, and the objects of political dispute are about as undignified as they could be.—(Mainichi Shimbun.)

Unfortunately the share-speculators appear to be making their influence felt among the Liberals. The talk of the State-purchase of private railways grows louder every day. But what better is to be expected? The practice of politics to-day seems to have been reduced to the art of trucking. Men no longer possess the courage of their opinions. What is to be said of the Liberal Leader who made a sacrifice in his own private life in order to soften the effects of his official action? In his capacity of Minister of State for Home Affairs he removed the Buddhist chaplains from Sugamo Prison, and then, finding that he had offended the Buddhists, he had a Buddhist funeral service performed for his father, who had been buried years ago according to the Shinto ritual. To face every way in turn is now regarded as the way to succeed.—(Mainichi Shimbun.)

A much to be desired reform is that the nobles should return to the provincial districts where they once resided. There is no longer a territorial nobility in Japan. All the peers, with very few exceptions, live in the great cities, principally Tokyo. They do not seem to recognise that they have duties to perform to the provinces from which their ancestors derived their revenues and to which they themselves owe their titles. The pattern nobles of the world are the English peers, who live on their estates in the provinces, and devote much of their time and wealth to promoting local progress and furthering local interests. Count Inouye, recognising the importance of this principle, has induced Prince Mori to make Mitajiri his head-quarters, and Count Tachibana has followed the good example by settling at Yanagawa. Now that railway communication exists everywhere, living in the provinces has ceased to be banishment. One can get to Tokyo at any moment. Titled men and men of wealth ought to take these points into consideration, remembering that the concentration of all the rich and noble elements of Society in the capital is neither morally nor economically fair to the provinces.—(Kokumin Shimbun.)

EMIGRATION TO PERU.

There appears to be a prospect of Japanese emigration to Peru on a considerable scale. Tokyo journals state that the Morioka Emigration Company has concluded a contract with a firm in that country for the supply of 815 farm labourers, at a monthly salary of 25 silver dollars for each adult; that the approval of the Government at Lima has been obtained, and that the emigrants will start in a few weeks.

The death is announced of Sir William Anderson, Director-General of the Royal Ordnance factories.

CABINET RECONSTRUCTION.

The talk of Cabinet reconstruction is growing less audible. Mr. Hoshi Toru, the Ministry-maker of the moment, is said to have lowered his lance and quietly taken a back seat. He sees that to force the issue just now would involve collision with men where sympathies he does not desire to alienate, so he will bide his time. Another and more intelligible interpretation of his quiescence is that neither Marquis Ito nor Marquis Saigo can be persuaded to raise a hand in favour of the reconstruction idea, and Mr. Hoshi is much too sensible to imagine that the day for unalloyed party cabinets has already dawned. He understands the absolute necessity of the Meiji statesmen's co-operation, and will not attempt to stand without it. We must say that all these explanations seem to us somewhat superfluous, for we do not believe that the immediate reconstruction of the Cabinet was on the tapis. Whatever may happen after the Diet rises—and we think it exceedingly probable that something will then happen—there can not have been any serious project of disturbing the Cabinet while it is in the very midst of absolutely indispensable legislation.

FRANCE AND JAPAN.

PETITION TO THE PARIS GOVERNMENT.

"In view of the new Treaty between France and Japan," says the London and China Express, "the French residents in the latter country have drawn up a memorial, signed by all Frenchmen in Tokyo and Yokohama, which has been sent to the French Minister for transmission to the home Government. The document left by the mail on Oct. 12th and recently came to hand.

"In this memorial the authors draw the attention of the Government and of the public at large to the injustice which they allege is likely to follow the new Treaty between France and Japan.

"The exordium of the Petition states:—The undersigned, French residents in Yokohama, beg the French Minister to transmit to the French Government the following wishes:—

(1.) That the clauses of the Treaty between France and Japan be defined with exactness, and that the rights which are conferred by the said clauses to the French residents be guaranteed to them in an effective manner, especially in what concerns: (a) the leases at long period for lands and buildings; (b) the exercise of the profession of agriculturist and of journalist; (c) the protection of literary as well as industrial property.

(2.) That the promise made by the Japanese Government to grant to foreigners the right to possess the soil be realised as soon as possible.

"The objections raised by the signatories to the petition are based on the fact that the new Treaty should not take effect before a year had elapsed after the new codes, both civil and commercial, had been in existence, whereas the Japan Government wishes not only to forego that condition, but to advance to July 17, 1899, the date which was originally fixed for Aug. 4.

"It is said that, the Civil Code only having been promulgated, and the commercial one not being even yet submitted to the Diet, the conditions of the Treaty are not adhered to, and, therefore, in presence of the faithlessness of the Japanese Government, no reliance can be placed on the different promises contained in the Treaty, one of them reading as follows:—

French residents in Japan shall have the faculty to exercise on their property, urban and rural, all the rights other than of ownership: notably to rent them even by long leaseholds (ninety-nine years).

Every liberty—individual, domiciliary, and conscientious—including the liberty of practising privately or publicly their own religion, is "entirely guaranteed" to French subjects.

"The petition passes in review the different clauses of the Treaty, and also the comments which were passed thereon when it was submitted to the French Parliament for ratification. It tends to show that the Japanese Government can at present, and without any difficulty, grant to foreigners the right of possession to the soil, i.e., freehold; and that that concession will be to the interest of foreigners, but even more so to the Japanese. It also points out that through the want of capital the trade of Japan, both commercial and industrial, is stopped—foreign capital cannot come in the help of local private undertakings, unless full guarantees are given. At the present time these guarantees are worthless since the civil code admits mortgage on real estate only—mortgage on built-upings is simply a snare, since the soil on which they stand cannot be acquired. Therefore it follows that so long as the right of possession to the soil is withheld from foreigners, the capital which the latter could bring to further the development of Japanese commerce and prosperity will also be withheld. The most influential class of people—namely, business people—are in favour of the immediate performance of the promises made by the Government, for they fully realise that besides their own position the working classes would also benefit largely by the introduction of foreign capital with all the advantages to be derived therefrom."

It is interesting to see that, in spite of the very explicit interpretation which has been given to the Franco-Japanese Treaty by English commentators, as conferring on foreigners the right of engaging in journalistic enterprise in Japan, French citizens do not take that view of it. In the memorial from which quotations are given above, they ask to have a clear definition as to the right of exercising the professions of agriculture and journalism. It is easy to understand the perplexity attaching to this question in the eyes of the memorialists, for in France foreigners are not allowed to become editors or proprietors of newspapers, and one of France's treaties with a foreign country, though couched in language almost identical with that of the Franco-Japanese Revised Treaty, has not been interpreted as conferring upon French citizens the privilege of engaging in journalistic enterprise in that country. It is natural, therefore, that the French should feel uncertain whether, under a treaty reciprocal in spirit, they can claim for themselves privileges which they are not prepared to grant to others. Happily the question has now been finally disposed of by Japan's legislative action. She has enacted a law throwing open the profession of journalism to foreigners, thus showing herself more liberal than some of those who find fault with her conservatism.

A great deal of stress is laid by the memorialists on the question of land tenure. Since we are entirely at one with them as to the importance, in the interests not less of foreigners than of Japan herself, of removing all restrictions upon the ownership of land by aliens, we are unwilling to say anything which might weaken the cause pleaded by the memorialists. Still it is impossible not to regret their failure to avoid inaccuracies. They claim that the Japanese Government has promised to grant to foreigners "the right to possess the soil," and they quote the Treaty as conferring the right of ninety-nine years leases. There is no evidence of any such promise, nor does the Treaty contain any such provision.

We have not seen the original of the memorial, and can not therefore be sure that the epitome published by the London and China Express conveys accurately the ideas of the memorialists. Last autumn, the same Journal published an epitome of the Kobe Memorial, and represented the memorialists as entirely ignoring the important provision with regard to superficies contained in the Civil Code, whereas the point had been duly noted in the memorial. It is possible that the signatories of the French memorial are similarly misrepresented. For we can scarcely conceive that they would have fallen into such an error as that attributed to them with regard to the Codes. They appear to have charged the Japanese Government with bad faith and failure to adhere to the conditions of the Treaty, on the ground that the Civil Code only has been promulgated, the Commercial Code not having yet been even submitted to the Diet. Is it possible that the memorialists are ignorant that the greater part of the Commercial Code has been in operation since July 1st, 1894, and that the remainder was promulgated in 1890. In point of fact the remaining portions of the Commercial Code went into force 1st July, and the law now awaiting the Diet's approval is a revised Commercial Code concerning which no pledge of any kind is contained in the Treaty, and which has nothing whatever to do with Treaty Revision. So far as the Codes are concerned the Japanese Government has fulfilled all the obligations undertaken by it, and we find it astonishing that, without first assuring themselves of the validity of their proofs, a body of serious men of business should publicly formulate accusations of bad faith against the Government of the country in which they are residing. However, it must be confessed that the British residents of Kobe set a pernicious example in this respect, though they, at any rate, had a case which lent some colour to their charges. The mischief of these tactless and unfounded denunciations is that they offend instead of convincing. Fortunately the prejudice against foreign ownership of land is beginning to lose force in Japan, but its disappearance will not be promoted by unwarrantable attempts to fix upon the Japanese Government promises which were never made.

IMPERIAL DIET.

MONDAY, JAN. 9TH.

HOUSE OF PEERS.

The House met at 10.15 a.m., and proceeded to fix a limit of time for the Budget Committee's examination of the General and Supplementary Budgets for 1899-1900. On the motion of Viscount Yuri, as amended by Mr. Kaneko Kentaro, it was decided that the Committee must present its report by January 31st, provided that it had in the meanwhile received the Government's Bill for making good the deficiency of revenue caused by the reduction of the proposed rate of Land Tax.

QUARANTINE MEASURES.

A Government Bill relating to Medical Inspection of vessels coming from foreign ports was then read and handed to a Special Committee. Under the provisions of the present Law for the Prevention of Contagious Diseases, measures for medical inspection can be taken in the case of plague and cholera. There are, however, other diseases calling for similar precautions, especially small-pox. The Bill provides for the extension of the list. Further, it has been found in practice that where Medical Inspection is inaugurated to meet special emergencies only, its success is a matter of chance. It happened fortunately last year that the system was in operation when the pest broke out in China, and effective measures could thus be taken in good time. But in 1896, cholera found its way into the country before the imminence of the danger was recognised, and consequently before precautions could be adopted, the result being that 55,000 lives were sacrificed. It is, in short, quite plain that with a neighbour like China, where the most terrible epidemics may have been raging for some time before the outside world learns anything about them, measures of prevention, to be effective, must be perpetual. The Bill provides, therefore, that the system of Medical Inspection may be made continuous with regard to certain places in Southern China and Formosa, and that the necessary regulations for the detailed working of the system shall be enacted by Local Authorities.

VACCINATION.

The next Bill contained amendments of the Vaccination Regulations issued in 1885. It has been found in practice that these Regulations are not sufficiently definite and imperative. Since the establishment, in 1896, of official stations for the preparation of vaccine lymph, an abundant supply is always obtainable, and, instead of requiring applicants for lymph to send 3 sen worth of postage stamps, the Government now proposes to distribute the lymph freely, and farther to re-cast the regulations so as to provide for regular and occasional vaccination. Under the former heading the project is to enact that a child must be vaccinated within ten months of its birth, and that, if the vaccination does not take, it must be repeated within a period of 6 months, and yet again within a similar period if it be again unsuccessful. Further, all children must be re-vaccinated at the age of six and once more at the age of twelve. Thereafter vaccination becomes occasional, and may be declared compulsory at any time of threatened or actual epidemic, the power to order it being vested in Local Governors.

This Bill elicited many questions, and was finally handed to the Special Committee charged with the duty of examining the Medical Inspection Bill.

AN AMENDING LAW.

A Government Bill was then read and handed to a Special Committee, for amending the system of security in connexion with suits at law, so as to bring it into conformity with the Revised Civil and Commercial Codes.

PARCELS POST.

The next Bill on the Order was a Government measure for changing the Parcel Post Regulations. It is now provided that parcels sent through the post must not measure more than 1 foot 2 inches in length by 8 inches in width and 5 inches in thickness. Within these limits specially cheap rates are allowed for parcels containing agricultural samples, seed, cuttings, roots, and so on. Now it happens that from time immemorial the larger variety of silk-worm's-egg cards measure 1 foot 1.7 inches by from 7.4 to 7.5 in width. It is impossible to pack such cards so that they shall conform to the dimensions prescribed by present Regulations without subjecting them to pressure which is found highly injurious to the eggs. Hence the proposal is to increase the limits of size to 1 foot 3 inches in length by 8½ inches in breadth. Another projected reform is to raise the limit for post-office orders from 30 yen to 50 yen, the former figure not being compatible with the financial conditions of the time. The Bill was handed to a Special Committee, after it had been explained by Viscount Yoshikawa, Minister of State for Home Affairs.

INCREASING TARIFF DUES.

The Bill sent up from the Lower House for amending the Statutory Tariff and the Supplementary Table of Import Dues, was placed in the hands of a Special Committee. Tobacco, sake, and alcohol are the staples referred to in the Bill. The proposal is to raise the import duty on alcohol to 250 per cent., and the duties on cigars, cigarettes, cut tobacco, refined sake and all distilled liquors to from 80 to 100 per cent.

A PETITION.

The House then proceeded to discuss an Election Petition presented by Mr. Muramatsu Shuhei, a member elected by the Highest Tax-payers in Ibaraki Prefecture. At the time of the election in 1897, the petitioner and Mr. Asano Yoshihiro had polled an equal number of votes, and the election had been regarded as favourable to the former on the score of his seniority in age. It was subsequently discovered, however, that one of the tax-payers voting had not been qualified to exercise the franchise, and since his vote had been cast for Mr. Muramatsu, the latter's rival, Mr. Asano, had been given the seat. Against that decision Mr. Muramatsu appealed to the House. He claimed that the election had been invalid ab initio, since the law provided that the representatives of the highest tax-payers should be elected by the 15 highest tax-payers in each prefecture, whereas, one having been declared disqualified in Ibaraki Prefecture, only fourteen could be said to have taken part in the election. The Special Committee to whom this petition had been handed for examination reported in the sense of the petitioner's contention, though a large minority of the Committee took a different view.

A long debate ensued, but the House finally endorsed the Committee's report, and declared that the election must be held again.

The House rose at 4.45 p.m.

TONIC SOL-FA SOCIETY.

On Monday afternoon, at 142A Bluff, the members of the Juvenile Tonic Solfa Choral Society of Yokohama presented Miss Bloxham with an address requesting her acceptance of a cherry-lacquer cabinet, as a slight token of their sense of the great obligations the Society is under for her valuable assistance in their Choral Practice; and at the same time another presentation was made to Miss Emily Jarman, of a ring composed of Australian opals, accompanied by a prettily designed and artistically executed address painted by Miss Minnie Schwabe. In a few words explanatory of the last presentation, the President, Mrs. Patton, stated that the member who was now retiring from the Society in consequence of a recent family bereavement, had not only been a valuable and constant attendant for seven years, but had also been for some time the only connecting link between the past and present members, as she was the last remaining member of the original Society as formed in October, 1891. Mrs. Patton then read a list of no fewer than 91 names well-known to those present who as young people had belonged to the Choir and had passed from it during that period, most of whom are now dispersed in various parts of the world, or, if still in Yokohama, are now young men and women no longer eligible for a juvenile choir. The Choral Society now numbers 24, many of whom were mere infants when it was originally formed. In a few brief but suitable words, the recipients of the presentations thanked the members for their tokens of regard, and the opportunity was then taken by Mrs. Patton of distributing prizes to the most deserving pupils of the Yokohama School of Music, the prize winners being as follows:—For Music (all subjects)—Miss Clara Schwabe 1st Prize. Special ditto—Master Bugbird. Piano forte 1st (divided)—Misses Merriman and Flora Diack. Special ditto—Misses Evelyn Gillett and Winnie Mitchell. Harmony and Theory of Music—Miss Carol Merriman. Tonic Sol-fa singing—Miss Adèle Favre-Brandt and Master Ewen Steele, 1st Prize (divided); 2nd prizes ditto Misses Rosie Vivanti, Rosie Aparc, and Doris Fearon. Special Prize, Master John Pender Mollison.

General Sung Ching and the bulk of his forces arrived at Shanhaikuan from North Kichon on the 30th ultimo. General Sung's troops will garrison the eastern approaches to Shanhaikuan and General Tung Fu-hsiang's the western.

THE BOOKSHELF.

The Red Axe, by S. R. Crockett: Macmillan's Colonial Library. Yokohama, Messrs. KELLY and WALSH, Ltd.

MR. CROCKETT has a passionate admiration for robust young men. His heroes are always of that pleasant age when the young blood begins to leave the callowness of hobble-dehoy-hood behind it and prepares to battle with the sterner world that lies beyond the playing-fields of school-time; and also is ready to "sigh for the love of a lady." And therein lies Crockett's besetting fault—his monotony of characterization. Be the scene of his story the barren hills of Ayr or the far barren wilds of the coast that frets the Baltic Sea, the hero is always cast in the same moral, intellectual, physical, and ethical mould: there is no change in the fashion of his utterance, and therefore no change in the manner of his love-making and its eventual result: while the heroine is always a pale phantom.

In the Red Axe, the reader is taken to a medieval town in the Baltic provinces dominated by a Duke whose delight it is to rieve and burn, ravish and destroy the districts immediately adjoining, and afterwards to cast such of his victims as reach the Castle of the Wolfberg alive, to be devoured of bloodhounds. This Duke Casimir has an Hereditary Justicer, one Gottfried Gottfried, who has to carry out all the death-sentences of the Wolfmark. His badge of office was "that famous red handled, red-bladed axe, the gleaming white of whose deadly edged had never been wet save with the blood of men and women." The "Red Axe," as he was called, was also always habited in red from head to foot when discharging the duties of his dread office. Gottfried had a son named Hugo, who must succeed him at his death. One day Duke Casimir raided the adjoining principality of Plassenburg and carried away its ruler and the latter's infant daughter. By the kindly interposition of Hugo the child was saved from the bloodhounds' ravenous maw, and the story, as may easily be guessed, concerns the after adventures of Hugo, the Little Playmate—as he calls the child—the terrible Duke, and his even more terrible Red Axe. Before the Little Playmate comes by her own again and Hugo succeeds to his hereditary office, many doughty deeds are done in Court and camp, temptations great and sore assail the lad, and grievous calamities befall the maiden—the story would not be Crockett's if it were not full of stir and turmoil—but eventually all things come about as the most sanguine admirers of the hero and heroine can desire: evil is trampled down beneath the feet, coming by its proper reward, and virtue triumphs—as it always should, though sometimes it doesn't in real life.

The Red Axe is a healthy story, well-told, and despite the mannerisms inseparable from its writer, is well worth the hour or so required for its reading.

Feudal and Modern Japan. By Arthur May Knapp: London, Duckworth & Co.

THIS is what the Athenaeum has to say concerning this work:—A brief notice of these two daintily got-up and prettily illustrated volumes is all that is necessary. They show some literary ability, but no research or originality. The monotonous beat of the Japanese drum—of which the Japanese themselves are getting tired—is echoed from every page. Japan is "the one country in the world which does not disappoint . . . it is unquestionably the unique nation of the globe, the land of dream and enchantment, the land which could hardly differ more from our own were it located in another planet, its people not of this world." All this stuff is the mere parrot-like repetition of Lafcadio Hearn, the Brito-Corfu-American, who now finds salvation as a naturalized Japanese under the name of Koizumi Yakumo. The truth is, the more intimately we know the Japanese, the more we find them like other folk, though they play their parts upon a different stage and with the help of a different set of properties, which are being daily and rapidly replaced by those of the West. A test of a writer's real knowledge of "things Japanese" is his treatment of Shinto. Judged by this test, the author must be pronounced untrustworthy. His account of the "Way of the Gods" is a description of what it is not, not of what it is. What it is may be gathered quite clearly from the "Kojiki," or ancient annals, translated long since by Mr. Chamberlain, and from the essays of Sir E. Satow, based upon the works of Mabuchi, Motoori, and the other Shinto revivalists of the end of the century and the earlier half of the last century and the earlier half of the present one. Shinto might have become a religious and ethical system, but its development was arrested by Sinicization and Buddhism, naturalism and fetishism, mingled at a later period with imported ancestor-worship and Taoism. Shinto is nothing and has produced nothing—ex nihilo nihil fit; its modern developments are eclectic jumbles which have lost the one charm of Shinto—its simplicity.

After all, the soul of a nation is to be found in its literature, and the literature of Japan, which now has the respectable antiquity of about a thousand years, can scarcely be accorded the rank of a second class among the literatures of the world. It has not produced a line of poetry worth remembering, nor a doctrine, religious, philosophical, or political, worth consideration. In the mediæval romances some dainty and delicate work is to be found, and in the novelists of the closing years of the Shogunate the scenes of social life are often vividly enough portrayed, while occasionally philosophical views of some depth are to be met with in the later histories. But the growth of Japanese thought and imagination—like that of Shinto—was arrested by Chinese influences centuries ago; and what does seem characteristic of the Japanese mind, its lack of originality, has prevented it from even attempting to shake off the yoke. In art Japan has been more successful; it borrowed from China, Japanese art has progressed through the superior craftsmanship of the Japanese, and must be admitted to have reached during the last seventy or eighty years of the Shogunate (1770-1850) a higher point of excellence than the Middle Kingdom ever achieved.

One word more. Under the extravagances of Mr. Hearn and the author of these volumes there does lie a certain amount of truth, but in relation to old, not to new Japan. Old Japan, to the foreign observer, who saw only the externalities of the time, did, in fact, often appear a paradise—not on account of its scenery (which, after all, is inferior to that of many parts of China, and is not to be compared with that of Switzerland and Italy, appearing, as it does, more beautiful than it really is to the weary traveller across the Pacific or enfeebled visitors from the Chinese treaty ports), but rather on account of its social aspects, the sort of graduated order and distinctions of caste, ceremonial, and dress, the quaint pageantry, and the harmony in colour, form, habits, and modes of life within each class of society. To the Japanese observer, the Samurai class in especial, who saw society from within, the case was far otherwise; he groaned under an inflexible, many-graded tyranny more searching perhaps than that of any other system known to history, and absolutely merciless in its application. And it was the Samurai class, not the people of Japan, who made the revolution of 1868; the same class maintains and profits by its results.

A Shanghai mandarin on Jan. 4th received the following telegram from Peking:—"It is reliably stated that the Empress Dowager intends soon to send Kang Yi, President of the Board of Punishments, to inspect the Imperial armies, old and newly-raised, encamped outside Peking and in Chihli province. After this function Kang Yi will probably be appointed Viceroy or Governor of some province at a distance from the capital."

FANCY DRESS BALL.

The fancy dress ball given in aid of the funds of Christ Church at the Public Hall on Friday evening was in every way a success. There was a crowded attendance, and the programme was of the most enjoyable character. The hall had been charmingly decorated with greenery and bunting, and the stage end was daintily fitted up as a drawing-room, while the men's lounge was upstairs, and supper was served in the green-room. A large proportion of the dancers were in character and the scene during the dancing was extremely animated. There was perhaps, a little lack of originality in the ideas, but as fancy dress balls have probably been given at frequent intervals ever since the Flood, all the good ideas must necessarily have been used up before now, and little scope is left for the modern invention. China and Japan were pretty well represented among the men, the aristocratic samurai dressed to kill, and the guileless Ah Sin, in a pigtail sufficient to arouse the envy of any Celestial, being duplicated a good many times. Two ladies only demonstrated how charming Japanese costume can be made under proper circumstances, but it looked oddly incongruous to see an aquiline nose and sharply cut features, as in the case of some of the men, beneath a Chinese headdress. A stately Bedouin, too clean for real life, was one of the best makes-up. There were of course Dr. Jims, or people who looked like Dr. Jim, or, again, people who may have fancied they looked like Dr. Jim—for we have noticed that Dr. Jim is a most elastic character, and all kinds of costumes do for him. It is something like the case of Artemus Ward's "wax statoids." "Mebbe it's like the Prince of Wales; mebbe it ain't like the Prince of Wales. I calls it the Prince of Wales; you may call it what you darn please." There were Vivandières who would add immensely to the popularity of the Service if they could be induced to join the colours, so charming did they look. There were jockeys, bandits, ladies of the 18th century, mysterious Scotch characters, a Hongkong Sikh Policeman, Turks (who, however, conducted themselves quite like Christians), gentlemen in Court dress, and a host of nondescripts who might have represented anybody, from Cæsar Borgia to John Wesley.

Dancing commenced at nine o'clock, and was kept up with spirit till the small hours. The Town Band supplied the music. The programme was as follows:—

PRESENTATION TO DR. WHEELER.

The children's fancy dress ball on Saturday afternoon was a most pretty spectacle—almost more pleasing than that of the night before. A very large number of boys and girls attended in costume, and many of the characters were capably represented. To describe them would require a considerable expenditure of space, there were so many capital ideas and pretty costumes. Suffice it to say that the dance was one of the prettiest seen in Yokohama for a long time, and was greatly enjoyed both by the youngsters and by the many oldsters who looked in during the afternoon.

Opportunity was taken to make a presentation on behalf of the children to Dr. Wheeler who, amid the congratulations and good wishes of the whole community, has just celebrated his silver wedding. There was something unique in the idea, for nearly all, if not all, of the young people who subscribed, had been known by the genial doctor from the very beginning of their lives—before, in fact, they could form a clear estimate of his many virtues, or, indeed, of any other matter in the world beyond the necessity for a vigorous squall. A subscription among the little folks ushered into the world by the kindly doctor realised a satisfactory amount, and Mr. J. P. Mollison on Saturday afternoon had the satisfaction of presenting Dr. Wheeler, in the name of the youngsters, with a handsome silver claret jug and a stand of artificial flowers. In making the presentation Mr. Mollison said:—

"On behalf of the children around you, and of many who are not present to-day, I have been invited to ask your acceptance of this little souvenir of your Silver Wedding day, and need hardly say that I gladly assume the position of spokesman for the little ones, on this happy occasion."

Ladies and gentlemen, it has been my privilege and good fortune to have enjoyed the friendship of Dr. and Mrs. Wheeler all through their married life, now so happily culminating to-day in their silver wedding, and, therefore, no one in Yokohama knows better,—no one is better able to judge, and no one could be more willing to testify than I am, to the big kindly heart that beats in the Doctor's breast, or to the wide-spread and overflowing sympathy he possesses and shows for everyone around him.

Who amongst us does not know Dr. Wheeler's cheery "Good Morning," with his genial smile and assuring word that has brought comfort to many an anxious mother? Not one! And who amongst us does not love him for all he has done for us? Again not one! What is more, the children all love him and welcome his visits, even when they mean anything but pleasure perhaps, to them, dear little mites. And so in their gratitude they have all combined to give the good Doctor this little remembrance of his Silver Wedding Day.

We parents, too, are glad to have this opportunity of showing our affection and esteem for the Doctor, and especially glad to be able to do so through our children, and with our children around us. That he may long be spared to this community is the heartfelt wish of us all. With these few words, Dr. Wheeler, too few perhaps for the occasion, but such as they are, from the heart, on behalf of the little ones, I ask your acceptance of this little gift, and wish from my heart all health and happiness to you and yours."

Dr. Wheeler briefly returned thanks, and the ceremony concluded with three cheers.

THE ECONOMIC SITUATION AT THE END OF 1898.

CIRCULATION OF MONEY.—The amount of loans issued by the Bank of Japan up to the 28th December last reached, according to the Kokumin, 76 million yen, and the issue of notes above the legal limit amounted to 13 millions. It was presumed that the ordinary loans and the over-issue of notes would exceed 80 millions and 17 millions respectively by the end of the year. Compared with 1897 the figures come out as follows:—

	Loans to private individuals. YEN.	Issue above legal limit. YEN.
At the end of the 31st fiscal year	80,000,000	17,000,000
At the end of the 30th fiscal year	105,000,000	47,000,000
Decrease in 31st year	25,000,000	30,000,000

Although the general depression of trade which has brought about the diminution in the demand for capital has certainly contributed to a reduction in the Bank's loans and over-issue, the direct cause of decrease seems to have been the purchase by Government of public loan bonds to the amount of 35 million yen.

The diminution in demand for capital has tended to bring about a fall in the rates of interest. By comparing the rates on loans and discounted bills issued by the Bank of Japan at the end of last year with those for the corresponding term of 1897, the following results are obtained:—

	Daily interest on loans in 1898.	Rate of discount at the Bank in 1898.	The same at other Banks in 1898.
At the end of the 31st fiscal year	2½	2.3	2½
At the end of the 30th fiscal year	2.3	2	2.3
Decrease	0.2	0.2	0.2

The rate of interest among private individuals in Tokyo was as follows:—

	For loans.		For discounted bills.
	Maximum.	Minimum.	Maximum.	Minimum.
	1898.	1897.	1898.	1897.
At the end of 1898	3.00	2.8	2.9	2.7
At the end 1897	3.3	2.9	3.14	2.77
Decrease	0.3	0.1	0.24	0.07

With reference to the actual condition of the money market in different localities, it may be stated that serious slackness is noticeable in Osaka, where the amount of loans from the Nippon Ginko has decreased by 13 million yen, as compared with 1897. Next comes Tokyo, with a decrease of 10 millions, and the loans issued by the Bank's branch office in Kyoto have diminished by 2 millions. The latest report from Osaka announces that while considerable funds were in the hands of the various banks at the end of last year, deposits have steadily increased, the daily interest on them being 2 1 or 2 2 sen.

The rate of 2.3 or 2.4 sen was common in transactions with the Bank, the standard rate of interest fixed by the Osaka Bankers' Assembly Hall at present being 2 6 sen. Compared with the rate adopted in Tokyo, the figure shows a reduction of 2 or 3 rin.

Despite the relaxation of the money market in the various localities, pressure is still felt in certain districts. It is alleged that the Yokohama Settlement suffers in present from scarcity of capital for the purchase of exchange bills. Quotations therefore have risen considerably. Below are the comparative figures.—

	Former	price.	Current	Rise.
Telegraphic remittances...	$49 125	$48 500	$0 375
Bills saleable on arrival...	$49 250	$49 625	$0 375
Bills purchasable at sight...	$49 375	$50 000	$0 625
Bills payable one month's sight	$49 625	$50 250	$0 625
Bills payable at 4 months'
sight	$50 375	$51 000	$0 625

Measures are now being taken by the branch of the Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation to secure from its head office a supply of funds so urgently needed. The power of supplying capital being so limited in the Foreign Settlement, export merchants to whom the purchase of exchange bills was refused by a foreign bank had necessarily to rely upon the Specie Bank for a loan, the result being an increase of bills discounted by the Nippon Ginko to the amount of 7 million yen up to the 24th December last. Compared with the corresponding term of last year the figures stand thus:—

December 24, 1898	yen	1,322,988
December 25, 1897		7,925,718
Increase in comparison		3,397,270

The increase for the year before last seems to have amounted to 2½ million yen, but the increase for last year was supposed to be no less than 3 millions.

STOCK MARKET—The actual condition of the money market being such as described above, the appreciation of various shares was, to some extent, inevitable. The following comparative table shows the quotations of shares at the end of last year and at the end of 1897:—

Shares.	Dec. 27, 1897.	Dec. 27, 1898.	Increase of 1898.
	yen	yen	yen
Sanyo Railway	46.60	55.50	+ 8.90
Kwansei Railway	52.40	50.90	- 1.50
Kiushiu Railway	52.90	68.00	+ 15.10
Coal Mining and Railway	92.90	88.10	- 4.80

Kwansei and Coal Mining and Railway shares have fallen in value to a certain extent, but the depreciation of these shares seems to have arisen from special circumstances, other shares showing an appreciation from 5 to 32 yen. As regards the tendency of foreign trade, it may be noticed that imports were again in excess during the first half of December last. But things have now assumed a different aspect, and it may confidently be assumed that the balance in future will be in favour of exports, and that simultaneously with the inflow of funds from abroad shares in general will rise in value.

RICE.—The value of rice, which in one time had so extravagantly risen, has now begun to fall steadily in view of the successful crop. The fall in value at present is alleged to have reached 7 or 8 yen on the average. Below are the comparative figures:—

Rice.	1898.	1897.	Fall in price.
	Yen.	Yen.	Yen.
Super-fine	9.80	14.00	4.20
Medium	9.35	13.70	4.35
Inferior	8.85	12.99	4.14
Average	9.33	13.76	4.43

Rice for time bargains (to be delivered in February) was quoted at 9 20 yen at the end of last year, whereas the quotation at the corresponding period of the year before last was 11 92 yen, the fall being 2 68 yen. As for retail prices quotations stood thus:—

Rice.	At the end of 1897.	Corresponding period of 1898.	Fall in value.
	Sho.	Sho.	Sho.
1st class	7.1	4.9	2.2
2nd "	7.4	5.1	2.3
3rd "	7.8	5.3	2.5
4th "	8.2	5.7	2.5
5th "	8.6	6.1	2.5

Thus a fall of from 2.2 to 2.5 sho is noticeable in each class.

OTHER COMMODITIES.—Under this heading the following comparative prices may be given:—

Rice.	At the end of 1897.	Corresponding period of 1898.	Fall in value.
	Yen.	Yen.	Yen.
Cotton Yarns	79.60	83.20	3.60
Salt	2.34	6.80	4.46
Barley	4	6.67	2.67
Raw Silk	90.50	88.90	1.60

KOREAN NEWS.

From the Independent we learn that on the 19th inst. a petition signed by thirty-three men was sent into the Palace, begging His Majesty to pardon Pak Yongho and to give him some influential position in the Government. How unwelcome this suggestion was to the Emperor may be seen in the following Edict of the 22nd inst:—

That the crime of a refugee (political) cannot be pardoned is a matter of our established law. We are informed that two or more memorials have of late been received urging the appointment of Pak Yongho to some post of influence. Can a subject bear to suggest such a thing? We are so surprised and grieved at this that We prefer to say nothing about it. Though the original memorial was refused admittance by the Secretariat of State if such memorials are let go unpunished, the law will be non-effective and the country will lose its dignity. Let the Law Department instruct Police authorities to arrest Yi Sukyul and his associates. After thorough investigations (into their motives, etc), report the same to Us.

The above Edict was followed by another whose substance was as follows:—

All those who have fled from justice to other countries, whether their offences are great or small, are equally disloyal subjects and unfilial sons, whether they are authors or accomplices of a crime. As there is law in the land, they shall never be pardoned.

The popular demonstrations which were started on the 5th inst., came to an unsatisfactory end, says "Molayo" in the Independent, on the 23rd. Meetings were daily held, but there was very little that evoked public enthusiasm. As days went on, the realizing the object of the people, viz., the punishment of the Five Villains, the expulsion of Min Yongkui, and the organization of a popular Cabinet, became more and more hopeless. On the 16th inst., some of the members of the Privy Council had the imprudence to recommend to the Government the recall of Pak Yongho. This unwise proposal was endorsed by the People's Union. The leaders of the Pedlers' party at once seized this opportunity for attacking the Union. They memorialized the Throne charging the popular speakers with treasonable designs. The unthinking public suspected the leaders of the People's Union of having started the agitation simply for the sake of recalling an arch-traitor. The Government saw its chance of revenge in this sudden change of public sentiment against the People's Union. For two successive days, on the 22nd and 23rd, drunken soldiers were sent to the meetings harassing, insulting, and beating the speakers, calling them traitors, etc. The People's Union, which had no other support than the sympathy of the people, of necessity broke down when that support was withdrawn. Pedlers are now in the city in strong force, making it hot for those who took any part in the popular movements.

"Molayo" admits that the People's Union committed many blunders and follies, such as compelling officers to attend the meetings; asking for contributions from rich men (who, however, gave hardly anything); entering and holding meetings in the Supreme Court, etc. Yet most deliberately does he declare that none of these offences nor all of them put together can be regarded as worse or even as bad as any one of the acts of faithlessness of which the Government stands condemned. His advice to the popular leaders is to keep quiet for the time. The country is going to ruin fast enough without any well-meaning but ill-directed agitation.

The resignation of Mr. T. H. Ynn, as the Governor of Seoul, was accepted the other day, and Mr. Yi Chaiyen was re-appointed to the position. Mr. T. H. Ynn was appointed, on the 24th, the Vice-President of the Privy Council. Very strong pressure from various sources is being brought to bear upon Mr. Ynn urging him to discontinue the editorship of the Independent.

Foreigners and Koreans are said to have vied with each other on Christmas Day in "seeing who can most appropriately observe the birthday of Him who was at once a foreigner to all and yet akin to all, and whose message to a world of suffering and discord was, Peace on Earth and good will to men."

The Rev. F. S. Moore has returned to Seoul from a six weeks trip into the country. On his return journey he narrowly escaped with his life, one of the innas where he was staying a short distance from Seoul being attacked by thieves who fired into the room occupied by Mr. Moore. The latter only escaped injury by lying flat on the ground on his face. His servant had several shots fired through his head gear.

Under the heading of "This Popular Movement," the Independent discusses the events of the past year, which has been "remarkable for popular agitations, wise and otherwise." It says that for the past eighteen years the new thoughts of the West have been slowly but steadily coming into this once Hermit Nation. Newspapers and books containing strange doctrines of politics, of religion, and of science have set the people thinking—almost a forgotten art in Korea. To these and other causes we must trace the rise of the recent popular movements. But these ideas abstract and diffused needed some suitable medium to make their forces known; and such a medium was, thanks to the efforts of Dr. Philip Jaisohn, supplied by the Independence Club. Beginning as a place where officers met once a week to smoke and talk away their superabundant time, the Club entered a new career in the latter part of 1897, when it became a debating society. Week after week its influence grew with its popularity. From last Spring the Club interested itself in politics and, in its fights against corruption and wickedness in high places, victory generally rewarded its patriotic endeavours. The popular movements begun and guided by the Independence Club have had, on the whole, a good effect on the people and the Government. They taught the former that they had a right to ask those whom they support to protect their life and property, and the latter that it has no other raison d'être than the good of the people. Many grievous abuses of power, which nobody had ever before called in question, were more or less effectively checked. The mass meetings on the streets have had beyond doubt a wonderful educative effect on the people, especially on the young. But the popular agitators, since they went out of the systematic control of the Independence Club, have committed some ridiculous blunders. The usefulness of mass meetings as they are may well be questioned. Let the Independence Club be reorganized and confine its work of quiet but systematic and persistent effort for the enlightenment of the people.

FIRES.

A fire was discovered above 10.30 p.m. on the 7th instant on board the Nippon Yusen Kai-sha steamer Hiroshima Maru, in Yokohama harbour. The cargo in danger consisted of cotton, and about 30 piculs were destroyed before the flames were got under.

On Sunday, at 3.50 a.m., a rather serious fire occurred at Isezaki-cho, Ichome. The building in which the conflagration originated was a restaurant called the Nakamura Chudo, and thence the flames spread to surrounding houses, destroying 14, and damaging four.

An alarm of fire was given at 3.40 on Wednesday. Supt. Morgan and his men turned out, and found that some rags were ablaze in a Chinese kitchen in the servant's quarters attached to Mr. Grosser's house, No. 180. The fire was put out without difficulty, and practically no damage was done.

Messrs. Illies & Co., agents of the Hamburg-America Line, have received a telegram stating that the steamship Bamberg, which left Kobe on December 11th, arrived at Colombo on Friday. Having had a fire in the after part of the ship, she had to discharge her cargo, which apparently is badly damaged.

A fire broke out on Friday morning shortly after one o'clock at the residence of Mr. Gomes, No. 43, Shimoyamate-dori, Kobe, resulting in the total destruction of the house, together with the one adjoining, occupied by Mr. and Mrs. Clapp, and two Japanese houses in the rear.

The following table shows the number of fires in Yokohama and suburbs during 1898, as compared with the previous year:—

	1897.	1898.	Decrease.
No. of fires	Yokohama 19	12	7
	Suburbs 4	3	1
Houses destroyed.	Yokohama 115	61	54
	Suburbs 27	3	24

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

The telephone between Tokyo and Osaka is to be opened on the 1st proximo. The charge will be yen 1.60 per 5 minutes conversation.

The new torpedo boat Murakumo, which has been constructed in England, will leave on the 16th inst. for home. The boat (300 tons, 30 knots), is expected to arrive here in May or June.

The House of Representatives in New South Wales recently decided to impose an import duty of £3 per ton on Japanese rice. It is now stated, however, that the Executive Council has rejected the Bill.

A man named Ota Masahiro on the 6th murdered a girl named Fusa at a house of ill-fame in the Yoshiwara, Tokyo, and attempted suicide by cutting his throat with a knife. He died at the hospital on the 9th inst.

The arrangement of the Kiushu and Sanyo Railway Companies with Messrs. Peacock and Co. for a loan amounting to yen 15,000,000 has been completed, and after certain items are amended the contract will be signed at once.

An officer on board the steamer Indrani, in a fit of temper, threw an oil feeder at one of the coolies. The missile missed its mark and struck another coolie, named Sugai, in the temple, causing a severe wound. The injured coolie was taken to the hospital, where he lies in a critical condition.

A Shimonoseki telegram to the Osaka Asahi states that the wreck of the Yayeyama Maru, which sank after colliding with the P. & O. steamer Brindisi, was offered for sale by auction on Sunday. There were about thirty bidders from Kobe, Osaka, and Nagasaki. The highest bid was yen 46,500, but this being below the reserve, it was not sold.

A post box has been erected on the right-hand of the entrance to the Yokohama Post Office for the reception of foreign mail matter.

This innovation is designed to prevent the dire confusion which exists each mail day through people crushing to the window at the foreign mail office with their letters. Foreign letters which have been properly stamped may be posted in this box, which will be cleared only before the despatch of the mails.

On Tuesday afternoon there was a large congregation at Christ Church to witness the marriage of Mr. Charles Henry Wilson, Manager of the Rangoon Branch of the Hongkong and Shanghai Bank, to Miss Laura N. Smith, eldest daughter of Mr. N. F. Smith, of Yokohama. The bride, who was given away by her father, was attended by Miss Nina Smith, Miss Marcia Smith, Miss Poole, Miss Wheeler, Miss Moss, and Miss Maia Lindsey as bridesmaids. Mr. H. W. Fraser acted as best man, and the ushers were Messrs. Janion, H. A. Poole, H. Bent, and Van Smith. Mr. J. T. Griffin presided at the organ, and at the conclusion of the ceremony Mrs. Mollison sang Gounod's "Ave Maria." Mr. Rudolf Schmid accompanying on the 'cello. The Church was very handsomely decorated. Mr. and Mrs. Wilson will shortly leave for a tour in Europe and round the world.

SUPPLEMENTARY TREATY BETWEEN JAPAN & GERMANY.

The following is the Supplementary Treaty between Japan and Germany:—

The Government of His Majesty the Emperor of Japan and the Government of His Majesty the German Emperor and King of Prussia, in fulfilment of the second paragraph of Section 3, of the Protocol annexed to the Treaty of Commerce and Navigation, concluded between Japan and Germany, at Berlin, on the 4th of April, 1896, have agreed as follows:—

1.—The Tariff annexed to this Convention shall be substituted for the ad valorem Tariff annexed to the aforesaid Protocol of the 4th of April, 1896. It shall be subject to all the stipulations contained in Section 3 of the said Protocol, in so far as these are applicable, and shall come into force on the 1st day of the 1st month of the 32nd year of Meiji, corresponding to the 1st January, 1899.

2.—The present Convention shall have the same duration as the Treaty and Protocol of the 4th of April, 1896, to which it is complementary.

In witness whereof the undersigned Viscount Aoki Shunzo, His Imperial Japanese Majesty's Minister of State for Foreign Affairs, and Count Casimir von Leyden, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of His Majesty the German Emperor, and King of Prussia, having been duly authorized to this effect, have signed the present Convention and have affixed thereto their seals.

Done in duplicate at Tokyo, this 26th day of the 12th month of the 31st year of Meiji, corresponding to the 26th of Dec., 1898.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.—The catty mentioned in this Tariff is the Japanese weight. It is equal to 600 grammes of the metric system of weight, or 1 3227 lbs. English avoirdupois weight. The pound is the English avoirdupois weight. The square yard, square foot, and square inch are the English Imperial surface measures.

RULE FOR CALCULATING "AD VALOREM" DUTIES.—Import duties payable ad valorem under this Tariff shall be calculated on the actual cost of the articles at the place of purchase, production, or fabrication, with the addition of the cost of insurance and transportation from the place of purchase, production, or fabrication, to the port of discharge, as well as commission, if any exists.

RULE FOR THE MEASUREMENT OF TISSUES.—In determining the dutiable width of any Tissue the Customs shall discard all fractions of an inch not exceeding half an inch, and shall count as a full inch all fractions exceeding half an inch. Note.—It is understood that selvages shall not be included in the measurement of Tissues.

PROTOCOL.

The undersigned, simultaneously with the Supplementary Convention signed this day, have agreed upon the following stipulations:—

1.—With regard to the yen mentioned in the Tariff annexed to the aforesaid Supplementary Convention, it is understood that whatever rights belong, or may belong, to Great Britain in virtue of the description of the yen appended to the Anglo-Japanese Supplementary Convention dated the 16th day of the 7th month of the 28th year of Meiji, shall be equally extended to Germany. The Government of His Majesty the Emperor of Japan, however, wish it understood that this declaration creates no inference as to the existence in favour of Great Britain of any rights in the direction indicated.

2.—Respecting the question of Certificates of Origin and the Legalization of Invoices it is understood, that the words "other proper authorities" appearing in Article II, of the Japanese Imperial Ordinance No. 385, dated the 27th day of the 10th month of the 30th year of Meiji, corresponding to the 27th of October, 1897, are held to include German Police Officers, in the absence of competent Japanese Consular Authorities, and that the term "competent Japanese Consular Authorities" does not include Japanese Honorary Consuls. The Government of His Majesty the Emperor of Japan will take the necessary measures to extend to the German Chambers of Commerce the same competence under like circumstances as is possessed by German Police Officers.

The Government of His Majesty the Emperor of Japan engage that, under the new Tariff, all imports of a dutiable value not exceeding yen 100 shall be exempt from any obligation of being accompanied by legalized invoices.

The undersigned have agreed that the stipulations contained in this Protocol shall have the same binding force and the same duration as the Supplementary Convention signed this day.

In witness whereof the undersigned have signed the same and have affixed thereto their seals.

Done in duplicate at Tokyo, this 36th day of the 12th month of the 31st year of Meiji, corresponding to the 26th December, 1898.

SUPPLEMENTARY CONVENTION BETWEEN FRANCE AND JAPAN.

Sa Majesté l'Empereur du Japon, et le Président de la République Française, ayant en vue de mettre à exécution les dispositions contenues dans le second alinéa de la première partie du Protocole annexé au Traité de Commerce et de Navigation signé à Paris, le 4 Août, 1896, entre le Japon et la France, en vertu desquelles un tarif de droits spécifiques doit, dans un délai de six mois à dater de la ratification de ce traité, être substitué au tarif des droits ad valorem joint audit Protocole et ladite période de six mois mentionnée ci-dessus ayant été prolongée, ont nommé pour leurs Plénipotentiaires à l'effet de conclure une Convention dans ce but, savoir :

Sa Majesté l'Empereur du Japon, M. le Vicomte Aoki Siuzo, Junii, Grand-Cordon de l'Ordre Impérial du Soleil Levant, etc. etc. etc., Son Ministre des Affaires Étrangères ;

Et le Président de la République Française, M. Harmand, François, Jules, Commandeur de la Légion d'Honneur, Grand-Croix du Soleil Levant, etc. etc. etc., Envoyé Extraordinaire et Ministre Plénipotentiaire de la République près Sa Majesté l'Empereur du Japon ;

Lesquels, après s'être communiqués leurs pouvoirs trouvés en bonne et due forme, sont convenus de ce qui suit :

Article premier.—Le tarif des droits d'importation annexé à la présente convention sera applicable aux produits français importés au Japon, au lieu et place de celui qui est joint au Protocole du 4 Août, 1896, dans les mêmes conditions et sous les mêmes réserves.

Elle entrera en vigueur immédiatement après l'échange des ratifications.

Article deuxième.—La présente convention aura la même durée que le Traité et le Protocole conclus le 4 Août, 1896.

Article troisième.—La présente convention sera ratifiée et les ratifications seront échangées à Tokio aussitôt que faire se pourra, mais dans un délai qui ne pourra excéder six mois à partir de la date de la signature des présentes.

Fait à Tokio, en double exemplaire, le 25e jour du 12e mois de 38e année de Meiji, correspondant au 25 Décembre 1898.

REGISTRATION LAW.

Art. I.—Fees for registration shall be levied and collected in accordance with this Law.

Art. II.—With regard to the registration of immovable property, fees shall be collected according to the undermentioned classification :—

1. Acquisition of ownership by inheritance, $\frac{7}{1000}$ of the value of immovable property.

Note.—When property is divided between two or more persons, the fees shall be collected in proportion to the amount secured by each.

2. Acquisition of ownership by succession to an estate left by a deceased person, $\frac{22}{1000}$ of the value of immovable property.
Note.—When property is divided between two or more persons entitled to succeed, fees shall be collected in proportion to the amount secured by each.
3. Acquisition of ownership from causes other than inheritance or succession, $\frac{22}{1000}$ of the value of immovable property.
Note.—With regard to the division of property as above, fees shall be collected in proportion to the amount secured by each.
4. Preservation of ownership secured prior to the promulgation of Registration Regulations embodied in Law No. 1 of the 19th year of Meiji, $\frac{2}{1000}$ of the value of immovable property.
5. Allotment of co-ownership of properties $\frac{1}{1000}$ of the value of immovable property.
6. Acquisition of superficies and emphyteusis— For a period not exceeding 10 years, $\frac{1}{1000}$ of the value of immovable property. Not exceeding 20 years, $\frac{1}{1000}$ of the value of immovable property. Not exceeding 30 years, $\frac{1}{1000}$ of the value of immovable property. Above 30 years, $\frac{1}{1000}$ of the value of immovable property. For an unlimited period, $\frac{1}{1000}$ of the value of immovable property.
Note.—In the case of the transfer of rights to others, any portion of the period already passed shall be subtracted from the whole term, and the fee for registration shall be calculated on the remaining portion of the term.
8. Acquisition of right as to hiring— For a period not exceeding 10 years, $\frac{1}{1000}$ of the value of an immovable. For more than 10 years, $\frac{1}{1000}$ of the value of an immovable. For an unlimited period, $\frac{1}{1000}$ of the value of an immovable.
Note.—In case the right has been transferred to others, the time that has already passed shall be subtracted from the whole term, and fees shall be collected for the remaining portion of the term.
9. Acquisition of emphyteusis, $\frac{1}{1000}$ of the value of an immovable.
10. Creation of hereditary property of nobles, $\frac{22}{1000}$ of the value of an immovable.
11. Preservation, or acquisition, of preferential rights, $\frac{6}{1000}$ of the amount of obligation, or the value of an immovable, or the estimate of expenditures in connection with works undertaken.
Note.—If the value of an obligation is not stated or if the value of a property which constitutes the subject of preferential right is less than the amount of obligation, the value of such property shall be regarded as the amount of obligation.
12. Acquisition of pledge or mortgage, $\frac{6}{1000}$ of the amount of obligation.
Note.—If an obligation is not mentioned, or if the value of a property which constitutes the subject of pledge or mortgage is less than the amount of the obligation, the value of such property shall be regarded as the amount of the obligation.
13. Application for the sale of property by public auction, or for compulsory supervision of the same, $\frac{6}{1000}$ of the amount of obligation.
Note.—In case the value of the properties to be submitted to public auction or compulsory supervision is less than the amount of the obligation, the price of such properties shall be regarded as the obligation.
14. Temporary seizure or disposal of property, $\frac{4}{1000}$ of the amount of obligation.
Note.—If the value of properties for which steps are to be taken for temporary seizure or disposal is less than the amount of the obligation, the value of such property shall be regarded as the amount of the obligation.
15. Seizure of obligation guaranteed by security, $\frac{5}{1000}$ of the amount of obligation.
Note.—If the value of the properties to be seized is less than the amount of the obligation, the value of such properties shall be regarded as the amount of the obligation.
16. Division of properties acquired by inheritance— For ownership, $\frac{6}{1000}$ of the value of an immovable.

For rights other than that of ownership $\frac{1}{1000}$ of the value of an immovable.

17. The restoration of registration on demand, or application, 20 sen for each immovable property.
18. Temporary registration, 20 sen for each immovable property.
19. Preliminary registration, 20 sen for each immovable property.
20. Supplementary registration, 20 sen for each immovable property.
21. Renewal, alteration, or withdrawal of registration, 10 sen for each immovable property.

Art. III.—With regard to the registration of vessels, fees shall be paid according to the following classification:—

1. Acquisition of ownership by inheritance, $\frac{1}{1000}$ of the value of a vessel.

NOTE.—When property is to be divided, fees shall be collected in proportion to the value of the portions secured.

2. Acquisition of ownership by succession to the estate of a deceased person, $\frac{6}{10000}$ of the value of a vessel.

NOTE.—In the case of property acquired by two or more persons, the amount of fees shall be determined with reference to the portions secured by each.

3. Acquisition of ownership from causes other than inheritance or succession, $\frac{10}{10000}$ of the value of a vessel.

NOTE.—In case of property acquired by two or more persons, the rate shall be determined according to the value of the respective portions secured by each.

4. Preservation of ownership secured prior to the operation of the Registration Regulations embodied in Law No. 1 of the 16th year of Meiji, $\frac{1}{1000}$ of the value of a vessel.

5. Acquisition of right as to hiring—
For a period not exceeding 10 years, $\frac{2}{10000}$ of the value of a vessel.

For more than 10 years, $\frac{5}{10000}$ of the value of a vessel.

For an unlimited period, $\frac{1}{1000}$ of the value of a vessel.

NOTE.—In the case of the transfer of property right to others, the time that has already elapsed shall be subtracted from the prescribed duration of the right and the remaining portion of the term alone shall be taken into account in computing the fees for registration.

6. Acquisition of a pledge or mortgage, $\frac{6}{10000}$ of the amount of obligation.

NOTE.—If the amount of obligation is not mentioned, or if the value of properties mortgaged or pledged is less than the amount of the obligation, the value of such properties shall be regarded as the amount of obligation.

7. Application for the sale of properties by public auction, $\frac{6}{10000}$ of the amount of obligation.

NOTE.—If the value of properties to be submitted to public auction falls short of the amount of the obligation, the value of such properties shall be regarded as the amount of the obligation.

8. Temporary seizure or disposal of properties, $\frac{4}{10000}$ of the amount of obligation.

NOTE.—If the value of properties to be temporarily seized or disposed of is less than the amount claimed, the value of such properties shall be regarded as the amount for which the right of claim exists.

9. Seizure of obligation guaranteed by security, $\frac{6}{10000}$ of the amount of obligation.

NOTE.—In case the value of properties to be seized is less than the amount as to which the right of claim exists, the value of such properties shall be regarded as the amount of obligation.

10. Renewal, alteration, or withdrawal of registration, 10 sen for each vessel.

Art. IX.—With regard to the registration of vessels, fees shall be paid according to the following classification:—

1. For new registration, 50 sen for every ten tons.
2. For transfer of registry, 10 sen for every ten tons.
3. For withdrawal of registration, 3 sen for every ten tons.
4. For alteration of registration, 10 sen for each vessel.

The capacity of vessels shall be calculated on the basis of their gross tonnage, fractions of ten tons being counted as ten tons. In the case of vessels the capacity of which is calculated in koku, every 100 koku shall be counted as ten tons.

Art. VI.—In the case of registration of commercial companies, or other legal persons, working for profit, fees shall be paid as classified below:—

ANOTHER SANGUINARY FIGHT IN THE SOUDAN.

DERVISHES ROUTED.

London, Jan. 7.

Colonel Lewis stormed and captured Ahmed Fedil's position at Roseires, on the Blue Nile, on December 25, after severe fighting. 500 Dervishes were killed and many wounded. 1,500 prisoners were taken, but Ahmed Fedil escaped. Major Ferguson, of the Grenadiers, and six Egyptian officers were wounded, and 145 men were killed and wounded.

LORD CROMER LAYS FOUNDATION OF KHARTOUM COLLEGE.

JOINT ANGLO-EGYPTIAN GOVERNMENT.

Lord Cromer has laid the foundation stone of the Gordon College at Khartoum. Receiving the Sheikh and notables, he said that the country would be governed in future by the Queen of England and the Khedive, but no attempt would be made to govern from Cairo or London. The Sirdar would be the sole representative of the British and Egyptian Governments.

LORD SALISBURY ON FRENCH COLONIAL POLICY.

IRRITATION IN FRANCE.

London, Jan. 9.

A Blue-book on Madagascar affairs discloses that Lord Salisbury vigorously protested against French trade restrictions, and especially against the decree confining the coasting trade to the French. M. Delcasse replied on the 29th December that the decree was not enforced and would be revoked. The Times, discussing the subject, says: "The French must not suppose that because we do not splutter and fume, we are unaware of the shabbiness of the policy of the French Government, which under grandiloquent phrases habitually acts with the cupidity and cunning of a peasant."

There is much speculation as to Lord Salisbury's object in publishing the Madagascar Blue-book at the present juncture. The French press keenly resents it after the satisfaction given by the evacuation of Fashoda, and accuses Britain of encouraging dangerous irritation.

MORE REINFORCEMENTS FOR PHILIPPINES.

London, Jan. 10.

The Washington Government has ordered three gunboats and another regiment to the Philippines.

THE DREYFUS REVISION.

DISAGREEMENT ON THE BENCH.

M. Debeaufaise has resigned the sectional presidency of the Court of Cassation owing to differences with his colleagues.

MILITARY AND NAVAL ACTIVITY IN RUSSIA.

REINFORCEMENTS IN FAR EAST.

The Times correspondent travelling in Russia found, despite the Czar's manifesto, feverish activity in dock-yards. The numbers enrolled in the army and navy in October and November were larger than in any previous year, and reinforcements are being sent to the Far East as fast as transportable.

AMERICA AND THE PHILIPPINES.

SENSATIONAL SPEECH IN THE SENATE.

London, Jan. 11.

Sensation has been caused in the American Senate by Mr. Hoar, a prominent Senator, opposing the ratification of the peace treaty and declaring that the acquisition by America of territory in another hemisphere destroys the Monroe Doctrine.

THE DREYFUS REVISION.

COURT AND MINISTER CHARGED WITH CORRUPTION.

DREYFUS EXAMINED.

The letter written by M. de Beaurepaire explaining his resignation as Sectional President of the Court of Cassation, is strongly Anti-Dreyfus in tone. In it the writer denounces the other Cassation Judges and the Minister of Justice, charging them with partiality and even with corruption, and declaring himself the avenger of the insulted honour of the army.

The Public Prosecutor of Cayenne has examined Dreyfus, who denied making any confession on the day of his degradation and re-iterated his innocence.

DEATH OF A BRITISH CONSULAR AGENT.

Mr. W. B. Pryer, British Consular Agent at Sandakan, Borneo, has died at Port Said.

[FROM THE "NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."] THE REBELLION IN SZECHUAN.

Chungking, 30th December, 1898.

A great battle took place at Sanchiaotang on the 27th of December, in which the Imperial troops are reported to have been victorious. No further details are known as yet.

LORD CHARLES BERESFORD IN HONGKONG

Hongkong, Jan. 4.

Lord Charles Beresford dined privately with the China Association to-day. Mr. J. J. Francis, Q.C., the chairman, in proposing his health, suggested that it was more important to reform the finances than the army of China. Lord Charles explained why the army should be reformed first, and referred to the case of Egypt. Several able financiers had been sent to Egypt but it was impossible to accomplish anything until the army was organised to enforce new policy. Any attempt to reform the finances of China first would lead to disturbances.

In his speech to the Chamber of Commerce yesterday, Lord Charles said that he adhered to what he said in Shanghai, and spoke strongly against the extension claimed by the French at Shanghai. It was not right in a cosmopolitan community that one part should create disturbances and jeopardise the lives and property of the whole community. He hoped the Consuls at Shanghai would adhere firmly in their protests to their Governments regarding French action at Shanghai.

Lord Charles was entertained at dinner last night by the Navy League.

CAPT. CHICHESTER HONOURED.

Hongkong, Jan. 3.

Sir Edward Chichester, (Capt. of the British cruiser Immortalité) has been created a C.M.G. LATE CHIEF OFFICER OF THE "GLENAVON."

The body of Mr. Dickson, chief officer of the Glenavon, has been found.

AGUINALDO CONCILIATORY.

It is reported that Aguinaldo is falling in with the American plans in the Philippines.

(FROM THE "SHANGHAI MERCURY.")

THE PHILIPPINES.

Hongkong, Jan. 5.

The Filipinos here state that their people are determined to resist the landing of the United States troops at Iloilo, and as a last resort may destroy the town.

A rupture of the friendly relations between the Filipinos and Americans at Manila is imminent.

It is very probable that hostilities will occur in the Visayas (Southern Provinces), unless the overbearing American policy is modified.

YU MANTZU.

Peking, Jan. 6.

A Secret Edict has been issued to Kuei Chun, Viceroy of Szechuen, ordering him to put down Yu Mantzu and his followers at once with military force.

ANOTHER RISING IN KWANG-TUNG.

Shanghai, Jan. 9th.

A telegram from Wu-chang has reached here to the effect that rebels have appeared at a place in Kwang tung Prefecture, and attacked a Christian Church.

PROBLEM No. 405.

By J. SVEJDA.

First Prize Nene Illustrirte Blatt Tourney.

White mates in three moves.

GAME No. 467.

Mr. James McConnell, of New Orleans, has developed an original idea in the Vienna opening, which presents many ingenious combinations and which he has played successfully against experts both in America and Europe. The following is a game sent by him to the American Chess Magazine, with his notes (abridged).

THE MCCONNELL GAMBIT.

1 P K4	P K4	20 P Q5	P B4
2 Q Kt B3	Q Kt B3	21 R Ksq	P B5
3 P B4	P xP	22 B Kt-q	Kt B4

5 K B-q	B B4	24 B xKt	P xB
6 Q K2(b)	P Q3(c)	25 B B6(g)	B xKt(Q4)
7 Rt B3	Q Q-q	26 B xB	B xKt
8 Q Q5(d)	R B3	27 Q P xB	Kt B5

15 B xRP	P B4(e)	34 P Q Kt3	P Q R4
16 B Kt5	Q B-q	35 Q Kt3(h)	R xBP
17 Kt B4	B B2	36 R xR	Q K5ch
18 P xP	Kt R4(f)	37 Q K3	Q xR
19 Kt K6	R Ksq	38 P K7	Resigns.

NOTES.

(a) This constitutes the initial move in the opening, which has certainly the claim of novelty, and is susceptible of very interesting variations.

(b) The only move available for White to prevent Black getting an immediate and decisive advantage.

(c) Here, instead of the text-move Black could play Kt to Q 5. White's reply would be 7—Kt to B 3, resulting necessarily in an exchange, either of the Queens or of the Knights, and in either event an apparently equal game with probable advantage for White.

(d) The early development of the Q Kt, followed by the opportune advance of the K R P, constitute the leading feature of the game.

(e) Probably the best move at Black's command, as he could not with safety accept the offered sacrifice of the B.

(f) Evidently with the purpose of development on the Q side by advance of the Q B P.

(g) A second sacrifice of this B, which Black cannot safely accept.

(h) Here, of course, a better move for White would have been P to K 4, and the advance of the Pawns would have been irresistible. White's error in moving 35—Q to Kt 3 caused the loss of a valuable centre P; but this was not sufficient gain to alter the result. Black's game was then hopeless.

GAME No. 468.

Played at the Singapore Chess Club recently.

ALLOAHER GAMBIT.

White—J. B. Elcum. Black—P. A. Ruten.

WHITE.	BLACK.	WHITE.	BLACK.
1 P K4	P K4	9 B xP	P Q B3(c)
2 P K B4	P xP	10 Kt Q B3(d)	Q K2(e)
3 Kt K B3	P K Kt4	11 P K5	P Q K4
4 P K R4	P Kt5	12 Q Q3	R Q-q
5 Kt K5	P K R4(a)	13 B xPch!	Kt xB
6 B B4	K K R3	14 Q R7ch	K B-q
7 P Q4	B K2(b)	15 Kt xKt	Q xRP
8 Castles	Castles	16 B Kt5(f)	Resigns.

NOTES.

(a) An obsolete defence.

(b) The book continuation is... P to KB3; 8—B takes P, P takes Kt; 9—P takes P, Kt to B2; 10—P to Kt6, with a splendid attack.

(c) Shutting in the Q side pieces.

(d) White might have played B to Q6 with advantage.

(e) To prevent B to Q6.

(f) The attack is now overwhelming. B to R6 would have done equally well.

END GAME.

Played last month in a handicap tourney at the Liverpool Club at the odds of P and two. "An awful example" of the danger of trying to win with a P on the R file and a B of wrong colour.

BLACK.

WHITE.

White played

R to R4
R takes R
P to Kt 4 (a)
K to B2

R to K5
B takes R
B to B6

(a) A neat trap, which Black falls into, and plays the only move that allows White to draw, as he cannot stop the White K getting to Q R square.

NOTES.

An interesting match has been concluded between Mr. Jasnogrodsky and Napier, the youthful champion of the Brooklyn C.C., New York. After five games the result stood in favour of the experienced Polish player by a score of 3 wins to 2 wins; but the youth won the sixth game and drew the seventh, bringing about a tie, and dividing the purse with the veteran.

Chess Past and Present.—Attempts are sometimes made, says the Washington Star, to compare the skill of the players of the present day with the skill of the players of thirty or forty years ago. This is done by examining the scores of published games. But in the making of such comparative estimates one essential consideration is often ignored. "In the days of Staunton, Anderssen, and Morphy, no time limit was imposed on a player—he took all the time he chose." The question then was often not a question of skill, but a question of physical endurance. The remedying of this defect was one of the objects of the great London tourney of 1851. Yet nothing was done about it. Mr. Staunton surrendered to Mr. Williams a match in which the score stood in his favour at 6 to 2. This was because Mr. Williams persisted in prolonging the games to 12, 13, and 20 hours each, and took two to two and a half on a single move. But in the tournaments of the present day there is a time limit of 15 moves to the hour, or of 30 moves to the first two hours. "If a player does not make the required number of moves within the time limit, he forfeits the game. Hence he often adopts a weak line of play because he is pushed for time, and becomes nervous." The condition is altogether different from that of being allowed to take whatever time he pleases over a game.

If statistics prove anything, the results of recent tournaments go to support Staunton's idea that the Ruy Lopez is the strongest attacking opening on the chess board.

[Messrs. Bisset & Ure's List.]

Yokohama, January 12th.
The Grand Hotel, Limited, has circulated its Report and Statement of Accounts for the half-year ending the 31st ultimo, which show a falling-off in the earnings of the Hotel as compared with the previous six months. The net profit, not including the balance of yen 6,384.08 carried forward from the first half year's account, amount to yen 27,860.52 against yen 35,030.79 for the half year ending 30th June, 1898. With yen 28,064.60 available for distribution, the Directors recommend the payment of a dividend of yen 6 and to carry forward yen 13,064.60 to this year's account. We observe that the Company's debentures account has been reduced from yen 20,000 to yen 15,000. The receipts show a decrease of yen 14,065.98 between the first and second half-years of 1898. From 1st January to 30th June the Company received for its working yen 67,028.71, while from 1st July to 31st December receipts amounted to yen 51,062.98. This difference accounts for the falling off in profits. On the whole the account may be considered satisfactory in face of the depression in the passenger traffic during the second half year.

Y. E. & Iron Works changed hands to-day at yen 275. Japan Brewery old shares can be had at yen 325 and new shares with four calls paid at yen 135. Club Hotels are obtainable at par and Oriental Hotels are procurable at yen 105. Offers for Nagasaki Hotels are wanted. Bettelhave sellers at yen 0.50 whilst North & Rees have buyers at yen 200. A few Langfeldts can be secured at yen 235. Japan Brewery Debentures can be had at yen 108 and Oriental Hotel Debentures at yen 110 ex accrued interest as usual in both cases.

YOKOHAMA: SATURDAY, JAN. 7TH, 1899.

BIRTH.

On the 2nd inst. at No. 225, Settlement, the wife of Mr. T. E. SILVA, of a son.

MARRIAGE.

On the 31st December, 1898, at Los Angeles, California, HUGO GRUBB, of Shanghai, to ANNIE G. MORRIS HALLER, of Chicago. No cards.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

FIELD-MARSHAL MARQUIS OYAMA left Tokyo for Oiso, on the 30th ult.

MR. AKUZAWA, Manager of the Meiji Commercial Bank, died on the 28th December.

THE citizens of Yokohama propose to establish a Female Art School at Himode-cho.

THE New Year was ushered in with glorious weather and the holidays proved thoroughly enjoyable.

GEN. LORD KITCHENER has arrived at Khartoum where he is awaiting the arrival of Lord Cromer.

THE American flag has been hoisted at Havana. It was a simple ceremony and no untoward incident happened.

FRANCE is said to be opposing the handing over to Japan the submarine cable connecting Foochow with Formosa.

A SOLDIER named Fukuzawa Shoji (21), belonging to the 1st Army Division, has committed suicide by hanging himself.

DISTURBANCES are now reported from the southern end of Formosa and the troops have been obliged to act on the defensive.

THE warship Katsuragi, which has been cruising off Southern Formosa, arrived at Anping on the 2nd inst. via the Pescadorez.

A NEW convertible 5 yen note will be issued at the commencement of April. The design will be finished about the end of February.

THE American Government is hastening the despatch of reinforcements to the Philippines. Six regiments will leave within a fortnight.

COUNT INOUE, who has been in the west during the summer, arrived on the 28th ult. in Tokyo and proceeded to his private residence.

RUMOURS of Cabinet changes are in the air and it is expected that before long Marquis Ito will again return to office, having the Liberal Party as supporters.

THE Times strongly protests against the French dog-in-the-manger policy at Shanghai, and declares that Britain does not intend to submit to such treatment.

MR. HARA ZENZABURO, a wealthy Yokohama merchant and a member of the House of Peers, is suffering from lung trouble. He is said to be in a serious condition.

ON the occasion of the opening of the Portuguese Cortes, the King dwelt on the necessity of preserving and developing the colonies in their entirety as a sacred heritage.

TWO robbers entered a house occupied by a man named Takahashi Seisuke, Oharacho, Koishikawa, Tokyo, on the 2nd at 7 p.m., threatened the occupants with swords, and stole yen 4.

JAPANESE financiers intend to establish a China and Japan Bank for the convenience of Asiatic traders. The scheme followed by the promoters of the Russo-Chinese Bank will be adopted.

THE Court of Cassation has decided to interrogate Dreyfus on certain points through the Magistrate of Cayenne. This disposes of the rumour of the prisoner's return to France.

A ROBBER entered the brake-van of a train on the Nippon Railway on the 30th ult. between Mito and Fukuoka. He beat back the watchman, broke open the iron safe, and stole a sum of yen 1,200.

THE Glenarvon is a total wreck on the Simun Inlets, about two hours distant from Hongkong. The captain and part of the crew have reached the colony safely, but one boat is still unaccounted for.

A FIRE which broke out in the kitchen of the Y. U. Club, Yokohama, on Monday night, did a lot of damage to the Club Library and the adjoining Hotel, though the flames were confined to a limited area.

A MAN with the appearance of a coolie, apparently about 25 years of age, committed suicide on the 2nd at 5.30 p.m., by placing himself before a train on the Ueno Railway near Shinmachi, Minami-Senju, Tokyo.

A Reuter's telegram from Cairo states that Colonel Kitchener has started to assume command of an expedition from Dublin against the Khalifa, who is raiding the Arabs of that district.

THREE employes named Honkino (22) Yumemura (19), and Yamano (18), of the Yedobashi Telegraph Office, Tokyo, embarked yen 140 by making a false telegraphic transfer. On the 27th ult. they were arrested.

VICEROY CHANG CHIN-TUNG, Governor-General of Kwang-tung Province, recently sent to Count Okuma a picture of the stone monument of Confucius at Yusei Nam, a kakemono, pens, and a box of ink as New Year gifts.

CALMING effect has been produced at Johannesburg, by President Kruger repudiating the bellicose articles published by the newspapers. The Volksstem has also disavowed the proposed demonstrations on the Jameson Raid anniversary.

A DEAD body was, on the 25th ult., washed ashore at Negi li. It was found to be that of a sailor named Suzuki Mantichi, living at Toyotsu, in Awa province. On the 24th ult. he and his mates met a gale at the entrance of Yokohama harbour and their vessel was capsized, all the crew being drowned.

THE dead body of a woman named Nakano Take (64) living at Naka Kachi machi, Shitaya, Tokyo, was found on the 1st inst. in her room. She was hanging by a rope in a manner to suggest suicide, but traces of blood were found on a towel in the room, and this is taken as point to foul play.

THE Russian authorities have decided to establish an academy for foreign languages at Vladivostok. It is to be opened this month. Japanese, Chinese, Korean, Manchurian, English, and German are to be taught. The students will take tours in different countries during the summer vacation.

THE tension between France and Siam is exciting the notice of the French press. News is published of the attack by Siamese troops of a party under the French Agent, M. Morin in Luangprabang within the twenty-five kilometres zone. The Siamese declare that the French party was trespassing beyond the zone.

ON the 2nd a woman named Kaku (42), wife of a farmer named Tokufu Kenzo (46), living at Hizaori village, Kita Adachi-gori, Saitama prefecture, was found hanged in the house of a pen-dealer named Meguro Kanajiro, at Takehayacho, Koishikawa, Tokyo. Her husband was arrested on suspicion of murder. It is said, however, that she had been suffering from mental aberration for some months past.

A LEGAL POINT.

In "The Condition of Foreigners under the New Treaties" Dr. Lönholm, discussing the provisions of the Civil and Commercial Code with regard to Pledges, says:—"The thing pledged must be actually delivered into the possession of the pledgee. It can not be kept for him by the pledgor as his agent or bailee. There is no method by which security can be given on movables without actual delivery except when they are stored in a public warehouse or are in course of carriage. * * * The practice common in England and America of hypothecating chattels by a registered bill of sale is not admitted in Japanese law." What effect will the operation of this new law exercise on business as conducted by foreigners? Chattel mortgages will, of course, cease to be possible according to the present practice. A man will not be able to borrow money from a bank on a bill of sale, unless the Japanese Courts interpret "possession" in some manner different from the ordinary signification of the term. Chattel mortgages registered at a Consulate do not, however, enter largely into the transactions of business or of every-day life, and, at any rate, we presume that there are ways of circumventing the difficulty of "possession." The really important phase of the question is that relating to the hypothecation of goods. The banks do already go through the form of obtaining possession of goods hypothecated to them, for they receive the bills of lading while the goods are in transit, and take—or make a show of taking—the keys of the godowns where the goods are stored after arrival at their destination. It may be presumed that the same practice will be considered sufficient to meet the requirement of the law when Japanese tribunals administer it. Still, in such a matter, one wants something more than mere presumption, and it might be well for the Foreign International Committee to seek a definite explanation from the Japanese Treaty Operation Committee. We heartily talk of memorializing Foreign Offices in Europe and America, but the wisdom of such a course seems very doubtful. The new Japanese Commercial and Civil Codes are framed on European models and in the best interests of business morality, according to the Japanese view of those interests. We greatly question whether Lord Salisbury, for example, would feel justified in making any representation to Japan on such a subject. The most that could be expected of him would be a reference to Sir Ernest Satow for information; and the Japanese Government would be pretty sure to reply that the Codes, as they stand, are judged suitable to the commercial conditions existing in Japan, and can not be altered without prejudice to the objects which their framers had in view. On the other hand, there can be no question about the goodwill of the Japanese Authorities; they are sincerely anxious to make every possible arrangement for the working of the new system, and no arrangement is more necessary than to promote a clear understanding of what the new system means. If, after seeking and obtaining explicit information as to the judicial interpretation of "possession" for the purposes of the Law, the International Committee, consisting, as it does, of experienced and shrewd business men, saw valid reason to apprehend that the smooth course of business would be impeded by the new system, or that vested interests would suffer severely—as, for example, by the necessary substitution of public warehouses for the godowns now owned by foreigners—then a frank and explicit representation to the Japanese Government would be much more likely to produce good results than a premature application to Home Governments. The delay involved in the latter course has also to be considered. If any reform of the Law be really necessary, now is the time to effect it while the Diet is in session. Two months hence it will be too late to get anything done before July. The International Committee has already accomplished an important work in getting the Business Tax Law amended, and it should now understand its own capacities for usefulness.

THE COMING ERA.

Among the Japanese people there is one section which, if it had its way or could obtain vogue for its views, would effectually secure the smooth working of the system to be inaugurated next July. It is the section represented by the Fiji Shimpō. We do not mean to say that the Fiji Shimpō is the only liberal journal in Japan. Such a statement would be most unjust to the Nichi Nichi, the Keisai Zasshi, the Shogyo Shimpō, the Mainichi, and others. But there is no other journal which makes of liberality such an every-day duty, such a resolute business, as the Fiji Shimpō does. It loses no opportunity of putting forward its broad-minded cosmopolitan views, and one can always be absolutely confident as to the attitude it will assume towards any question. How much has the Fiji done for Japan? It is the country's greatest benefactor.

It now declares that the best preparation for the operation of the new Treaties is for the people to persuade themselves that foreigners are friends and neighbours; that the greater the number of foreigners coming here, and the wider the area of their enterprise, the larger will be Japan's advantage. Then it passes on to note that a Japanese subject visiting a foreign country finds himself entirely free from restrictions of every kind—is that really so? Does such an assertion apply to Japanese visiting the United States or Australia?—whereas a foreigner visiting Japan does not enjoy commensurate liberty. It is true that some of the existing restrictions will be removed after July. The new Civil Code will then become applicable to foreigners, and the new Civil Code provides that foreigners are entitled to all privileges which are not explicitly withheld from them by law. Hence they will be able to hold shares in companies. But they will not be allowed to own land, and that restriction will prove fatal to the investment of foreign capital in Japan. The Fiji denounces it as an irrational and unworthy restriction, injurious alike to Japan's reputation and to her prosperity.

Certainly what the Fiji says is correct: the ownership of shares by foreigners will not be illegal after July next, for the Civil Code will then become applicable to everybody in the empire. There are some publicists, indeed, who hold that the privilege conferred by the Second Article of the Code is already enjoyable by foreigners, and truly we do not see how the contention can be denied. The Second Article declares explicitly that "foreigners enjoy private rights except as forbidden by law, regulation, or treaty." The Treaties do not forbid them to hold shares in companies. What, then, stands in the way? That question apart, however, the point we want to make is—do the Japanese really desire that foreigners should become shareholders in their enterprises? We recently had an opportunity of learning the opinion held on that subject by a gentleman who has large investments in Japan—not in his own name, of course. He is a gentleman who has resided here for more than a quarter of a century. He has been uniformly sympathetic with the Japanese; has conducted extensive business transactions in association with them, and numbers many of them among his personal friends. Yet he declares his absolute conviction that every one of them would vote against his acquiring the status and rights of a shareholder. That may be an extreme view, but it deserves respect in consideration of the source from which it emanates. If it be correct, the fact had better be frankly recognised and its consequence also. Its consequence is that one important avenue is closed to the inflow of foreign capital, for foreigners will never invest money on a large scale in Japanese enterprises unless they can be sure of having a voice in the direction of the enterprise at times of crisis. However, when the Code becomes definitely applicable to foreigners, we do not see how they can be prevented from enjoying the privileges it confers, even though special discriminations be attempted against them in the regulations of companies. After July, the foreigner will be legally entitled to purchase, in his own name, any shares—speaking generally—that may be offered in the market, and his ownership of them will carry with it the same rights as those possessed by a Japanese shareholder. It seems to us that no company can lawfully discriminate against him.

THE NEW TARIFF.

Consumers seem likely to be the chief gainers by the enterprise that importers have shown in forestalling the new Tariff. Yokohama now contains a stock of goods far in excess of any demand likely to spring up during the next few months, and their holders, being shrewd men of business, will lose no possible chance of unloading. The situation is virtually in the hands of the Japanese. They know what commodities have arrived, and they can lay their own plans to take full advantage of the pressure that will soon begin to be felt as interest, warehouse charges, and insurance accumulate. That familiar ring of monopolists, of whom we used to hear so much in the days of the Machigai-sho and the Nisukuri-jo, will close more relentlessly than ever round the Settlement, and make capital out of the inevitable competition which places the foreigner at their mercy. It would be a curious dispensation of providence if the last few months of the Settlement's secluded existence should prove the most irksome era in the history of its isolation. We sincerely hope not; independently of the selfish fact that all of us are in the same boat, and that rough weather affects us all alike, there is the special consideration that a discontented mood in Yokohama would be a most unfortunate prelude to the inauguration of the new regimen next July. When times are hard, the foreign community is proverbially exigent—which is human nature—and since with all the best will on each side there can not fail to be causes of friction at the time of the old order's change, it will be an unkind stroke on fate's part if she adds commercial adversity to the general complication. What a curse, after all, are import tariffs! What an uncivilized, clumsy method of raising revenue! The more enterprising a man is, and the larger his contribution to the comfort of the community at large, the more heavily he is fined and penalized. A century hence, when all the enlightened States of the world have instituted the Single Tax, the story of this benighted era will be read with amusement and contempt.

PENDING QUESTIONS.

The President of the House of Representatives has talked very freely to a representative of the Fiji Shimpō about questions which he considers likely to occupy a large share of political attention in the immediate future. At the head of the list he places Cabinet reconstruction. Marquis Yamagata has no desire to retain office, and the Liberals are naturally anxious to come into the substance of power instead of grasping the shadow as they are doing at present. But it is not likely that there will be any change until the end of the Diet's session. Then Marquis Ito will probably be persuaded to resume the control of the administration, and his Cabinet will include Mr. Hiroshi, Baron Ito and Suyematsu, and other Liberals.

The second question is the amendment of the Law of Election. Mr. Kataoka thinks—and no one should be better qualified to speak—that the Liberals are opposed to the Government's programme of giving fuller representation to the manufacturing and commercial classes. The Government wants to have one member returned by every fifty thousand inhabitants of the urban districts, and one by every hundred and twenty thousand inhabitants of the rural districts. But the Liberals wish to make no discrimination; they propose one member for every hundred thousand inhabitants, whether in urban or in rural regions. Then there is another difference of opinion about the method of voting. The Government advocates unsigned single ballots, the Liberals advocate unsigned plural ballots. It is certain, however, that by whatever majority the Liberals carry their point in the Lower House, the Peers will endorse the Government's programme. Hence a conference of the Houses must take place, and, if any agreement is evolved, it must be a compromise.

Of course the State purchase of private railways stands next on the list. Mr. Kataoka is not very explicit about that question. The chief information we gather from his remarks is that the project has very large support. The Premier himself is in favour of it; so is Viscount Aoki; so is Viscount Katsura; so is Viscount Yoshikawa; and even Count Matsukata can not be said to be in opposition. The great problem is how to accomplish the transaction. Can it be effected by means of bonds only, or must some hard cash be employed? Evidently the ways and means are still in the clouds.

Then the members of the Lower House want to make a coup on their own account; want to place themselves on a level with the inferior grade of Chokunin officials in the matter of salary. They talk of increasing their annual allowance of 800 yen to 3,000, or to 2,500, or to 1,800. There may be differences of opinion about other problems, political or economical, but all parties are said to be tolerably unanimous in desiring an increase of emoluments. Nothing more would be necessary to impair the nation's confidence in its legislators. Here are folks who think the State too poor to allow a few thousand yen annually for purposes of investigating the vitally important subject of linguistic reform, and yet they propose to increase the Treasury's charges on account of their own emoluments by a sum of from 400,000 to 880,000 yen.

The last question alluded to by Mr. Kataoka—we ourselves would put it first—is that of making up the deficiency of revenue resulting from the Liberals' reduction of the proposed rate of Land Tax. The Liberals suggest the Tobacco Monopoly as the most suitable source. But the Government can not make the tobacco monopoly do what it expected of it even under existing circumstances. So the situation will probably eventuate in the levying of several new imposts and the increasing of some old ones. That is the kind of quagmire of unsound finance into which the Liberals have plunged the country by their pettifoggery policy.

ROBBERIES WITH VIOLENCE IN RAILWAY CARRIAGES.

Robberies with violence in railway carriages are becoming unpleasantly frequent in Japan. The Sanyo Railway lately acquired some notoriety in that respect, and a case is now reported on the road of the Nippon Railway Company. The victim in this case was the guard of the train which left Awamori for Tokyo at 5.50 a.m. on the 1st instant. At Sannohe, in Iwate prefecture, which station the train left at 12.50 p.m., a thief seems to have entered the brake-van and secreted himself without attracting notice. Scarcely had the train pulled out when he attacked the guard and inflicted two disabling wounds, one on the face, the other on the skull. He then cut open the guard's satchel, and, taking from it some 1,200 yen which the guard had collected at the various stations en route, leaped from the carriage. Nothing was known of the occurrence until the train reached Fukuoka, when the porters found Yoshinari, the guard, lying in a pool of blood, but not dead. He was carried to hospital, where he explained that the first blow was dealt as he was in the act of closing the window. His idea is that the thief entered by the window, but such a theory seems scarcely tenable. The distance between Sannohe and the next station on the south, Fukuoka, is only 11½ miles, so the ruffian had not much time to achieve his purpose. The indications are that he was a person well versed in the affairs of the railway, and there is a suspicion that he is one of 480 employees who were recently dismissed by the Company.

General Borgnis-Desbordes, the newly-appointed Commander-in-Chief of the troops of Indo China to replace General Bichot, is a man some fifty years old, and has seen a deal of service on the Niger and in the Soudan.

THE NATIONAL UNIONISTS

Rumours which seem to be well founded say that the National Unionists have decided to dissolve their separate organization and join the ranks of the Liberals. Viscount Shinagawa is said to have opposed the movement at first, but to have ultimately fallen into line with it when its supporters obtained an overwhelming majority. It appears to us that the National Unionists are acting very wisely. The independent existence of a petty party commanding only 20 votes in the Lower House and not having any special platform to defend, is an anomaly which can not be too soon done away with. It does not follow, however, that the disappearance of the National Unionists will reduce the occupants of the political arena to two parties. We are strongly disposed to think that Messrs. Shimada Saburo and Taguchi Ukichi will soon find themselves at the head of a not inconsiderable following. The established ability of these two politicians and their very high character can not fail to attract adherents, and their principles constitute the first acceptable platform for the "business-men." It is well-known that many of the latter are opposed to the system of army expansion adopted under Marquis Ito's post-bellum programme. At that point they find themselves in direct contact with Messrs. Shimada and Taguchi, and, though they may have hesitated hitherto, in the absence of resolute leaders, to translate their views into the form of a political organization, they are not unlikely to derive the necessary encouragement from the appearance of two eminent men inviting co-operation not only in the matter of reduced military armaments, but also for other projects of industrial and commercial utility. The only difficulty in the way of our forecast is that a majority of the business-men of Japan evidently consider nothing more important at the present juncture than to give stability to the Cabinet, under whatever leadership it be organized, and will therefore hesitate before pledging themselves as members of an organization which would not be in full sympathy with any ministry now conceivable.

It appears that the National Unionists have not by any means made up their minds to become absorbed into the ranks of the Liberal Constitutionalists. They have dissolved their organization and are now hesitating what to do with themselves. Messrs. Motoda and Ooka are said to be in favour of joining the Constitutionalists, but Mr. Sasa and the Kumamoto Unionists think that the wiser plan would be to recast the party on independent lines. The idea of Mr. Sasa and his friends appears to be an alliance with Messrs. Shimada Saburo, Taguchi Ukichi, the Hyoshi Club and various business men. They are said to have failed in persuading Mr. Shimada Saburo, but to have had some success with the members of the Hyoshi Club. No doubt they would wield much greater influence in the political field as an independent organization than they could hope to wield as mere units of the big Liberal Party. But if they care to promote the smooth working of the constitutional system, they should seek to eliminate all petty and paralyzing subdivisions, and endeavour to bring about the occupation of the arena by two great parties alone.

THE NEXT POLITICAL QUESTION.

It appears probable that there will be some friction over the next great political question which the Diet has to consider, namely, the amendment of the Law of Election. No marked difference of opinion exists with regard to the proposed enlargement of electoral districts on other matters of organization, but the manner of voting excites much discussion in consequence of its important bearing upon party potentialities. The scheme of amendment drafted by the last Ito Cabinet provided for single ballots (tanki tōhyō); that is to say, ballots bearing the name of only one candidate, each elector putting in as many ballots as there are members to be returned. But the majority in the House of Representatives altered that part of the Bill in the sense that plural ballots (renki tōhyō) should be cast, each elector writing upon one ballot the names of all the members for whom he voted. Of course the latter system greatly enhances the power of political parties and correspondingly diminishes the independence of electors. The Bill failed to come up for discussion in the House of Peers, owing to the dissolution of the Lower Chambers. Subsequently it was understood that the Liberal Party had been converted to the principle of the single ballot, which the present Cabinet advocates just as strongly as did the Ito Ministry. But rumour now alleges that the Liberals have reverted to their old view, evidently in the interests of party organization, and that they are claiming the Cabinet's acquiescence in consideration of the aid they rendered to pass the Land-Tax Bill. On the other hand, it is quite certain that the Peers will not agree to a law embodying the plural ballot, so, if the Liberals maintain their attitude, the Election Law can not be amended, and the question will drift into the quagmire where the Press Law lay engulfed for several years, both Houses being desirous of amending it, but neither being willing to subserve its views to those of the other. Meanwhile we notice with surprise that no journal or publicist raises the question of minority representation. This would seem to be the most appropriate occasion for engrafting that important feature on the Japanese election system, but apparently every one shrinks from raising the issue. Perhaps the explanation is that Japanese statesmen and politicians are anxious to avoid everything which might tend to encumber the arena with petty factions. One of the great troubles hitherto has been division of strength. Instead of two great parties, each competent to assume and carry on the duties of administration, there have been a number of coteries, all impotent independently for anything but mischief. Very likely it is thought that the problem of the representation of minorities can be conveniently left for solution at some future date.

COUNT OKUMA AND HIS OMORI CRITIC.

A present resident of Omori, who contributes various articles to the foreign-settlement press, disagrees with Count Okuma's opinion that the foreign trade of Japan has made remarkable strides during the past twenty-five years. We express no opinion as to the general question at issue between the Waseda Sage and his Omori critic, but there is one feature of the latter's arithmetic which startles us. He says that, in 1872, Japan's external trade totalled some fifty million yen, which, with the dollar at 4s. 6d., means 11½ millions sterling—we use approximate figures—, whereas in 1897 the total figure was 290 million yen, or 29 million sterling. Hence, he concludes, the increase in a quarter of a century was only 17 or 18 millions sterling. That is certainly a quaint method of calculation, intelligible only on the hypothesis that for a Briton money has no statistical significance unless it be expressed in sovereigns. Why should Japan's export trade be converted into sterling? Does the Omori critic really imagine that every million yen worth of commodities exported by Japan in 1897, with the yen at 25 pence, represented only 463,000 yen worth of commodities exported in 1872 with the yen at 54d.? In order to justify such an assertion, he would have to show that the silver prices of commodities in Japan fell, between 1872 and 1897, in exactly the same ratio as the appreciation of gold in terms of silver, which can not be shown, being greatly opposed to facts. Why, again, should Japan's imports from silver-using countries be converted into sterling? They have nothing to do with sterling. To express them in terms of gold which fluctuated enormously in purchasing power, instead of adhering to their original silver prices, which remained comparatively stable, is to introduce an arbitrary and misleading factor which has no legitimate place in the equation. The only portion of Japan's foreign trade reasonably subject to conversion into sterling for purposes of statistical comparison from year to year, is the imports from gold-using countries, and even there a mere statement of pounds, shillings and pence is misleading, for since gold prices fell largely between 1872 and 1897, a sovereign's worth of imports in the latter year represented a larger bulk, and therefore a greater consumption, than a sovereign's worth of the same goods in the former year. It would be a difficult problem to establish a really accurate comparison between Japan's foreign trade in 1872 and 1897, if the statement had to be made in values, but it would also be difficult to depart more widely from the truth than the Omori critic departs.

A WINTER RETREAT.

A Correspondent writes:—"Some of your readers often think, no doubt, where they can find a warm and equable climate in January. Why do they not try the Loochoo Islands. The suggestion is well worth consideration. The Japanese tea-house at Naha is quite comfortable, and the Governor, Baron Narabara, is most kind, courteous and hospitable to foreigners. Acting on my suggestion Mr. and Mrs. Clutterbuck went there early this month, and it may interest their many friends to know that they arrived safely and purpose spending a month or so there. I myself was much attracted by the capacities of Naha for a winter residence. It is considerably warmer at this time of year than northern Formosa; the town and the streets are clean, and the quiet of the place makes it an ideal retreat for a student."

MR. OKURA'S COMMERCIAL SCHOOL.

The building of Mr. Okura Kihachiro's commercial school has commenced; or, to speak more accurately, the work of collecting materials has begun. The site is No. 3 Aoi-cho, Akasaka; in other words, the valley lying on the east of Reinanzaka within the enclosure generally called Yamato-yashiki. This land has long been Mr. Okura's property. He has built his own residence just above it, and many persons attributed to him the intention of gradually absorbing the whole valley into the park attached to his villa. But that forecast proves fallacious. When the school is finished, it will stand in much the same relation to Mr. Okura's residence as the Technical College at Waseda stands to Count Okuma's beautiful suburban villa. That is a very appropriate arrangement. It helps to sustain the patron's interest in the results of his philanthropy, and to preserve the students' memory of a public-spirited act which should be among the aims of every successful career. The edifice for the school is to be of brick and stone. It will cover an area of 1,400 square yards, and the cost, we imagine, will be about 150,000 yen. Mr. Okura's donation is half a million yen, and he has already handed over one-fifth of that sum to the committee of counsellors who are assisting him to carry out the enterprise—Mr. Shibusawa, Surgeon-General Ishiguro, Mr. Watanabe Koki, and other prominent personages. We do not know whether the cost of the land is included in the donation. Probably it is, for, however, munificent Mr. Okura's disposition, he is not likely to regard thirty thousand yen worth of land as a mere extra, not worth entering in the account. Probably when the school is built and equipped, it will be found that not more than 250,000 yen remains for an endowment fund; that is to say, a yearly income of twelve or thirteen thousand yen, enough to pay for the staff of foreign professors, if it be not numerous. It is a pity there are not more people of Mr. Okura's way of thinking and acting. Japan is badly in want of them.

THE STATE RAILWAY QUESTION.

It is impossible to form any distinct idea of the programme mapped out for the state purchase of private railways. One day the Tokyo journals tell us one thing; the next, another. Recently their version was that the average annual net profits of the lines during the past five years were to be taken as the unit of value, and the shareholders were to receive twenty units in the form of five-per cent. bonds, with a pre-redemption period of 25 years. That was at least intelligible, though somewhat startling in the matter of liberality. But now a different story is told, namely, that the average profits of the lines are to be calculated as above, and that bonds are to be given in the case of lines whose profits amount to 5 per cent. of their invested capital. What is to be done with lines whose profits exceed, or fall short of, that figure we are not told. On the whole it appears probable that no definite project has yet been drafted, and that these varying rumours reflect the perplexity of those engaged on the task.

CABINET CHANGES.

There have been mutterings in the air for some time, presaging the approach of another political storm, and now the newspapers of Tokyo read the barometer with remarkable unanimity. The Liberal organ (Jimmin) is the most outspoken. It says frankly that the Liberals want to get the administrative reins into their hands, and it gives several reasons for believing that they will succeed. Secondary reasons they are, for the most part, the overshadowing argument being that the Liberals have not been working for the pretty eyes of the Yamagata Cabinet; that they don't mean to be put off with a few trivial sops, such as Vice-Minister-ships and Provincial Governorships, and that, so far from immolating themselves on the altar of the Cabinet's security, they intend to immolate the Cabinet on the altar of their own ambition. The Yomiuri, which delights in seeming to see into all secret places, declares that when Marquis Yamagata visited Oiso on the 3rd inst., he elicited a promise from Marquis Ito that the latter would take his place in a few weeks, and further that there has been a secret agreement in that sense between the Cabinet and the Liberals ever since the latter undertook to support the former's measures in the Diet. The Mainichi Shimbun points to Mr. Hoshi Toru as the biggest figure in the political arena; says that he has gradually raised himself into prominence on a securely built pedestal, and adds that he possesses the full confidence of Marquis Yamagata, though he is not in the good graces of Mr. Kioura and the latter's friends.

Apart from "revelations" which have no apparent claim to credence, there appears to be a great deal of truth in the theory that Marquis Yamagata is not at all desirous of retaining office, his health being very precarious, and his original acceptance of the Premiership having been explicitly temporary. Equally true is it that the relation between Marquis Ito and the Liberals is much closer than the relation between Marquis Yamagata and the Liberals. The latter's first coöperation was with the Ito Cabinet in 1896, and Marquis Ito identified himself with them in 1897 by going out of office because he could not retain the assistance of Count Itagaki. The public, we imagine, long ago made up its mind that a renewal of the union between Marquis Ito and the Liberals is the most prominent phenomenon on the political horizon. But what kind of union will it be? Will Marquis Ito definitely join the Liberal Party? If he does, we shall see something like stable government once more. If he does not, the old shadow of unrest will obscure the prospect; the old outcry about "clan statesmen" will spoil the harmony. Already, indeed, the Liberal organ is renewing that complaint, possesses, to be sure! If anything has been thoroughly discredited, completely turned into ridicule, surely that thing is the charge against clan statesmanship. Had not the men trained under the so-called "clan system" stood quietly and efficiently at their posts during the recent welter and confusion of party dissension and scrambles for office how would it have fared with the administration? Still it has come evidently to this, and there is not the slightest use in blinking the fact, that the parties will regard every one as an opponent who does not cast his lot in with them for good or for evil, and that until the Meiji Statesmen abandon their present semblance of independence—it is the veriest semblance—there will be no such thing as political calm or administrative stability. Very little is wanting to confer solidity on the organizations of the two great parties. That little is the enrolment of the Meiji statesmen in their ranks. Marquis Ito and Count Okuma stand out prominently as the natural heads of the two parties. If Marquis Ito and some of his eminent coadjutors joined the Liberals, and in combination with the latter formed a Ministry, we believe that it might reckon on three or four years of existence. But if Marquis Ito resumes office merely with the coöperation of the Liberals, he will never succeed in satisfying them so as to retain their allegiance for any length of time, and he will have to purchase it from the first by concessions hard to make and harder to implement. Such, at any rate, is the aspect which the situation presents to us, but it must be confessed that Marquis Ito's political sagacity has been too well proved to justify outside criticism.

THE QUADRUPLE ALLIANCE AND LORD CHARLES BERESFORD.

If persistence in ventilating a project could contribute much to its realization, the Yomiuri Shimbun would have helped materially to bring about the quadruple alliance, America, Germany, Japan, and England. Throughout the past year our contemporary has unremittingly preached the desirability of such a consummation, and it now undertakes to demonstrate the immense value of the substance since even the shadow has proved so efficacious. In other words, the Yomiuri thinks that had it not been for all this talk about an alliance between the four Powers, a great many sinister contingencies which have happily been averted would have become accomplished facts. Russia and France are the bugbears. Had not the Damoclean sword of the alliance been hanging over their heads, they would by this time have linked arm in arm, and set out to trample East Asia under foot. The coming of Lord Charles Beresford suggests itself to our contemporary as an unique opportunity to bring the alliance into the field of practical politics. His lordship has been the first British statesman to give public utterance to the idea of expanding the alliance. The foundation was England and Japan. Then America was added. From the moment of her emergence from the Monroe shell there could be no doubt as to which branch of the family of nations would attract her sympathy. So, for a time, the talk was England, Japan, and America. Then men gradually yielded to a conviction, long latent but seldom seriously suggested, that Germany's proper place was in the same camp. Lord Charles Beresford came and boldly enunciated the idea. Its ready acceptance is the best proof of its propriety. Why, the Yomiuri asks, should not his lordship's arrival in Japan be made the occasion for consummating the scheme?

It is a pity that Mr. Fukuzawa has ceased to be an active figure in public life. An Anglo-Japanese alliance has been his dream for many years, and, were he not incapacitated by ill-health, we can conjecture the enthusiasm he would throw into preparations for greeting Lord Charles Beresford, and for organizing demonstrations such as should afford to the British nation an unequivocal idea of Japan's mood. That is about as far as the alliance scheme is likely to get at present, we imagine. The first important preliminary is to impress upon England's mind the conviction that the Japanese nation—not merely a coterie of Japanese statesmen or publicists, but the Japanese nation as a whole—is genuinely anxious to throw in its lot with Anglo-Saxondom in this part of the world. The Japanese are curiously timid in their public utterances. They generally speak with bated breath and leave their hearers in a good deal of doubt as to their real sentiments. That is all very right and proper where a responsible statesman is concerned, but the force behind the statesman should not be always masked, or it becomes impossible for foreign Powers to forecast his attitude in any given contingency. The Japanese might advantageously cultivate a little expansiveness in the presence of Lord Charles Beresford, and contrive that he shall carry away a clear conception of what they think and feel about the Far-Eastern Question. We observe that the Nippon is writing vigorously about the reception to be given to Lord Charles. It does not claim for him such a welcome as Lord Beaconsfield received in Germany at the time of the Berlin Conference, or Earl Li in Moscow at the Coronation of the Czar, on both of which occasions there was much error of excess; but it calls him a friend of great value to the Japanese empire and hopes that he will have a rousing reception. We echo the hope. Japan has set a pretty high standard for herself in the matter of entertaining foreign magnates, but she has not hitherto had an opportunity of receiving any one who occupies such a prominent place in the vista of the British nation as that occupied by Lord Charles Beresford. It will conduce to her own interests that she should show her appreciation of the fact. Manœuvres by the Standing Squadron and a review of the Tokyo garrison will be well enough in their way, but what Lord Charles wants is to get at the heart of the nation and the convictions of its statesmen.

AN INTERESTING SEPULCHRE.

In the vicinity of the well-known temple Kōmyōji at Kamakura, a sepulchre presenting some features of interest has been discovered. It is on the side of a hill, which was sold some time ago to a Mr. Saito Kwangen, who proceeded to construct a restaurant there. A few days ago, when clearing away a bank, Mr. Saito's employes found a hole which, on examination, proved to be the entrance of a sepulchre containing five gorin-no-to—stone pagodas—of exceptionally fine workmanship, and two tomb-stones, one bearing the date "3d month of the 2nd year of Shōhei (April, 1333) and the other that of Kōmū ushi-no-toshi shigatsu jū go nichi (May 19th, 1334). These dates carry us back to the time when Hōjō Takatoki was overthrown by Nitta Yoshisada, but beyond the fact that the sepulchre must be that of some very great magnate—probably the Shōgun himself—nothing can be said at present.

A SERVICEABLE SOP.

A Kobe journal explains what is necessary to secure the smooth working of the Revised Treaties. It is a very simple expedient; nothing more difficult than that foreigners be granted a license to call the Japanese Government bad names. The Kobe journal has offered its own conduct as an object lesson. It charged the Japanese Government with having committed "a serious infraction of Treaty rights." We denied that there had been any such infraction, and set forth the reasons for our denial. Then the Kobe journal fell into a ferment. "The Revised Treaties can never work smoothly," it cried, "in the presence of a journalistic agent provocateur who persists in interrupting our denunciations of the Japanese. The existence of such an agent will form an actual menace to the personal security of foreigners in the country, besides being calculated to create trouble between the Japanese Government and the Foreign Representatives. Can he not be compelled to leave us alone? All we want is to be suffered to abuse the Japanese without let or hindrance. What does it matter that we accuse the Japanese Government of violating the Treaties and adopting secret devices to evade its international obligations? Let us have our fling and all will go smoothly. These contradictions injure the cordial relations that ought properly to subsist between Japanese and foreigners, whereas if our charges were left unanswered, there would not be any friction whatever." 'Tis a peculiar plea but it should not be dismissed inconspicuously because of its oddity. We can not imagine that it would be likely to prove widely efficacious, but its limited applicability is an argument in its favour, for if the chorus of licensees were large, it might prove a public nuisance. We suggest that a good broad hoarding be erected at a convenient part of Kobe—in Division Street, for example—and that ample provision of chalk pencils be made. There the licensed revilers should be permitted to write up any diatribes that suited their fancy, and the police should be instructed to prevent the approach of any agent provocateur who might be so mischievous as to erase the abusive legends. The experiment is worth trying since some opportunity to be uninterruptedly abusive is so earnestly pleaded for.

NEW FRENCH DUTIES ON SILK FABRICS.

Japan is not going to submit without a struggle to the imposition of greatly increased import duties by France on silk fabrics from the East. The Kyoto Nishijin Association have petitioned the Foreign Office on the subject, and it is said that Viscount Aoki has instructed the Japanese Representative in Paris to enter a protest. But Japan's hands are tied in such matters. She has no way of giving force to her protest. Her new commercial treaties with Western States run for a fixed period of twelve years, and all her treaty friends are guaranteed the enjoyment of equal facilities in Japan, whatever discrimination each may exercise against Japanese products and manufactures entering its own territories.

THE NEW CHINESE PERIODICAL OF YOKOHAMA.

The Seigi-ho has made its appearance. Our readers doubtless remember that it is a ten-day periodical edited by Mr. Leung Kei-chiu, the principal pupil of Kang Yu-wei. The opening article is in an optimistic strain. The writer thinks that China's darkest hour is past, and that the dawn of day must soon become visible. It is true that the principal ground of his faith seem to be the fact that things can not conceivably become blacker than they are already in the unhappy empire—the spirit of manly righteousness is dead; there are no statesmen to reform the administration; there is none to sacrifice himself for the country. Still the Seigi-ho—for those very reasons, in fact—feels convinced that a better time is soon coming. It tells us that its programme is, first, to encourage political integrity in China and to rouse political feeling among the people; secondly, to develop Chinese intelligence; thirdly, to promote cordial intercourse between Japanese and Chinese; and fourthly, to preserve what is good in East-Asian civilization.

THE PROPOSED ASSOCIATIONS OF MEDICAL MEN.

Among a good many objections urged by the Fiji Shimpō to the Bill now before the House of Representatives for organizing associations of medical men throughout the Empire, one seems decidedly worthy of attention. It is that of the forty thousand practitioners now holding diplomas, nearly twenty-seven thousand, or two-thirds, are disciples of the old Chinese School. These "experts" are an evidence of the difficulties that have beset Japan's passage from the old to the new. Licenses to practise were given to them, not as a recognition of their competence, but in deference to their vested rights and to the convenience of the public at large. It would have been an intolerable hardship to deprive these men arbitrarily of their professional opportunities, and, at the same time, to deprive the people of their services. The latter would have been the greater hardship of the two, for we need scarcely say that, fifteen or twenty years ago, there were millions of conservative folks in Japan who had inherited from their forefathers a traditional faith in the Chinese system of medicine, and who could not have been induced to place themselves or their families under the treatment of foreign-school practitioners. Such a feeling was perfectly natural; and no Government would have been justified in doing violence to it. Doubtless the number of the conservatives has largely diminished by this time, and so has the number of Kampō Isha, as the Chinese school of doctors are called. But there remain some twenty-seven thousand of the latter, and Japan must wait until time relieves her of their presence. Now the point is that they would have to be admitted to the proposed Associations on equal terms with every-one else, and, being in an overwhelming majority, might impose regulations of at least a retrogressive character. They are harmless enough individually, but, once organized and enabled to bring their numerical strength to bear, they would become a dangerous element in the medical world. It is a curious and interesting objection, not by any means to be lightly regarded. But of course it could easily be surmounted by adding to the proposed Law a provision in the sense that all measures enacted by the Medical Associations must receive the approval of the Central Sanitary Bureau and of the Department of Home Affairs.

FORMOSAN NEWS.

The intelligence from Formosa continues to indicate a very disturbed state of affairs. It seems that the trouble is now in the extreme south of the island. A telegram from Tainan, dated the 30th ultimo, says that a band of insurgents attacked the local office (hemmu-sho) at Chüchiu—the day of the assault is not mentioned—and obtained possession of it, killing the officer in command and three of the garrison. A second telegram, dispatched from Tainan on the 31st ultimo, reports that the office was retaken by the detachment of troops stationed in the district, the morning after its fall. The struggle to recapture it lasted four hours, however, though nothing is stated as to the casualties on the Japanese side. The insurgents seem to have possessed artillery, for the telegram says that their cannon were seized. We say "were," but "was" may be the correct form of speech. The ambiguity of the Japanese language frequently renders it impossible to distinguish whether a translation should be in the singular or in the plural. The rebels are said to have had 80 men killed. Still farther south, namely, at Kōshun and in its neighbourhood, great disorder is reported to prevail. The country about Kōshun is mountainous. Military operations must be very difficult there.

Speaking of Formosa—incidentally, not with reference to the above intelligence—the Yomiuri Shimbun contends that Japan's policy, in so far as it can be called a fixed policy, is defective. She began by adopting the system of assimilation (Dōkwa shugi), such as is pursued by France in Tonquin, and then she turned to the policy of conciliation (Kwai-ju shugi), exemplified by England's dealings in India. Conciliation seems to have produced the worst possible results. It is evidently misapprehended. The Yomiuri does not appear to draw any deterrent inference from the signal failure of France's methods in all her colonies, notably Tonquin. We confess that when we find a leading Japanese journal writing in such a strain at this eleventh hour, we feel more than ever pessimistic about Formosan administration. At any rate, whether conciliation be wise or unwise, the incidents now reported from the south of the island can not be regarded as a result of conciliation for the trial of that policy was made in the north. We do not ourselves believe in conciliation where mere bandits are concerned. If the disturbers of the peace in Formosa were patriots fighting for their country's independence, it might be very well to seek their goodwill by leniency and tactfulness. But mere robbers and raiders are beyond the pale of such treatment. It is a fair conclusion that when a man who has been engaged pillaging and murdering is offered money and pardon instead of handcuffs and a felon's cell, he will be disposed to infer that the Authorities, unable to mete out to him his deserts, see no recourse except to purchase his forbearance. We have been told that the bandits in the North of Formosa "sleeved" the silver given to them by the Japanese, and, carrying off their written pardons, used them as official commissions to levy blackmail from the unfortunate people! The only course to pursue with such vermin is to exterminate them. But surely the policy to be adopted towards Formosa in general should not be based upon lessons learned from these banditti who are at least as antipathetic to the peaceful inhabitants of the island as to its Japanese conquerors?

THE DOSHISHA.

The vernacular press states that the Trustees and Faculty of the Doshisha have resolved to resign en masse, leaving the adjustment of the now famous affair in the hands of the Kō-yū, or "friends of the school," by which term we understand the former graduates and other persons prominently connected with the institution. This step is regarded as preliminary to the restoration of the portions of the constitution the alteration of which provoked such determined action on the part of the American Board. Should the forecast prove correct, we may hope to see the Doshisha restored to its old status and enjoying once more the active coöperation of the American Board Mission. On the other hand, the School would then forfeit the recognition of the Educational Department, and its students would cease to enjoy the great privilege conferred by such recognition, exemption from conscription up to the age of twenty-seven. We wonder when that crying abuse will be eliminated from the educational system of Japan. At present it may be broadly stated that no Japanese parent can obtain for his son an education with which religious instruction is combined. The penalty of choosing such an education is that the lad becomes liable to conscription at twenty-one.

A great deal of surprise has been expressed, and we ourselves have shared the feeling, that conscientious men like Mr. Yokoi and the Trustees of the Doshisha could reconcile themselves to the course they adopted when they abolished Christian teaching from the curriculum of an institution founded by people who gave their money expressly to have Christianity taught. We have recently heard an explanation which sounds very rational. It is that Mr. Yokoi's course would probably have escaped protest had not the quality of his own Christianity been open to doubt. For instance, had Dr. Nishima's life been preserved, and had he, at this juncture of the Doshisha's career, considered it expedient to take the step taken by Mr. Yokoi, the American Board would not have raised any objection since every one would have believed that if Mr. Nishima deemed it expedient, in the temporal interests of the institution, to dispense with the nominal teaching of Christianity, he would have taken care to provide some other means of conserving Christian influences. But the American Board Missionaries did not feel the same confidence about Mr. Yokoi, who had shown himself to be a Christian of somewhat broad views. In other words, Mr. Yokoi and the Trustees did not make to expediency any greater sacrifice than Mr. Nishima himself might have deemed justifiable. They believed that they could preserve Christian influences so as to render the institution virtually Christian, but unfortunately their estimate of the amount of Christian influence claiming preservation did not command the full trust of the American patrons and coöperators. That explanation was suggested not by a Japanese but by a Christian missionary. It seems to be quite within the bounds of reason. We ourselves have never doubted Mr. Yokoi's sincerity. No one acquainted with him could doubt it, and we question whether it could be doubted by any one reading his vindication which appeared in the Far East. The difficulty was, however, to find a working theory for his conduct.

FRANCE IN CHINA.

A telegram from Peking published by the Asahi Shimbun says that France has raised an objection to Japan's acquisition of the Formosa-Amoy submarine cable, and that the transfer has been interrupted. The intelligence is scarcely credible. If France had any interest in the matter—and truly we fail to see how a claim can be made out on her behalf—she ought to have made her voice heard long ago. The Chinese Government, at the time of the cession of Formosa, definitely pledged itself to hand over the cable, and the fact that the pledge had been given was publicly known. France should have objected then, if she had a mind or a reason to object. Besides, it was openly announced, a month ago, that China was about to implement her pledge, and the two Houses of the Japanese Diet passed a supplementary budget providing for the compensation to be paid to the Government in Peking. It is a most belated proceeding on France's part to step in at this eleventh hour. We are disposed to think that the telegram is baseless.

THE CENTRAL TABERNACLE.

After undergoing somewhat extensive repairs, the Central Tabernacle at No. 23 Haruki-cho, Hongo, in Tokyo, was reopened for divine service on the 3rd inst. at 2 p.m. Addresses of some length were delivered by Mr. Ebara, M.P., and the Rev. John Scott, D.D., and these were followed by short speeches of congratulation by several Japanese and foreigners. Many of our readers are familiar with the origin of this Tabernacle and with the indefatigable exertions made by its founder, the Rev. C. Eby, D.D., who appreciated, and was happily enabled to meet, the great want of a suitable hall for holding religious meetings and affording facilities for Christian purposes in general in Tokyo. Lecture meetings are being held every evening during the present week up to Sunday, the 8th instant, on which day also at 2.30 p.m. the Rev. Dr. Imbrie is to preach. We learn also that on Saturday, the 14th instant, at 6.30 p.m., there is to be a concert of both Japanese and foreign music, the proceeds of which will be devoted to defraying the expenses of the repairs which have considerably exceeded the original estimate. We need hardly say that the assistance of charitably disposed people is cordially invited for this good work. There are hundreds of students in Tokyo to whom the Tabernacle is proving of great moral benefit, and it would be difficult to name any object better deserving the assistance of philanthropists.

THE BOOK-SHELF.

A Handbook for Travellers in Japan: London, John Murray; Yokohama, Messrs. Kelly and Walsh, Ltd.

THE fifth edition of "A Handbook for Travellers in Japan" has been published. The authors, Messrs. Chamberlain and Mason, explain in the preface that "the existing routes have been carefully revised so as to fit with the recent rapid extension of the Japanese railway system," and that "much new matter has been added," among the latter being Formosa. It appears, however, that the amount of information obtainable about Formosa was not very full, for only some six pages of the Handbook are devoted to it. The map, too, is disappointing. Only about thirty places in the island are marked, and some are indicated by their Japanese names, while some have their Chinese or Formosan. An element of most inconvenient confusion has been introduced into the geography of Korea by the custom of the Japanese, who employ their own method of pronouncing Chinese ideographs. Thus only students of ideographs can identify the places spoken of by Tokyo journals when they refer to Formosan affairs, and it appears to us that the authors of the Handbook would have been well advised had they shown on the map, in every case, both the Japanese and the local names. They have frequently done so in the text of their description, but they do not seem to have any uniform system. We expect a great deal from this Handbook, for it has long come to be regarded as a kind of encyclopedia of useful information about Japan, and doubtless by the time when a sixth edition is called for, the Formosan section will have been brought up to the general level of excellence. A capital idea was to add a Japanese chronological table arranged in alphabetical order. Bramsen's chronological Tables have hitherto been the student's stand-by, but to find the year corresponding to a given era it is necessary with Bramsen's work to perform two operations—first, to pick out the era in his alphabetical list, and then to refer to the page where it is given. The table in the Handbook will save a great deal of trouble. Similarly arranged lists of the Emperors and Shoguns are added.

THE LATE REV. C. E. GARST.

RESOLUTIONS OF RESPECT.

The following resolutions have been adopted by the Foreign Christian Missionary Society's Committee in Japan:—

Whereas (1) God, in His wisdom, has seen fit to remove from among us our beloved brother, C. E. Garst, and

Whereas (2) this Mission is made to mourn the loss of a fellow worker and wise counsellor,—he senior member of our Mission, and

Whereas (3) his wife, our beloved fellow worker, Mrs. Laura De Lony Garst, is thereby necessarily withdrawn from the mission field;

Be it therefore resolved:

That (1) we mourn his loss, not as those who have no hope, but, in accord with what we know would be the wish of our brother, and the will of our Father in Heaven, we continue in the course he ran so well, and gained the victory;

That (2) we follow her and her children with our love and prayers, and esteem her as an absent member of this Mission.

THE KOBE LAND QUESTION.

THAT a great deal of heat should be displayed and some intemperate language employed journalistically in Kobe with reference to the question of the extra-Settlement lands, does not surprise us, for it is proverbial that nothing disturbs the moral equilibrium of an advocate, so much as the effort to defend a radically bad cause. There is, however, no possibility of obscuring the actual facts of the case. By diplomatic arrangement—which, it may be observed, never took the form of a written convention—foreigners were granted the privilege of leasing lands outside the limits of the Settlement of Hyogo at the mutual convenience of the lessor and the lessee. There was not the remotest hint of conferring a special character on the leases, nor can it have entered the conception of the negotiators that when Japanese subjects were permitted to lease their lands to foreigners, they were de facto permitted, thenceforth and for ever, to ignore the laws of their own country in doing so. The whole arrangement may be summed up in the statement that, within a certain area outside the Settlement, foreigners were placed on the same footing as Japanese subjects for purposes of land leasing. Had the diplomatic arrangement embodied specific conditions, had it provided for the privilege of perpetual leases, as had been provided with regard to land inside the Settlement, then of course it would have taken precedence of the laws of the empire. But it made no such provision. On the contrary, the only existing written record of it shows that the land outside the Settlement was explicitly differentiated from the land inside the Settlement for leasing purposes. In the face of these facts it is quite idle to pretend that the right to lease lands in perpetuity in the extra-Settlement area was guaranteed to foreigners by the arrangement. Sixteen years subsequently, in the course of the extensive legislation undertaken by the Government of the Restoration, regulations were issued for the guidance of Japanese land-owners in making leases with foreigners within the extra-Settlement area at Hyogo. These regulations fixed 25 years as the limit of a lease's duration, that period being the closest possible approximation to the custom of the locality, and being, moreover, a close approximation to the limit which Japanese legislators had decided to fix for ordinary leases. We remark, en passant, that a great deal of capital is made out of the fact that these regulations referred explicitly to dealings with foreigners, and we also note that we are accused of having falsely "represented them as a general Notification simply declaring the law on the subject of leases in general without particular reference to foreigners." We did nothing of the kind.

That phase of the question never entered our thoughts. Regulations intended to control a particular class of transactions naturally refer explicitly to those transactions. But the Kobe writers seem to set out with a thesis to prove, namely, that the Japanese Government deliberately devised and executed a secret scheme in 1884 for the purpose of evading the diplomatic arrangements concluded by it in 1868. Hence the use of the word "foreigners" in the regulations at once leads them to draw sinister inferences. It would be a mere waste of time to deal at any length with such arguments. The only point of importance is, were the Japanese Authorities competent to issue such regulations without breach of good faith towards foreigners or were they not competent. Had they given any kind of pledge as to the duration of leases between foreigners and Japanese outside the Settlement, or had they made any promise in the sense of exempting such transactions from the operation of the laws of the land then in existence or to be subsequently enacted? That point, the only crucial point, is carefully evaded by the Kobe writers. They beg the whole question by assuming that foreigners acquired a right to lease land in perpetuity, but how it was acquired, or what instrument conferred it, they make no attempt to show. And, of course, if the Japanese Authorities were competent to issue the regulations in question, they were under no manner of obligation to communicate them to the Foreign Consuls. The Foreign Consuls had only one function to perform with regard to the leases—the function of stamping and registering them. That remained unchanged, and beyond that their purview did not extend. It is stated, we observe, that the Japan Mail has been guilty of an untruth in alleging that "a law existed in Japan fixing 20 years as the maximum term for an ordinary land-lease." The Japan Mail made no such assertion. It said—"The general law of Japan fixes 20 years as the maximum term for an ordinary land lease but local custom used to have the force of law in these matters." As to the general law we spoke in the present; as to local custom which used to have the force of law, we spoke in the past. Custom is never a hard-and-fast law. It was often departed from before the enactment of the new Civil Code. Leases for long terms and even in perpetuity were frequently concluded. It is, indeed, very plain that but for the issue of the Hyogo Regulations in 1884, foreigners would generally have been able to obtain perpetual leases in the extra-Settlement area by offering sufficiently good terms, and their deprivation of that opportunity constituted the gravamen of the whole complaint. But it was not an opportunity to which they had any Conventional title. The Japanese Government, at an early period of the Meiji legislation, recognised the soundness of the principles laid down by the best modern jurists of Europe with reference to the tenure and transfer of land, and the conditions that should attach to its leasing. Recognising those principles, the Government was bound to make every possible provision for their enforcement, and it can not be reasonably pretended that because, in the absence of legislative direction, a few Japanese subjects happened to have leased lands in perpetuity to foreigners outside the Hyogo Settlement, the system thus fortuitously inaugurated must be given extension and must also be held for all time inviolably beyond the reach of the law-making power. We can easily imagine the epithets that would be heaped on the heads of the Japanese if they advanced such claims on their own behalf.

The Government of Japan, in withdrawing the 25-years restriction for the period of half-a-dozen months remaining before the operation of the new Treaties, has not, we are persuaded, made any acknowledgment that the imposition of that restriction was a violation of diplomatic engagements. It has merely made a liberal concession to foreign convenience. Ever since the Restoration of 1867, the Japanese Government may be truly said to have discharged its treaty obligations in a frank and fair spirit. When the Kobe Memorialists put their signatures last spring to a statement that "definite diplomatic stipulations form the only safeguard upon which foreigners can rely," and that "to be effective they must be vigilantly enforced," they allowed themselves to be betrayed into one of the most unjustifiable accusations ever publicly preferred. For their singularly blunt assertion that the Japanese Government can not be trusted to keep its international promises unless all opportunities of evading them are placed beyond its reach, they had absolutely no warrant except their own arbitrary interpretation of the words "foreigners and Japanese may in future make arrangements between themselves and at their own convenience, for leasing lands or houses." They construed the clause "at their own convenience" to mean "irrespective of all laws which may be hereafter duly enacted by the Government of the Empire," and because the Japanese Government failed to endorse that extraordinary construction, they denounced it as a Government requiring to be bound by definite diplomatic stipulations which to be effective must be vigilantly enforced. Of course we all understand how these Memorials are got up. Two or three active agitators do the whole work. Their fellow-residents play a purely passive part, scarcely reading what is offered to them for signature and quite content to take it for granted that the right thing is being done in the right way. We do not suggest for a moment that the leaders of such movements are insincere. On the contrary, they are generally men of high character and unselfish purpose. Certainly that was the case in Kobe. But they share the common proclivity to error, and the most charitable course with regard to the Kobe memorialists and the land question would be to let the curtain drop upon their mistakes. Unfortunately their champions can not be induced to preserve a discreet silence.

ANOTHER LIBERAL.

WE welcome the Kokumin Shimbun as another advocate of the liberal policy towards foreigners so ably advocated by journals like the Fiji Shimpō, the Nichi Nichi Shimbun, the Keisai Zasshi, and the Shogyo Shimpō. It has not always been the case that cosmopolitan sentiments were warmly preached by the Kokumin. Less than two years ago, we should have been disposed to class the Kokumin—above all, its associated periodical, the Kokumin-no-Tomo—among the leading Chauvinist newspapers of Tokyo, ranking in that respect with, but after, the Nippon, which has always worn the crown of Jingoism. A certain Secretary of Legation who interested himself considerably in Japan's ephemeral literature at that time, dubbed the Kokumin-no-Tomo the "cockey man at home," and it was an appropriate epithet. But the Kokumin now writes in an admirable strain. It reminds Japan of her record; how liberal eclecticism has always been the keynote of her national disposition ever since she had a history; how she invariably welcomed the stranger and encouraged him to settle within her gates, and how she freely learned from him everything he had to teach, awarding to him the honour and recompense that are a teacher's due. The time is rapidly approaching when she will have an opportunity of showing that this wise and serviceable mood survives, and that her appreciation of her own best interests as well as of her duties is not less clear and effective to-day than it was in remote times.

The truth of these reminiscences now noted by the Kokumin and frequently alluded to in the same general terms by the Fiji Shimpō, must have struck every careful student of Japanese history. It is not merely that the Japanese in ancient times placed no obstacles in the way of foreigners desiring to settle in the country, but also that they granted them official titles and gave them a large measure of authority. The most remote instances that occur to us are those recorded in the reign of the Emperor OJIN (271-310 A.D.) when weavers and embroiderers came from Korea to Japan, and the two great families of Shin and Kan were naturalized under leaders to whom were given the titles of Yumitsuki-no-Kimi and Aichi-no-Omi. A

Kimi or an Omi in those times corresponded with a departmental head in these modern days, and as such titles, from the era of their first institution by the Emperor SUININ (29 B.C. 70 A.D.), had been reserved for the patrician holders of hereditary offices, their bestowment on aliens indicated an extraordinary degree of liberality. A hundred and fifty years later, the members of the Shin family residing in Japan are said to have totalled 18,670 persons, and the Emperor YURIAKU had them organized under a Sake-no-Kimi, a descendant of the above Yumitsuki-no-Kimi. The same liberal disposition was shown in other directions. We find the Emperor BIDATSU (572-585) importing architects from Korea, and we know that they had been preceded by architects (Kura-tsukuri) from China, for among the latter was the well-remembered SHIBA TACHI-TO. A little later, the Emperor SUJIN (588-592), brought over tile-makers; the Empress SUIKO (593-628), manufacturers of paper, inks, and dyes, and so on; and the nature of the treatment accorded to those immigrants when they distinguished themselves may be gathered from the fact that, on the recommendation of Prince SHOTOKU, the Empress SUIKO bestowed the high title of Daijin on the sculptor SHIBA TORI, grandson of the Chinese architect SHIBA TACHI-TO, and granted him an estate of 50 acres of rice land in Omi province. Japan reaped the full benefit of her liberality, for she speedily acquired the arts and sciences of her oversea neighbours, and, so far from losing any of her own individuality in the process, as men like Viscount TANI and his conservative friends of the Kokusai-hoson seem to apprehend to-day, she impressed the mark of her own genius on everything she assimilated; impressed it with such success that, had not her historians been conspicuously honest in acknowledging her borrowings, Occidental experts would have been perplexed to discern the facts, and might even have ended by attributing to her neighbours the rôle of debtors rather than that of creditors. The Japanese need not look beyond the four corners of their own history when they go in search of a text-book for their guidance as this crisis of their career. They need only ask themselves how it would have fared with their nation if, instead of opening its arms wide to every foreigner bringing with him any store of intelligence or erudition in those early centuries, they had behaved, mutatis mutandis, as narrow-minded, timorous conservatives would have them behave now—imposed restrictions upon education by aliens, upon the ownership of real estate by aliens, upon the holding of railway shares by aliens, upon the working of mines by aliens, upon the undertaking of agricultural enterprise by aliens, and upon the exercise of every kind of administrative authority by aliens. Japan calls herself progressive, and most of us endorse the term readily, but truly in many important respects she was more progressive fifteen hundred years ago than she is to-day. The trouble is that so many people seem to be blind to the lessons of their own country's annals. It is, perhaps, a little too much to expect that they should search the records of a far-remote age; records encumbered with much that obscures the gems of instruction they contain. But will they not devote a little intelligent scrutiny to the story of the present generation and its immediate predecessor; the story of the Meiji era. The foreigner must not be allowed to own real estate, they say. Well, but he has been allowed to own it in certain districts, and he has taken French leave to own it in others. What then? Has he injured the soil or carried away any of it? At Yokohama he was given a swamp, and he converted it into one of the most flourishing spots in the empire. On the Bluff, a few barley-fields and potato-patches were sold to him, and he constructed one of the most picturesque cities of villas and gardens to be found in the whole world. Here and there on barren sands by the sea-shore, which from time immemorial had never contributed a sen to the wealth of the country, he acquired some square yards of space and established summer resorts, bringing prosperity to the fisher-folk and setting an example which the country's statesmen and men of wealth have followed on a large scale. Thus far the result of the experiment of allowing him to own real estate is that, wherever he availed himself of the privilege, he added materially to the well-being of the people and to the wealth of the country. Has he permanently alienated the land from Japanese ownership? On the contrary, the lots he holds in the Settlements are not rated as high in the market as the lots in the adjoining Japanese towns which owe their prosperity to his presence, and when the restrictions imposed by the old treaties are abolished, the former lots will be purchasable by any Japanese who sees his account in buying them. The foreigner does not value the land a row of pins for its own sake. He values it solely as a necessary factor in his business arrangements. Never yet has a Japanese conservative succeeded in putting into intelligible language the grounds of his objection to foreign ownership of land. He can not state his objections: they are the most shadowy of chimeras. And then he says that to allow foreigners to take part in education would be to strike at the foundations of the people's patriotism. Yet he has been employing foreign educators ever since the Restoration, and has been doing that which is incomparably more calculated to undermine national individuality, namely, importing foreign systems of science, philosophy, ethics, economics, and laws. Moreover, he has been sending his best students abroad to complete their education in foreign schools in foreign lands, where they are subjected to the fullest influence of alien surroundings and alien atmosphere. Have they come back minus their patriotism? Men that can not read the writing on the pages of their own time are ill-qualified to forecast the future of their country.

JAPANESE PROGRESS.

REFERRING, in a recent article, to the present condition of Japan's progress, we said that she shows injudicious unwillingness to employ foreign assistance, and we added "Not having yet supplied herself with really high standards, her tendency, in their absence, will be to retrograde rather than to advance." The Japan Times comments on these utterances, and attributes to us an assertion that Japan is "doomed to retrograde." There is, however, an important difference between "tendency" and "destiny." We do not by any means believe that Japan is doomed to retrograde. On the contrary, we have a very robust faith in her future. It is a question of degree only. When retrogression is spoken of, some standard of comparison is necessarily implied, and the standard we had in mind was Japan's previous rate of progress. We do not think that she is maintaining that rate, and we fear that her tendency will be to fall still further short of it in the immediate future. To set forth our meaning in full is a task of some difficulty, and, before undertaking it, we must remove one or two misapprehensions that lie on the threshold. The first of these relates to the factors that have made for Japan's progress in the past. The Japan Times errs in the estimate it attributes to us of those factors. It interprets us as saying that the solid and remarkably rapid progress hitherto achieved by Japan "has been due to foreign aid, and that, unless she is satisfied to go under foreign tutelage, she must be prepared for a retrograde movement." That sentence disturbs our estimate of our Tokyo contemporary's mood, but the language permits no latitude of rendering. We must take the words as they stand, and, thus taken, they offer a striking illustration of the very disposition which seems at present to be checking Japan's advance. Japan's progress in the past, we are charged with saying, "has been due to foreign aid," and unless "she is satisfied to go under foreign tutelage she must be prepared to retrograde." Now a great deal has been spoken and written about Japan's progress in modern times, and the speakers and writers have been chiefly foreign, we too being among the number. The Japanese themselves, to do them justice, have not shown any disposition to be boastful. Here, then, we have to ask whether Japan's foreign panegyrists, or the foreign writers of her daily records, have ever given undue prominence to foreign assistance in appraising the causes of her progress. Have they not, on the contrary, invariably minimized that factor, and assigned the full credit to Japan? Whether they were perfectly impartial in so doing, need not be here considered. The fact itself is all that we adduce, and we adduce it as a clear proof that foreigners—exclusive of foreign local journalists, several of whom have worked great mischief—are not responsible for any sensitiveness Japan may feel on this point. They have not done anything to disturb her laurels; not from them has the singular suggestion come that by employing foreign aid she went "under foreign tutelage." The elements that make chiefly for success in any career, whether national or individual, are ability to grasp opportunities, discernment in the choice of agents, and liberal recourse to available aids. Japan's success in the past has been due to the exercise of all three qualities. If she has now become a prey to the morbid fantasy that by continuing to exercise the third she will be "going under foreign tutelage," her tendency in the immediate future will be to retrograde rather than to advance. Not a permanent tendency, however, but only a temporary, for, on the one hand, the sound instincts of which her best statesmen have given proof will ultimately re-assert themselves; and, on the other, increasing intimacy with foreign nations will extend her people's horizon and soften the over-wrought passion of self-assertion which at present perverts recourse to foreign assistance into submission to foreign tutelage.

The second preliminary point calling for notice is that there are always phases of comparative rest in every advance, and that we must be careful not to mistake them for evidences of a general tendency to retrograde. Japan set out at first from a position of virtual motionlessness, so far as concerned Western civilization. Hence every step she took was magnified by contrast with her previous quiescence. The difference between a modicum of competence and total inability is much more striking than the difference between proficiency and a modicum of competence. It falls within the range of every one's experience to be overtaken by a season of disappointment and apparent stagnation in the pursuit of any attainment, and very often the moral and physical impossibility of preserving an uniform rate of acceleration in the face of increasing obstacles to advance, is erroneously regarded as failure. For the obstacles do increase. Only commonplace ability is required to carry a man half-way towards success. The first part of the journey is comparatively easy, and the rate of advance correspondingly rapid. But the second half—there the pace invariably slackens, and the stages of progress become so small by contrast that an impression of stoppage, if not of retrogression, is produced. Many foreign observers believe that Japan's advance has been checked, some that she is even losing ground. For ourselves, we are disposed to think that it is in great part a question of contrast. What she did at the outset seemed so striking by comparison that a false estimate of her rate of progress was suggested. The commencement of her railways, her telegraphs, her posts, her merchant fleet, her armaments, her educational system, her police, and her legislation were almost sensational. They set the world wondering and admiring. But each new step forward created a new point of comparison, until at last the evidences of advance have ceased to be salient. That there is no advance, however, would, we think, be a very false inference. The literature of the time is sufficient to dispel any such theory. One need only compare the articles and essays appearing in journals and periodicals to-day with those published three years ago, to see that the nation's point of view has shifted largely in the direction of the Occident. The spirit of the new civilization has come with the form, and, at the same time, there is growing up a wholesome faculty of discriminating against its abuses. It would be erroneous, then, to say that progress has ceased because it has ceased to be striking to the superficial observer.

Yet we believe that the situation is far from being satisfactory, and this brings us to the qualification which has challenged criticism; the qualification that Japan "has not yet supplied herself with really high standards," and that, in their absence, her tendency will be to lose much of her rate of progress—we refrain from the expression "to retrograde" as it, perhaps, over-states our meaning. In another article we will explain our meaning fully.

LEGATIONS IN TOKYO.

The abolition of the Brazilian Legation and Consulate in Tokyo and Yokohama seems to have had at least the merit of expedition. There is a kind of hi presto air about the incident. Yesterday these honorable institutions were flourishing with all the appearance of permanent authority: to-day they are things of the past. If the Brazilian Government established them originally for purely experimental purposes, it has scarcely allowed time for the experiment to have a fair trial; and if it saw good reason for establishing them in 1897, we do not understand why the reason should have vanished in 1898. The record savours of the farcical, and has a decidedly unwelcome aspect for the people in Tokyo who can ill afford to lose people so agreeable as Mr. Lisboa and his family. We trust that it may not prove to be a case of misfortune never coming singly, for there are other Legations in Tokyo whose maintenance must be an even more unprofitable strain upon the resources of their Governments than the Brazilian Legation's was.

MONTHLY SUMMARY OF THE RELIGIOUS PRESS

The Bukkyō discusses at great length the present state of opinion in Buddhist circles and the prospects of the sect as a whole. According to this authority, there is what may be called an advance guard in Buddhist ranks, composed of daring spirits whose watchword is progress, and there is a main body of adherents who, with a slow and heavy tread, follow the lead of the pioneers. In an article noticed by us a few months ago, which appeared in the Bukkyō, it was contended that the utterances of the most advanced exponents of Buddhist thought were lacking in distinctness and outspokenness. It was also shown that there was an absence of any unifying principle in the teaching of the leaders, and that with some of them there was too much drifting with the tide. The Bukkyō now reviews the condition of the mass of the exponents of Buddhism. There are three ways in which the influence of Buddhists of this class is felt. (1) They teach in schools. (2) They edit and contribute to magazines and newspapers. (3) They preach or lecture. Of these three methods the first is the most important in our view, says the Bukkyō, but, unfortunately for the interests of Buddhism, the Buddhist teachers in schools make a very poor use of their opportunities. They are more interested in secular learning than in Buddhism and impart to their pupils much knowledge that militates against Buddhist teaching. In education they have no high moral and religious ideal. They aim at keeping pace with government schools in secular teaching, and that is all. The schools are Buddhist in name only. They produce no evangelists. As regards the general religious teaching of Buddhists of the conservative type, it is by no means of a kind to produce belief. Men of this school of thought complain of the liberal and advanced Buddhists and charge them with undermining faith by their scientific doctrines, but the Buddhist philosophy which the conservatives teach is not of a kind to strengthen faith. In our opinion, says the Bukkyō, there is far too much philosophy and too little religion in Buddhist teaching. This is an evil that calls for a remedy. The use which the ordinary Buddhist convert makes of his sacred books is something entirely different from that of the Christian. The latter reads and derives comfort and instruction from his Bible on all occasions. As he sits by the fire or lies in his bed, in times of joy and times of sorrow, the earnest Christian may be seen poring over the sacred page. What he reads he seeks to understand and apply. But the Buddhist uses his Bible as a charm only. He does not seek to understand it. As he listens to the scriptures being read he says he is conscious of being blessed thereby, he knows not how. This savours of incantation and is quite inferior to the intelligent appreciation of Biblical teaching found among devout Christians. . . . The only Buddhist sects that possess anything like an adequate organisation are the Shin, Sōtō, Shingon, and Jōdo. But even with these there are grave defects in organisation. None of the schools established by them train evangelists to such an extent that they need no other training, that is, they do not turn out men that are deeply religious and abreast of the times in point of scholarship. Consequently the difficulty of finding suitable men to fill vacancies at the great temples is very great. According to the present state of opinion in Buddhist circles, the Buddhist preacher is one whose office it is to deceive the people by delivering plausible speeches. Superior young Buddhists are above filling such a post; they choose school work in preference to becoming evangelists. The remedy for this evil is to raise the status of the Buddhist preacher, to make him worthy of the esteem of the world at large by educating him thoroughly and impressing on him the importance of his becoming a great moral and religious reformer in his parish. Our religious seminaries have proved failures as manufacturers of evangelists to suit the age. Let us no longer rely on them, but try and produce by means of our ordinary schools and colleges a number of young men who shall be prepared to devote their scholarship to the sacred purpose of rendering Buddhism once more a power in the land.

The Kokumin Shimbun comments on the experiment being tried at Hakodate with Aino boys. Mr. Nettleship, who is connected with the English Church Missionary Society, has for several years past been engaged in teaching some 20 Aino boys at Yachigashira, Hakodate. Mr. Nettleship has found that the boys cannot stand over-much head-work, and hence part of each day is spent in a little farm and gardening work; and, furthermore, the boys are allowed to go home and assist their parents for several months at the busy time of the year with the Aino farmer. In summing up the results of this experiment, the Kokumin Shimbun says that intellectually the Aino mind is in every way inferior to the Japanese, except perhaps in the power of imitating. It has next to no originating power, is quite incapable of being taught the higher mathematics, nor can it comprehend the more abstruse doctrines of Christianity. Hence, says the organ we are quoting, though the spread of religion is the object of the supporters of the Hakodate Aino school, as a preliminary to this they should endeavour to develop the dwarfed Aino intellect, for in his normal state none of the cardinal doctrines of Christianity can be rendered intelligible to him. There are, we are told, one or two Aino schools near Kushiro, and steps are being taken to establish an Aino girls' school at Sapporo.

The Fukuin Shimpō has a note entitled, "The Morality of Golden Sign Boards," which makes interesting reading. The importance attached to titles and signs and the moral meaning they convey is something quite peculiar in Japan, says the Fukuin Shimpō. Some of these are quite a study. Take the term 實業 Jitsugyō, which of late has been employed by undertakers as distinctive of their line of business. For a long time passers-by were very much amused by seeing the above-named ideographs transcribed over an undertaker's shop in Kamakuragashi, Kanda. For some reason or other the sign was subsequently removed. But still the employees of certain undertakers have the term Jitsugyō written on their caps. The meaning which the majority of people give to this term is, says the Fukuin Shimpō, quite peculiar. They understand the word as essentially connected with all material and real things and as the opposite of things mental and spiritual, which they treat as non-existent or unreal. But what claim the business of the undertaker has to the exclusive and distinctive use of a term that is applied to a number of various trades and industries it is difficult to see. Is the use of the term to be interpreted as a subtle way of asserting the doctrine of the materialists? asks the Fukuin Shimpō. Do those who use it intend to say,—"What becomes of the spirit nobody knows. We are concerned with the material remains of the deceased, which alone are real, which alone have actual existence." May not the term resemble that written on the Cross of Christ, "The King of the Jews?" May it not bear two meanings? To Christians the title given to Christ by Pilate represented his spiritual kingship. But to the Romans and to discerning non-Christian Jews it was a proof of the thralldom of the nation to which he belonged. So with this jitsugyō of the undertakers, to them it means one thing, to discerning outsiders quite another. The tendency to embody in titles a certain supposed moral superiority to their fellows is seen in many other quarters. In a street in Kanda may be seen the title, Shisei Kangofu-kai, "The most Holy Nursing Society;" and at Shinbashi, over the door of a foreign fancy goods shop is inscribed the term, Shōjikiya, "The Honest Store." At Asakusa there is the Shōjiki Sobaya, which is very old. The same tendency is seen in the choice of personal names. Those bearing a moral meaning are very numerous. Handbills, business circulars and declarations drawn up by political parties are all permeated with the same moral tint; documents of this kind being considered imperfect without allusion to virtue of some kind or other. When the manifestos of great political parties in Japan like the Jiyūtō and the Kaishintō are compared with similar documents published in the West, it is found that the former are full of moral allusions and professions. Notwithstanding all the lack of public spirit and the unwillingness to sink minor differences in the promotion of a great cause, on every possible occasion the sign-board morality appears in blazing letters before the public eye. To draw up a document without saying something about 義勇奉公 Giyū hōkō, or 忠君愛國 chūkun aikoku would, in the opinion of competent judges, endanger its success as an appeal to Yamato's sons. It is to be feared, concludes the Fukuin Shimpō, that in Japan, as in China, too frequently the form is made to do service for the reality and men are wont to write on their signboards what they never dream of practicing in their daily lives.

The Rikugō Zasshi observes, in reference to the Sugamo prison affair, that it is absurd to be wrangling over the question as to which sect the majority of prisoners belong, as it is quite plain that no criminal is either a true Christian or a true Buddhist. All prisoners are in need of reform and to be quarrelling as to who has the right to reform them is very foolish. It makes little matter by what means they are changed as long as the change is real. In connection with this, the Rikugō takes occasion to remark that Christianity would fare better in such controversies if she were more in touch with society as a whole and with the modern spirit of progress. Christianity in Japan is too isolated, too European and too exclusive, says this organ.

The Kyōiku Jiron publishes an account of Bishop Nicolai's Theological Seminary; from which we gather that the course extends over seven years. The first four years are devoted to imparting instruction on purely secular subjects. In the 5th year, Philosophy, Biblical Exegesis, Ecclesiastical History and similar subjects are taught; these studies, with a few others, being extended over the 6th and 7th years as well. The qualifications for admission to the seminary are (1) Good health. (2) A desire to serve the church as a preacher or a lay-teacher. (3) Graduation at a Higher Elementary School or at some establishment of equal rank as regards the education imparted. (4) Exemption from home ties and responsibilities. (5) The age of candidates to be between 14 and 18.

The Kyōiku Jiron observes that the Surugadai Seminary, like all mission schools, gives a very large number of holidays during the year, observing all Japanese as well as all foreign holidays.

The Kirisutokyo Shimbun (No. 798) in an article entitled "Under-Currents of Christian Thought," minutely analyses the 30 Christian sects represented in Japan, and discusses the effects on the Japanese mind of their many differences. The writer first points out that there is hardly a conceivable shade of opinion on any religious subject that is not represented by the foreign missionaries now residing in Japan. There are sticklers for the most minute and elaborate ceremony, like the Roman Catholics, the Greek Church, and the Protestant High Church party. There are sticklers for no ceremony of any kind, like the Bible Christians and the Plymouth Brethren. Between these two extremes there ranges every variety of view conceivable. In the matter of liberty of thought, belief and practice between the Unitarians and Lutherans at one extreme and the Roman Catholics and Greek Church at the other, there is endless variety. Is it any wonder that the Japanese are bewildered and ask in despair "what is truth?" Take any one of the burning questions of the day, says the Fukin Shimpō, like, for instance, the dependence of the native churches on foreign aid, and you will find the greatest diversity of opinion thereon. Classification is a difficult task and can only be done in a rough fashion, somewhat as follows. Christians may be divided into (1) The gospel party; (2) the no-gospel party; (3) the party in favour of retaining the missionaries (4) the party in favour of the entire independence of the native churches. Among these parties the last two demand special attention at the present time. The Kumiai churches and the Nihon Kirisuto Kyōkai have for some time figured as champions of the absolute independence of Japanese Churches. They have lately been joined by a large number of Canadian Methodists. These Methodists have changed their policy very considerably within the past few months. There seem to be signs that they will divide off into two great parties, the missionary and the no-missionary party (Senkyōshi to hi-senkyōshi no nihai). It has come to this that the question of the relation which the foreign missionary should bear to the native church can no longer be shelved. It must be settled. It is a mistake to think that the Dōshisha question principally concerned doctrine. It was most intimately connected with the relation that foreign missionaries bear to the native churches. Much of the success of Christianity in Japan will depend on how this problem is solved. Some definite decision must be come to. It is quite impossible for the two parties to work together.

* * *

Turning to the pro and anti gospel parties we find that here the dispute is not about Church government and Church management, but about doctrine. The gospel party is essentially conservative; it believes in what is called traditional theology. It is guided in all its interpretations of the Scriptures by the authorities that are recognised in the west. Their opponents claim the right of interpreting the Bible in their own way, and they think that all the tradition and the dogmas which have in the course of ages grown up around the tree of Christianity are as pernicious in their effects as the luxuriant growth of some malignant creeper around a forest giant. They contend that in order to make Christianity powerful in Japan she must be stripped of all her encumbrances. The contest between the pro and anti traditionalists is very keen and compromise is impossible. The victory of one party or the other will make itself felt throughout the whole country.

One thing is certain; there is no reason whatever why sects and parties should divide off here as they divided years ago in the West on account of some minor point of doctrine or difference of opinion in reference to ecclesiastical government. It would be quite absurd to perpetuate these differences to all time here. They are clearly not essential parts of Christianity. Hence in the division of parties which we have given above we have only laid stress on those divisions that concern us as Japanese. We have confined ourselves to questions that are vital to all Japanese alike. Shall we accept western traditional theology in its entirety or shall we claim the right of selecting only such parts of it as seem to us a vital part of original Christianity? Shall we aim at getting rid of the foreign missionary altogether and manage our churches after our own fashion? Or is it desirable that he should be retained? These are the clear issues on which the Church of Christ in Japan is called upon to pronounce an opinion; and it is undesirable that they should be obscured by not less important questions.

* * *

In the Shinri, the German Church organ, the Rev. H. Minami writes on the best method of teaching Christianity in Japan. There are two questions which all earnest Japanese Christians should ask, says Mr. Minami. The first is, how can Christianity be harmonised with Japan's past history? The second is, how can Christianity maintain her independence and high rank against the opposition she receives from science and philosophy? In reference to the first question it is important to observe that as far as possible it is desirable that Christianity should be Japonicised. There is a limit, however, beyond which this cannot be carried without sacrificing some of the essential parts of the Christian faith. Three or four years ago, an attempt to nationalise Christianity failed, because the promoters of the movement did not observe this principle. It is possible to Japonicize Christianity to such an extent that there shall be none of it left. When we come to ask what view of Christianity it is desirable to perpetuate in this country, we are confronted with wide differences of opinion. The orthodox party would found the Church on supernaturalism. The liberal party in the church believes in founding it on reason. It is well-known that we hold the latter opinion. Now the question which it is important to ask is, can a church that refuses to believe in miracles, that discards all the numerous dogmas of the orthodox and allows reason to exercise full sway in the domain of theology, hold together as a corporation? Turning to the history of Christianity in the West, we find that there is no instance of the continued existence of such a body.† Liberal Christians may greatly influence and modify orthodox opinion as long as they remain connected with the orthodox party, but no sooner do they separate themselves from that party and try to form a church of their own than they fail. The Lutheran Church in Japan is attempting this. Will it succeed? I myself believe it will. But this is only my belief, and facts may yet show its groundlessness. If we can succeed in doing what has never been done in the West, it will be a subject for rejoicing among liberal-minded Christians all over the world. The conditions here at the present time are certainly most favourable for the experiment. The feat, if accomplished, will impart to Japanese Christianity a colour of its own.

* * *

The Hansei Zasshi publishes a jeremiad on the state of Buddhism in Japan. The 100,000 temples and the 30,000,000 adherents seem to indicate that the religion still has a great hold on the masses, but any one well acquainted with the sentiments and the actions of professing Buddhists knows that to the majority the creed is a mere empty profession. The priests are clamouring for special privileges, but they are doing nothing to show that they are worthy of government patronage and protection. Their protestations against the indifference with which they are treated by the Government and their pleading their former connection with the Imperial Family, are pitiable to behold and can only be compared to some impoverished student informing a servant-maid at a lodging-house that he is descended from noblemen. The early founders of the faith in this country would have spurned such methods of drawing attention to their religion. Patronage where there is no actual strength and no real earnestness of conviction only increases corruption. The best thing that can happen to Buddhism is for her to come into competition with Christianity on her own merits.

The Hansei Zasshi, in another part of the number from which we have quoted, declares itself to be in favour of the public acknowledgment of Christianity as one of the religions of Japan. With those who say that certain forms of Christianity might prove injurious to the State, the Hansei does not agree. Such objections † Perhaps the Unitarians may be cited as an exception to the rule referred to by Mr. Minami, though the actual influence exercised by that body over the minds of men is not to be compared to that wielded by the orthodox.—(Writer of the Summary).

are more academic than real. In practice none of the existing forms of the Christian faith are likely to conflict with the State. If they should, the State can take care of itself, says the Hansei Zasshi.

If Buddhism is desirous of adapting itself to modern requirements, observes the Hansei Zasshi, it must erect buildings in thickly populated parts of the chief towns of Japan and separate its preaching from temple services and all the gloomy associations connected with buildings surrounded by the dead. The erection of temples in retired spots, on the top of a well-wooded hill away from the noise of business well accorded with the asceticism and the unworldliness which formed such prominent characteristics of leading Buddhists in former days. But now it is felt that if Buddhism is to retain her hold over men's minds she must mix more with the world. Men that would be ready to listen to a Buddhist discourse in an ordinary building often object to go to a temple. There is a certain gravity about entering a temple that is out of harmony with the everyday thoughts and feelings of many a man of business. In a great city like Tōkyō it is quite a mistake for the chief Buddhist preaching places to be far removed from the haunts of business men. While such districts as Kanda and Nishonbashi are ill-supplied with Buddhist preaching places, comparatively thinly populated suburbs like Shiba, Azabu, Hongō and Koishikawa abound with temples.

The Hansei Zasshi (No. 12) discusses the fortunes of government, education and religion during the past year. Omitting politics, which have already been treated fully in these columns, the following is a short abstract of the writer's observations on education and religion:—At no period in our history have there been so many changes in the Department of Education. In Dr. Hamano scholarship was represented. He was succeeded by a politician, Marquis Satonji, who gave place to another representative of the learned world, Professor Toyama, who was succeeded by an eminent political leader, Mr. Ozaki, who made way for Mr. Inukai, another politician; whose tenure of office was very short, however, the post being finally filled by the appointment of an Admiral (Kabayama). The whole thing is a subject for laughter. Is there any country where so many radical changes have occurred within so short a time? But it would be a mistake to suppose that the Department as a whole has been seriously affected by these changes. The schools throughout the country have followed their usual routine and a large amount of thorough work is being carried on. It is noticeable that there is a great stir in the educational world caused by the near approach of mixed residence and the necessity of the Government's adopting some fixed policy in reference to schools conducted by foreigners. This question has been vehemently discussed in the High Educational Council; and we are informed that as a result of that discussion a number of restrictions are to be placed on the educational efforts of foreigners. We thought that the strong anti-foreign spirit was confined to the first years of the Meiji era and that Japan was sufficiently civilised to appreciate the labours of foreign school teachers, but it would seem that we are mistaken. Our advance is nothing to be proud of after all. After dwelling on the decay of manners and the numerous remedies that have been proposed to arrest that decay, the Hansei Zasshi proceeds to discuss the history of religion during the past year. As far as Buddhism is concerned there is little that is gratifying. Priests of the right sort are becoming scarcer and scarcer. Temples have been burnt or have fallen into decay that were once promising.

In a comparison between Buddhism and Christianity, published in the Tōyō-tetsugaku, some parts of which are very fanciful and not worth reproducing here, the writer says that Christianity is suited to young men who are full of hope and anxious to make their influence felt in the world, and that Buddhism is suited to the old and the wearied who have seen and known all that is worth knowing in this life and are now waiting calmly to enter the state of eternal repose. It may be said, continues the writer we are quoting, that the Oriental disposition dislikes hurry. Buddhism tends to nurture this disposition, and hence is unsuitable in the present age, when to take things leisurely means too often defeat in the race of life.

Dr. Paul Carus has published in America (Chicago) a translation of and a commentary on Lautze's Tan-teh-king. We understand from the review of the book which appears in the Tōyō-tetsugaku that the Chinese text is given in its original, and a transliterated form. The work is furnished with notes and an introduction. Dr. Carus' volume is highly praised by the reviewer we are citing, who says that the work has been made more intelligible to foreign readers than heretofore. Dr. Carus is of opinion that the French translation of Julian, the English translations of Chalmers and Legge and the German translations are all deficient. The book opens with a picture of the great philosopher, and is followed by a learned introduction, which discusses the age in which Lautze lived, the origin of his philosophy and religion and compares his teaching with that of other sages of antiquity. The work should prove of great value, says the Tōyō-tetsugaku; not only to all foreign students of religion, but to scholars in Japan, who find no small difficulty in comprehending the short, pithy, but fragmentary sayings of the great Chinese teacher. The work is issued by the Open Court Press, Chicago, and sells at 3 gold dollars per copy.

Dr. Inouye Enryō, who is one of the most indefatigable lecturers that the Buddhists possess, has published a number of his addresses under the title of Sōhei Kairōron (On the Reform of Priestly Abuses). In criticising this work the Tōyō-tetsugaku asserts that Dr. Inouye places far too much confidence in young priests in his scheme of reform. These priests, says the Tōyō-tetsugaku, are neither in character nor education qualified to take the lead in a reform movement, and this Dr. Inouye ought to know. Youth is only respected in Japan when combined with wisdom or sterling virtue. The young men who have been trained in Buddhist Schools of modern type will not bear comparison with young Christian students, according to the organ we are citing.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE FIRE AT THE Y.U.C.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

SIR,—Your brief note of Monday evening's fire concludes with the correct statement that it was "put out in an hour and a half," and all things considered I suppose we must be thankful it was. Some considerable allowance must be made for the "New Year" condition of the Japanese firemen,—but surely such an example of how "not to do it" cannot pass without comment.

Had the whole affair been planned solely for the benefit of the brigade, with a view to giving them a chance of "getting their hand in" early in the year, matters could not have been arranged to greater advantage. Two hydrants were available, and when those failed the sea could have been drawn upon, seeing that it was practically within arm's length of the burning building. Added to this, the evening was calm, the edifice was old and of small value, detached from the surrounding buildings, and (greatest advantage of all) stood just between two higher buildings,—from the roofs of which tons of water could have been poured into the upper storey through the hole which the fire had conveniently made in the roof,—and thus the brigade could have had a nice little practice without danger to life, or damage to valuable property.

But what happened? In the first place no attempt was apparently made to get on to the neighbouring roofs, and thus the greatest advantage of the favourable location was neglected,—possibly because no depth of sufficient length was obtainable,—but surely two of those on the spot could have been lashed together within the hour and a half. Far be it from me to ridicule so serious a matter as a conflagration, but as our life in the Far East is seldom enlivened by local comedy one can hardly refrain from dwelling on the humorous side of any source of amusement,—even of fires. To behold the brave Japanese heroes holding hose which emitted bold streams for fully 36 inches from the nozzles (and which thus brought the water within 30 feet of the fire), and to watch their heroic smashing of windows with wedged fists, and intrepid climbings-up and slidings-down of ladders placed against the Hotel and practically out of sight of the fire, were sights well calculated to thrill the most splenetic. But some excellent work was done notwithstanding, and taking all things into consideration I suppose that when the value of the material actually destroyed by fire be compared with that needlessly damaged, the conflagration will prove to be about the most costly we have had for some time. Some cynic remarked that there was really no heat given out on either side of the burning building, and that by closing the windows and shutters of the Hotel all danger and damage would have been prevented by an occasional spraying of the exposed wood-work. But when a thing is worth doing at all it is worth doing well,—and it was done properly on Monday. All the rooms on one side of the Hotel were flooded as deep as possible until the ceiling of the dining room below gave way, and a shower-bath of sizeable dimensions was provided for all comers. It was a decided success, and as the cost (which was fairly heavy) goes to the debit of the Insurance Companies,—who cares? Meanwhile the good work was not confined to the Hotel,—for the Club Library, (one of the best in the East) was being "saved" or—perhaps more correctly—"destroyed." On Monday afternoon the library was probably worth $10,000,—but in a few brief minutes its value was lowered fully 50 per cent., for to damp volumes out of upstairs windows on a heap of bricks, mud, and foundation paraphernalia is about the most effective method of ruining them one could well devise. From the first to the last the library was never in danger of destruction by fire, and had the books been bundled into curtains, carpets, etc., and a shoot improvised from a ladder (in case of development), we should to-day have our library, instead of a heap of ruined literature lying in the mud of a neighbouring compound.

The foreigner in command of the brigade knows his business, but what can the best general do, if his commands be not obeyed, and his men prove incompetent and disorderly? One good man among a crowd of incompetents is quite insufficient, and surely it would pay in the long run were half-a-dozen more foreigners employed to keep the harum-scarum element in check, and prevent such a needless destruction of valuable property. After all the fire now in question may prove profitable if it lead to the establishment of a more efficient brigade of fire men.

Yours truly, SPECTATOR.
Yokohama, 4th January, 1899.

THE LITERARY SOCIETY.

Friday evening's meeting of the Yokohama Literary Society was a pronounced success. The room at the Van Schaick Hall, which was very prettily decorated for the holiday season, was fairly packed by an appreciative audience, to whom a capital programme was offered. The usual literary contribution was dispersed with and the time ordinarily occupied by it was devoted to a lengthy programme of musical selections, recitations, &c., all of which were most acceptably rendered. Miss Dorsey's recitations and "Delsartean poses" were an especially enjoyable feature, and showed a remarkable range of elocutionary ability, the selections ranging from "King John" to "Aunt Sylvia's first Lesson in Geography." The selections by the quartet-party, and the solos of Mr. W. Karl Vincent were also enjoyable items, and secured encores. Programme:—

PROGRAMME.

- 1—Overture, Quintet. "Zampa".....(Herald)
Miss Poole, Mr. Mason (Piano); Mr. F. Schmid,
Mr. Poole (Violin), Mr. R. Schmid (Cello).
- 2—Recitation. Scene from Act V. "King John".....(Shakespeare)
Miss Carolyn V. Dorsey.
- 3—Vocal Solo...."Hymne d'amour".....(Massenet)
Madame Rego.
- 4—Recitation...."Aunt Sylvia's First Lesson in Geography."
Miss Dorsey.
- 5—Piano Solo—
(a) Lyric Pieces, Op. 43.....(Grieg)
(b) "Romanza" F. sharp... (Schumann)
(c) "Nocturne".....(Liszt)
Mr. W. Karl Vincent.

INTERMISSION.

ment) Miss Pratt (Piano)
Miss Dorsey.

AN EVENTFUL VOYAGE.

The British barque Fifeshire (1,318 tons), which arrived at Yokohama on Thursday from Antwerp, had an extremely long and tempestuous voyage. On the way out via the Cape she experienced fearful weather, and was so damaged that she had to put into Capetown, where her cargo, chiefly consisting of cast iron pipes, had to be taken out and restowed, and extensive repairs were made. In the China Sea and off the Islands she had also to meet extremely rough weather, losing her fore top-mast and fore top-gallant-mast, and sustaining a considerable amount of damage in other respects. She started from Antwerp on May 14th, 1898, so that she was very nearly eight months on the voyage. But for her last unfortunate experience she would have escaped the new Tariff duties, and saved a good many thousand dollars.

KOREAN ITEMS.

The Korean Independent, as the editor admits, is suffering from a dearth of news, and the latest numbers to hand are not so entertaining as usual. "Molayo" holds forth on the People's Meeting, which was still being held in the streets and before the Palace. On the 14th December, led by Han Tongsik, a right hand man of Min Yongkui, the notorious Minister of Finance, and Kon Tongau, a well known rascal, the Pedlars planned a general attack on the meeting. On that day the 2nd regiment of the Imperial Body Guard were to and did "harass the people in the name of drill." On the 15th Dec., four Pedlars were caught by the people and examined by the Police authorities in front of the Police Station. The gist of their confessions was that fifty or more Pedlars were to mix with the people, participating in discussions, etc. "At a given signal, the Pedlars were to strike down Mr. Ko Yongkun, the President of the People's Meeting, and Mr. T. H. Yun, the President of the Independence Club. Next, the seventeen Independents who had been imprisoned and several leaders were to be attacked. That day the soldiers of the Imperial Body Guard did their part in surrounding and scaring the meeting, but the Pedlars and assassins postponed their work owing to the absence of Messrs. Ko and Yun, their intended victims.

On the 17th the People's Meeting presented a fourth memorial in which the confessions of the Pedlars were given. His Majesty was begged to punish Min Yong-kui, "who, as the Minister of Finance, wastes public money for hiring and supporting a band of desperadoes."

On the 15th ult., Mr. T. H. Yun was appointed Governor of Söul, but "Molayo" announced he would not accept the office. "Nor do I blame him for the decision, as the appointment is nothing but a device to entrap him in some fictitious crime." On the same date Mr. Kim Yong-joon was made Commissioner of Police. His intimate connection with Min Yongkui, and his known partiality for the Pedlars made the appointment exceedingly unpopular. The People's Meeting refused to recognize him as the Commissioner. On the night of the 18th his resignation was accepted, and in his stead Mr. Yun Woongyul was made the Commissioner of Police. Other official changes are announced, but to give them would only bewilder our readers.

The Privy Council met for the first time on the 15th Dec. According to the constitution of the Council, the Vice-President was elected by the Councillors by ballot. Out of 29 votes Mr. T. H. Yun received 19. His name was sent to the Council of State to be reported to His Majesty for appointment. On the 15th ult., the Privy Councillors took the bold step of recommending candidates to the Council of State for the various Ministries of the Government. Each of the 33 members was to write down on a slip of paper eleven names he thought most worthy of the Cabinet positions. Among those nominated was Pak Yong-ho, and the President of the Privy Council declined to submit the recommendation to the Council of State on account of the mention of Pak. The People's Meeting endorsed the action of the Privy Councillors. Mr. Pak having left Korea in 1895 under a charge of high treason, the People's Meeting appointed a prosecuting committee to petition the Minister of Justice to recall him for a thorough and fair trial.

The new river steamer Söbi Muru, recently put on the run between Chemulpo and Söul, foundered on the evening of the 14th at a place some 15 miles below Yongnan, and was quite covered up by sand. Out of some 23 people on board 17 were lost. The cargo was a total loss.

CHINESE NEWS.

Hongkong has now penny postage to the United Kingdom and British Colonies, the arrangement having come into force on Christmas Day. The penny is reckoned at four cents.

We learn from Shanghai papers that a shooting fracas took place on board the China Merchants' steamer Fishing on Christmas evening. The 2nd Engineer Mr. C. Turney, had been drinking, and whilst under the influence of liquor became exceedingly quarrelsome. On doing to dinner words ensued between him and a lad called Eveleigh, a deck apprentice, who was acting as 3rd Engineer. Turney refused to sit at table and went to his room for his revolver. He then returned to the saloon and fired two shots at Eveleigh, one of which hit the lad on the body but was fortunately deflected by a button. The 2nd Officer, Mr. A. N. Barrier, and Mr. L. Foucaas, a guest and friend of Eveleigh, attempted to take away the weapon and in doing so were wounded, the former receiving a severe scalp wound on the back of the head and the latter a bullet in the left thigh. Both were conveyed to the General Hospital for treatment and are now progressing favourably. Turney escaped and all trace was lost of him until the 28th, when he walked into the police office and gave himself up. An amusing incident in connection with the shooting is reported by a contemporary. The lad Eveleigh, believing he was shot and having a flesh bruise, attended at the General Hospital for treatment, which was readily given. A bandage was applied, and, as the spot was a dangerous one, five doctors were summoned to assist in the operation of probing, etc. Ether was given and a search made for the non-existing puncture, when to the astonishment of the doctors the bullet was found embedded in the patient's clothing.

A letter to the Shenpao of Shanghai states that the Russian officials in Kirin are engaging a large number of four-horse carts to convey heavy baggage (said to be army baggage, etc.) from Hunchun, south of Passiet Bay, to Port Arthur, at a general price of Tls. 500 per cart for the journey. No less than 4,000 such carts are said to be needed by the Russian officials, but owing to the high prices offered there will be no trouble in obtaining this large number, as the carters say that, after deducting expenses in feeding themselves and their animals, each cart will make Tls. 200 to Tls. 300 for the trip.

An expedition fitted out by Mr. Pritchard Morgan, M.P., left Shanghai on the last day of the old year for Szechuan. It is under command of Mr. Burn-Murdoch and consists of four English and American engineers and a Chinese secretary, suite, and servants. Mr. Pritchard-Morgan, daughter, and secretary left for England by the Prins Heinrich.

The latest news regarding the doings of Yü Man-tze relates to the capture by his men of a confidential secretary of H.E. Wang Chih-chuan, the new Provincial Treasurer of Szechuan. It appears that the secretary boasted to the Treasurer that he would be able to persuade the rebel Yü to lay down his arms "after half an hour's talk," and that, although strenuously entreated by his employer not to be too rash, he left the Treasurer's temporary yamen in Chongking one night on horse-back, alone, for Yü's camp. The secretary arrived there but was thrown into prison without the honour of the coveted interview.

The Chungking correspondent of the N. C. Daily News, writing on Dec. 12th, has this news to communicate:—"Seven brigands, among them two chiefs, were captured at Yangchuan and executed a few days ago. The unofficial Chinese are in great fear that Yü Man-tze will defeat the Imperial troops, in which case matters will be decidedly serious."

According to a correspondent of a Shanghai native paper, a fire has occurred on the Lu Shan Mountains, near Kinkiang, and a number of buildings were destroyed, including the summer residences of several foreigners and missionaries.

Work on the Hankow-Canton line bids fair to be started at an early date. Three surveying parties of American engineers have already started from the Hankow end, and Sheng Tao-tai is starting for Hunan in a few days to facilitate the work and inspect the route.

During last year about 400 Chinese families settled in Southern Russia with the special mission of initiating Russian planters into the secrets of the tea branch of agriculture. The tea fields are situated in the immediate neighbourhood of the sea, running along the Batoum-Tiflis line. The picking, on a grand scale, is to begin shortly, with the help of the Chinese, who are kept there by contract and are already getting accustomed to the climate.

The Shen Pao of Shanghai says that on the working of the Hanchow Mint being suspended owing to the inefficiency of the staff, the manager obtained permission to engage a German expert and a few other European coiners, also to transfer ten experienced Chinese workmen from the Hupoh Mint to assist in the work. These arrived at the Mint on the 23rd Dec. and as the machinery has been set in working order and the necessary materials are at hand, working will be resumed as soon as the Governor's order to do so is received.

With reference to the battalion of Chinese to be raised at Wei-hai-wei, a party of drill instructors have left England. These instructors will be engaged for two years under specially attractive conditions offered by the Secretary of War. They are being selected from infantry battalions by Captain Bruce, of the West Riding Regiment. Young unmarried sergeants will be chosen, and each will get a step in local rank, the members of the staff whilst so employed being supernumerary in their regiments. Sergeant-majors' pay will also be increased to £200, and that of colour-sergeants to £152. The new regiment will be trained and trained on the system instituted in the Egyptian Army by Sir Evelyn Wood and Sir Francis Grenfell; and instructors who qualify in the Chinese language will receive a bonus of £20.

LOSS OF THE "GLENAYON."

News has been received in Yokohama of the loss of the "Glen" line steamer Glenayon, which went on a rock at Shamun, near Hongkong, on Thursday evening, Dec. 29th. Two boats have reached shore safely, but two others are missing. The Glenayon was under the command of Captain Pitblie. She is supposed to be a total wreck.

The Yokohama agents of the Glen line of steamers kindly inform us that Capt. Pitblie, Master of the ill-fated steamer Glenayon, has arrived safely in Hongkong.

The North China Daily News contains the following telegrams regarding the loss of the Glenayon:-

The steamer Glenayon left Hongkong at 5 p.m. on Thursday, Dec. 29, and at 7 p.m. struck a rock near the Sanmun Islets, four holes being made in her. The water gaining, her head was turned to the shore, but before reaching it she sank. The crew and passengers escaped in four boats. One has arrived at Hongkong, one was rescued by a junk, and two are not yet heard of. H. M. S. Rattler and the Harbour-Master's launches are looking for them.

Later.

Mr. Dixon, the chief officer, Mr. Ainslie, the third officer, and Mr. Wilson, steward, are missing. A quartermaster named Smith died of exhaustion.

Lloyd's Register shows that the Glenayon was of 2986 tons gross, and that she was 360 ft. (long); 43.3 ft. beam; and 24.5 ft. deep. She was built of iron at Glasgow in 1881 for her present owners, Messrs. Macgregor, Gow & Co.

A NOBLE FAMILY'S VICISSITUDES.

The history of the family of the Duke of Northumberland, whose death was announced on Thursday, is a singular one. It reminds one of the story of the schoolboy who received the photograph of a pretty girl cousin in a handsome frame. After treasuring it for some time he dropped it into a pond, and when it was recovered the photograph was irretrievably ruined. Then he bought another photograph reminding him slightly of the fair relative, but it didn't seem quite the same thing. Next the frame was destroyed, and could only be replaced by one distantly resembling it. The sentimental youth continued to treasure the memento, but after all it was only a sorry substitute for the original picture and the original frame. So with the family of Percy. The name has been retained since the Conquest, but the real Percies have long been extinct, and the present family have little more of the blood of the founders of the house than a common Smith or Brown. William de Percy (called Pierce-eye from his transfixing a Mowbray through the eye with his lance) was a favourite of the Conqueror, who gave him a barony. He went on the first crusade preached by William the Hermit, and died within sight of the Holy City. After the third Baron the male line ceased, but a daughter of the house married a descendant of Charlemagne, who assumed the name of Percy. The first Earl of Northumberland, the title so long associated with the family, was the crafty politician who conspired to secure the succession of Henry VI., and brought about the fall of Richard II. He afterwards became disaffected, and his eldest son, the celebrated Hotspur whom Shakespeare's genius has immortalised more than his own exploits, fell fighting against Henry at Shrewsbury in 1403. The Earl himself was pardoned, but rebelled again, and was killed at Bramham Moor five years later. The second Earl, his son, returned to the Lancastrian allegiance; and was killed fighting for Henry VI. in the Wars of the Roses. The fourth Earl also had a violent death, being killed by the populace, incensed against him for his attempting to exact a subsidy on behalf of Henry VII. The title became extinct, but was renewed in Elizabeth's reign. The then Earl was also unfortunate, for he was beheaded for a Roman Catholic conspiracy against the Queen, and the eighth Earl was "found dead in the Tower" (as the euphemism went), after imprisonment for complicity in a plot in favour of Mary Queen of Scots. The ninth Earl was mixed up in the Gunpowder Plot, and was severely treated; the tenth Earl dabbled first with the Parliamentarians, but afterwards joined the movement for the restoration of Charles II., and the title once more became extinct with the death of the eleventh Earl in 1670. Charles afterwards made George Fitzroy, son of the Duchess of Cleveland, first Earl and then Duke. Another change took place in 1749, when the grandson of the eleventh Earl (son of a daughter of the house who married the Duke of Somerset) succeeded to the title. He had no male issue, but his daughter married one Sir Hugh Smithson, who was created Duke in 1766. From him came the present line of "Percies." Many other noble houses of England have probably as complicated a family tree, and have a little lineal claim to the name of the founder of their line.

FORMOSAN AFFAIRS.

KWANTAI-SHI'S REBELLION.

(FROM THE "HONGKONG DAILY PRESS.")

Taipei, Formosa, Dec. 24th, 1898.

During the summer months this year, the leaders among the insurgents in North Formosa, at the solicitation of a Government commissioner, threw down their arms and swore allegiance to the Japanese Empire, and were afterwards engaged in road making and in cultivation of the savage border lands. Nearly all the other bandits were eventually captured or disappeared to avoid the vigilant search made for them by the authorities; and for a few months disturbances ceased and harmony between the Government and the ex-insurgents apparently existed. The impression now prevailed in the north that we were rid of the troublesome pests, and we were rather boastful of the peace and quietude existing while the south of the island was constantly disturbed by the banditti attacks.

Great astonishment, therefore, resulted on Sunday morning last (the 11th) when incessant gun reports echoing in the north hills reached Twatutia, and three wounded police were seen being hurriedly carried on stretchers to the Twatutia Police Station. Soon rumours were about to the effect that serious fighting had occurred at Patchina, a small town only two miles to the north, but further details could not be obtained. Toward evening an extra was issued by the Japanese paper published here which told us that it was Kwantaishi who had rebelled, thus breaking his promises to the authorities.

Kwantaishi, the bandit leader, a second Yü Mantze, who lives in the north mountains, is a rough individual, as treacherous as he is daring. Although he made a pretence of surrendering to the authorities, he never could be persuaded to leave his mountain home. A short time ago, various accounts describing his treacherous plans caused so much anxiety to the populace that the authorities were obliged to make an investigation.

Accordingly the authorities demanded an interview with the intention of persuading him to remove to Patchina, where he could be more closely watched. Kwantaishi having consented to an interview, it was set for the evening of the 11th at Patchina. However, a few days preceding the appointed day, reports from various sources confirmed the rumour that he was levying war funds on the rich people of Patchina, and the authorities kept a sharp watch on him in consequence.

In addition to this about 300 insurgents suddenly attacked Jukiin Police Station on the night of the 10th, and it was established beyond doubt that Kwantaishi was connected with the outrage. It is true that after his surrender the Government had treated him with the most exceptional leniency, with a hope that he would become law-abiding, but now that their efforts had been of no avail, vigorous measures were to be adopted for his permanent removal from the hill district. To accomplish this it was decided, in view of the large number of his followers, to call out the military. To prevent any of his band from escaping it was planned to surround them, and soldiers from Taipei and Tamsui were brought into the field for that purpose.

At daybreak on the 11th, a party consisting of 16 men, led by some ex-rebels who acted as guides, started on a mission to communicate the Government order to Kwantaishi and to arrest him should he resist the Government's demands for his removal. When about half way to their destination, the Japanese were fired upon by insurgents. This was taken as a signal for the military to come into action. Lieut. Colonel Umawatar, the Commander of the forces, having ordered a detachment to assault the insurgents' position upon a hill top at the eastern end of Sozansho, the Japanese first attacked the insurgents there and quickly captured the place. While the Japanese were advancing, another band of insurgents made their appearance on an adjacent hill side, and, partially hidden by the underbush, they poured down upon the Japanese a strong fire, but the Japanese pressed on and soon dislodged the enemy. Advancing further was, however, found a more difficult task, the insurgents lying in ambush, occupying a very advantageous position from which the attacking party, who were obliged to ascend the mountain side along narrow and exposed pathways, found it difficult to drive them. Eventually, however, the enemy gave way leaving their newly built fortifications to fall into the hands of the Japanese. The fighting lasted for two hours. From then on the rebels offered no opposition in that direction and the Japanese easily occupied Kwantaishi's headquarters.

In the midst of the hot skirmish there was proceeding at another point an engagement not so favourable to the Japanese.

It was at the village of Sozansho, where was stationed a small Japanese force. The latter and some insurgents were exchanging fire over a creek when the Japanese found themselves surrounded by an overwhelming number of people whom they at first thought to be but a crowd of peaceful villagers. There was no hope of defeating so numerous an enemy, and the detachment retreated, hotly followed by the insurgents, towards a position which the former knew to be occupied by a few artillery-men with two mountain guns.

The artillery, upon sighting the Chinese, fired one shell at them, but it did not check their advance in the least. The gunners now waited until the insurgents were in close range and then again fired, and with such success that the shell burst right among the braves, killing a number of them and causing the others to scatter away like frightened deer towards the hills. But even there the unruly natives were not to find refuge, for detachments of troops stationed in the mountain passes fired upon them as they fled, and in one pathway alone thirty-eight were killed. While the operations were very successful great disappointment was felt among the authorities that the head bandit, Kwantaishi, whose capture was the original object of the expedition, should escape. Among the insurgents 78 were killed, with a loss on the Japanese side of 2 soldiers killed and several wounded. The insurgents, about 300 in number, consisted mostly of young men who exhibited some knowledge of military training and were good marksmen.

Early in the morning of the same day there was a skirmish on the opposite side of the Tamani river between 160 insurgents and a police party from Twatutia, resulting in a loss to the Japanese of three men wounded. Reinforcements were hastily despatched from the city, whereupon the insurgents fled toward Haisouku, leaving 8 men dead.

It is believed that the plan of the insurgents was to rise at once on both sides of the river on this day, but the military authorities were very happily able to nip the scheme in the bud. At present affairs in the immediate neighbourhood of the capital appear to have quieted down again, although travel along the Tamsui river to the port of Hobe is not considered safe and the country is in a much disturbed condition.

The U.S. cruiser Raleigh has sailed from Manila for New York by way of the Mediterranean. The cruiser Bennington has arrived at Guam from Honolulu to survey that Archipelago. The collier Brutus left Manila on the 19th December for Guam with coal for the Bennington.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Prof. Clay MacCauley's essay on "Japanese Literature," which recently appeared in our columns, has been reprinted, and can be obtained from Messrs. Kelly and Walsh.

Monsieur de Mauberge, the commander of the Ernest Simons, on his return to Marseilles this trip will be compulsorily retired under the age clause of the Messageries Maritimes.

The Daily Chronicle states that Great Britain has leased to the United States the island of Socotra, near the Gulf of Aden, for use as a coaling station. The report, however, is denied.

A notification has been issued by the Chinese Consulate at Manila with reference to the registration of Chinese, in which it is stated that the Consulate will be open every day "except foreign barbarians' holidays and Sundays." The term used is "I-Yang," "Yang" meaning foreign and "I" barbarian.

The British Bible Society has for many years been permitted to sell Bibles throughout the Austrian Empire, and its colporteurs have been granted licences which have been renewed year by year. These licences have now, it is said, been withdrawn. The Society has lodged an appeal, which is under consideration at the present moment.

The new German estimates for Kiao-chau amount to m.8,500,000, as against m.5,000,000 in the last financial year. The largest items are m.1,542,100 for the military administration; m.1,500,000 for buildings, including the acquisition of land; m.4,542,000 for the civil administration (building and maintenance of schools, hospitals, and similar purposes), and, finally, m.1,286,600 for harbour construction.

A registered packet was recently sent from Yokohama to Sydney, Australia. It took some time over its journey for instead of going direct, the Hongkong Post Office kindly sent it to Liverpool, whence it travelled to London and then back through the Suez Canal again, finally reaching its destination two months after "duplicates" despatched from Yokohama a mail later.

At eight o'clock on Monday an alarm of fire was received at No. 5, Settlement. Supt. Morgan, with the Brigade men and a steamer, turned out as soon as possible, and it was found that the two-storied servants' quarters and kitchen on Lot No. 5, belonging to the Y.U.C., was on fire. The Brigade managed to confine the fire to the building in which it originated, and it was put out in an hour and a half.

It is stated that on the representation of Admiral Dewey, the U. S. Government has decided to transfer the arsenal from Cavite to Subic Bay. Spain had commenced the construction of a floating dock in this bay last year, and it will be remembered that Admiral Montojo, at the commencement of the war, went out to Subic to choose a fighting position, but on finding the crippled condition of some of his ships he returned to Cavite, where the ships met their fate.

The Universal Gazette, Shanghai, states that the Kanau troops which lately caused so much trouble at Lukonchiu have been in more mischief. While a foreign lady and gentleman were walking along near Yenchiao, Tungchow, four or five of the soldiers assaulted them, and the lady died from the injuries she received. Fortunately the gentleman succeeded in escaping, and the matter will probably come before the Tsungli Yamen. We (Japan Mail) have seen no corroboration of this report.

The German Imperial Post Office recently issued a notice which indicates that ordinary letters and registered letters can henceforth be forwarded to Port Arthur and the Far East, under the general conditions of the universal mail regulations of July 7, 1891, by way of Eyoikuhnen, Wirballen, Vladivostok, partly by rail and partly by mail coach, the whole route to Vladivostok taking about twenty seven days. From Vladivostok the letters, &c., go to their destination (Port Arthur) by steamer. A powerful ice-breaking steamer is at hand at Port Arthur to keep that place open all the winter if necessary.

A boy named Stornebrink met with a dangerous accident on Sunday morning. He was playing with another boy with a toy rifle when the cartridge exploded, and Stornebrink received the small bullet in his thigh, dangerously near the femoral artery. The bullet was extracted, and the patient is doing well. The same afternoon a boy named Eymard was accidentally shot by a companion with a "patron rifle," receiving the bullet in his ribs. He was not seriously hurt.

Mr. S. F. Lawrence has been compelled by ill-health to resign the post of Constable to the British Consulate at Nagasaki. His career, says our local contemporary, has been an eventful one. In 1855 he enlisted in the 67th Regiment, and was in India during the closing scenes of the Mutiny. His regiment was then transferred to China for active service, and he received the medal with two clasps for this service, and attained the rank of sergeant. From China he was sent to Japan, and in 1862 and 1863 was sergeant in charge of the British Legation Guard at Tokyo and Yokohama. In 1864, wishing to enter the Yokohama Municipal Police, he purchased his discharge in Shanghai; but in 1866 he re-entered Her Majesty's Service on being appointed Constable to the Consulate at Hakodate. He served at Hakodate for 13 years until in 1879 he was transferred to Nagasaki, where he has served continuously till this date. He has thus, with the exception of the brief period during which he was in the Yokohama Municipal police, been continuously in Her Majesty's service from 1855 to the present time.

The first performance of Signor Mascagni's new Japanese opera, Iris, was given at the Corianzi Theatre, Rome, and proved a triumphant success. Iris contains many delicate melodies, which, however, were comprehensible only to a select part of the audience, and it is doubtful if they will become popular. The "Song to the Sun" after the prelude, sung by Iris (Mme. D'Arclée), was much applauded. Signor Mascagni was called six times after the first act, and ten after the second, which ends with a powerfully dramatic scene, in which Iris, wrongly accused and overwhelmed by her blind father's reproaches, throws herself from the window. The scenery of Iris is of marvellous correctness and beauty. The effect of the first scene is that of a real poem. It represents a street in a Japanese village, lined by small houses. That of the heroine is surrounded by a miniature garden overflowing with flowers, and flanked by a limpid stream. When the curtain rises the stage, as well as the theatre, is in perfect darkness. Gradually and almost insensibly dawn breaks, outlining the houses and trees until the light, at first silvery, turns rosy, then yellow, and floods the whole scene. At the same time, too, the volume of tone increases, and the chorus joins in with the triumphant hymn to the rising sun. The effect of sunrise is obtained by myriads of multi-coloured electric lights disposed in every available corner of the stage. The second act, exotic in its richness, is in direct contrast to the freshness and purity of the first. One is transported directly to Japan, with its pagodas, lanterns, and characteristic costumes. The latter, all in thin, delicately-tinted vaporous silk, are veritable feasts for the eye. Attention has been given to every minute detail—an unusual thing in Italy. The manners of the Japanese have all been closely studied. In the second and last acts the entire walls of the stage are covered with flowers, while from the floor rise innumerable blossoms, making a most ingenious and unexpected change of scene.—Telegraph.

INDO-CHINESE NOTES.

The Avenir du Tonkin has a rather plaintive article on "Autonomy for Indo-China." It says:—"The administrative autolage imposed on us by the Department is often hard to support. There is scarcely a decision coming from the metropolis which does not wound and irritate by its complete disregard for our interests and our needs. It is certain that the number of our functionaries sent out from home, is much too considerable, and that with a smaller number of agents the English administer India, with 25 times more population than Indo-China. This necessitates an unwarrantable burden of taxation, and militates against the rapid development of the colony. Autonomy would permit us to reduce the number of functionaries. Then the customs house charges are enormous. They almost reduce one to regretting that instead of coming to Tonkin, one had not gone to Hong-kong, where everything is cheap. Autonomy is the best means to pursue to put an end to the exactions of the douane, and especially to its ever-changing and vexatious methods, though the colony would probably not be able to act at present with only the financial concurrence of the metropolis. From a point of view still higher, autonomy must be hoped for, for it appears to be the only remedy against the separatist tendencies of the colonies. . . . The English, who have so many colonies, and so few separations on separatist tendencies, generally accord to their colonies a greater or less degree of autonomy. On this point the English are very broad-minded, and entertain no fears that the colonies so privileged will abuse the concessions made them."

It is evidently a distinction to be born—of French parents—at Hanoi. The Avenir du Tonkin gives vent to a warwhoop of triumph over the birth of four babies and devotes twenty lines to felicitation of the happy mothers—pour encourager les autres.

The Tableau Général du Commerce de la France gives details of French exports to Indo-China. It appears that in 1897 they totalled 30,734,918 francs, of which 11,365,370 francs for cloth and clothing; 3,253,124 francs for hardware; 2,227,640 francs wine; 1,197,085 francs for arms, powder, and ammunition; and 1,038,019 francs for machinery.

An Annamite of Saigon recently attempted suicide in a peculiar manner. Crossed in love, he decided to make an end of himself, and, seizing his nose in one hand, he chopped the unfortunate member off with a hatchet. He was removed to the Hospital bleeding profusely.

"Cassandre"—a very foolish Cassandra—writes a hysterical article in the Avenir du Tonkin in reference to Sir Edward Monson's speech in Paris, in which his Excellency warned France against pursuing a policy of irritation vis-à-vis England. "Cassandre" declaims—and in that he has our sympathy to some extent—against the speech as a breach of diplomatic courtesy. But from this he proceeds to a very wild forecast of Great Britain's intentions. Egypt and the Nile Basin are not by any means the goal of her ambition. She looks to grander things than that. She "has not lost the hope of founding an Empire from the sands of the Gulf of Oman to the shores of the Pacific." "The danger (continues "Cassandre") which menaces our colony (of Indo-China) is a real one, and it must not be forgotten that England will not perhaps be alone in attacking us. Japan has for a long time had her eyes turned on this side and will be only too happy to have her slice of the cake. To resist their combined forces would tax all our means of defence. Our fleet will shortly receive reinforcements, and we can only applaud the measures the home Government is about to take to cover our Indo Chinese possessions. Would she but hasten to place them beyond the risk of a coup de main. The hour presses, the horizon is becoming darker each minute!" We pass over the English little plan of a Trans-Asian Empire; but we cannot help remarking on the deep Machiavellian schemes imputed to Japan. Japan, squabbling over party questions and trying to make both ends meet, hardly, we imagine, contemplates attacking France just yet. What weak nerves and giant imaginations Continental writers have.

PLAIN SPEAKING TO AN EMPEROR.

A REMARKABLE KOREAN MEMORIAL.

Mr. Choi Ikhyen, says the Korean Independent, is an old man living in Pochun, about 70 ri from Seoul. He enjoys the reputation of being an upright and out-spoken scholar, poor and proud. Some time ago he was appointed a Councillor of State. But refusing to accept the office, he gave a piece of his mind to the Emperor in the following utterances, extracted from a lengthy memorial:—

Thirty years have passed since I had the honor of beholding Your celestial countenance. I should be only too happy to be once more in Your august presence, but for the fact that I am sick and infirm. Besides, the condition of affairs to-day would prove exceedingly hard even to statesmen like Yi Yun and Choi Kalyang (two famous Chinese statesmen). Stupid as I am, what good can I do, be it ever so little as a piece of 'thread or hair'? I only wish that I may soon die and become an evil spirit with powers to destroy wicked traitors so that Your Majesty may enjoy a day of peace!

The dangerous condition of our country is like that of a dying man. A good physician would, before he administers any medicine to a patient, first inquire into the cause of the disease. In the same way, the cause of our country's disease may be found in Your Majesty's heart. If Your heart is right You may even now succeed in restoring the prosperity of the nation and in becoming a good prince in the world. But if Your heart is not right Your ancestral temples and altars to Heaven and Earth may crumble into dust while Your people may perish like beasts.

The misfortunes of the State began in 1882 (the mutiny of unpaid soldiers). Ever since then the years of '84, '93, '95 witnessed disorders of various kinds. The plots of An Kyegun and of Kim Hongniuk must be added to the list. No month passes without foreign trouble and domestic turmoil until to-day danger and ruin hang over our heads, while future perils can not be calculated.

Had Your Majesty taken the warning in 1882, and amended former mistakes, the trouble of 1884 would never have happened. Had Your Majesty profited by the experience of 1884, the misfortunes of 1894 would not have befallen You. Had You been warned by the events of 1894, You might have been saved from the calamity of October, 1895. Repentance and amendment in time would have given no occasion for the conspiracies of An Kyegun and Kim Hongniuk.

It is useless, of course, to talk about what is past. But if one does not to-day repent of his former blunders, he may hereafter have occasion to regret again to-day's mistakes. Suppose You, Majesty were to henceforth apply Yourself to good government with renewed zeal, going to bed early in the night and rising early in the morning, earnestly amending what was wrong in the past. Even if this failed to prevent trouble, is it not better than persisting in wrong-doing all through life?

Your Majesty has an artless and kindly nature, loving the people and revering what is old. What then has led the affairs of State to the present crisis? It is because Your heart is enthralled by things and Your judgment overcome by passions. You have more softness than strength, attentive to little things while neglecting great affairs. You love flattery but hate straightforwardness, preferring ease to labour. During the 30 years past, You Majesty has neither shown any fear for the chastisement of Heaven nor manifested any pity for the murmurings of the people. This is the cause of all the distresses of the day.

The memorial concludes by praying His Majesty to listen to honest counsels, refusing to be led astray by little gains and crafty men. The Independent says His Majesty gave a gracious answer to the venerable memorialist, promising that he would carry out the advice so frankly given.

THE REVISED INCOME TAX LAW.

Art. I.—Any person domiciled, or possessing a place of abode for more than one year within the Empire of Japan in which this law is operative, shall be under obligation to pay income tax in accordance with the law.

Art. II.—Any person not falling within the purview of the above article, but holding property, or engaging in a trade, business, or profession in those parts of the Empire in which this Law is operative, shall be required to pay income tax only on the receipts realized from his trade, business, or profession in Japan.

Art. III.—The income tax shall be imposed at the rates specified below:—

Class I. Incomes of juridical persons	2%
Class II. Interest on loans or debentures payable in the districts where this Law is enforced	10%
Class III. Other forms of income—
Of and over,
Yen. 100,000	7%
50,000	5%
30,000	4%
20,000	3%
15,000	2%
10,000	1%
5,000	0.5%
3,000	0.3%
2,000	0.2%
1,000	0.1%
500	0.05%
300	0.03%

The receipts of the head of a family and of persons living together with such family shall be taken together as the basis of calculation for fixing the rates of tax to be levied, provided that the receipts in question belong to Class III. This provision is also applicable to cases when more than two members of a family live in the same house, separately from the head.

Art. IV.—Incomes shall be classified as follows: 1. Incomes in Class I. shall be calculated on the balance obtained by subtracting all losses from the gross profits realized in each fiscal year on account of business undertaken. The receipts of a juridical person falling within the category of Article III. shall be determined by subtracting all the losses from the profits realized in each fiscal year in connection with property owned or occupations carried on in the district where this Law is in operation.

2. Incomes in Class II. are calculated on the payments due.

3. Incomes in Class III. are calculated by subtracting the necessary expenditures from the gross amount of receipts secured.

Note.—In the case of interest on public loans or company's debentures, dividends, salaries, wages, special allowances, rewards, annual allowances, pensions, &c., the amount shall be fixed on estimates of the sums realizable during the year.

Art. V.—No tax shall be imposed on the following sources of incomes:—

1. Salaries or wages of soldiers on actual war service.
2. Aids and pensions to wounded or invalids.
3. Travelling expenses, education funds, or legal allowances for the sustenance of families.
4. Receipts of a juridical person not trading for profit.
5. Temporary receipts from sources not connected with profitable business.
6. Receipts from property, trade, or occupation, held or carried on in a foreign country or in a district where this law is not operative.

Note.—The receipts of a juridical person having a principal office in a district where this law is operative are excepted.

7. Dividends receivable from a juridical person upon whom income tax has been imposed in accordance with this law.

Art. VI.—No tax shall be levied upon incomes in Class III. which fall below 300 yen. This provision, however, shall not apply to cases specified in the 2nd clause of Article III., in which the total amount reaches 300 yen.

Art. VII.—Any juridical person who is under obligation to pay income tax shall present to the Government a statement of profit and loss accounts for each fiscal year. In the case of a juridical person falling within the purview of Article II., he must calculate for each fiscal year the profit and loss appertaining to his property or occupation held or carried on in the district in which these regulations are enforced, and forward the statement to the Government.

Art. VIII.—Any person liable to taxation with regard to receipts in Class III. shall prepare in April of each year a minute statement as in the classification and amount of his income, and present the same to the Government.

Art. IX.—The amount of income in Class I. shall be determined by the Government upon investigation of the profit and loss accounts, and incomes in Class II. are to be determined by the Government on the report of the Investigation Committee.

Art. X.—The Director of each Taxation Office shall investigate the amount of incomes realized by persons whom he considers liable to pay tax, and after preparing a statement as to the results of his investigation, he shall present the same to the Income Investigation Committee.

Art. XI.—An Income Investigation Council shall be established in each Taxation District. The number of commissioners shall be determined by Ordinance.

Art. XII.—The members of the Investigation Council shall be nominated by persons specially appointed for the purpose.

Art. XIII.—The electoral district for members of the Investigation Committee shall be identical with the limits of the jurisdiction of the respective Taxation Offices. The electoral district for the electors of the members of the Investigation Council shall correspond with the limits of Shi, Cho, or Son, and in the case of Tokyo, Kyoto Osaka, Sapporo, and Hakodate, shall correspond with the urban district of each city.

Art. XIV.—Any person living within the limits of the electoral district and presenting a report as specified in Article VIII. is entitled to elect a member or members of the Investigation Council, and is qualified for election as such member.

The privilege of membership, however, is withheld from the following classes of persons:—

1. Persons of utter incapacity.
2. Bankrupts who have failed to pay their debts after adjudication, or who have not received their discharge.
3. Those who within one year have been proceeded against for failure to pay national taxes.
4. Those under sentence to deprivation or suspension of civil rights.
5. Persons appealing from sentence of imprisonment until such time as judgment is confirmed or quashed.
6. Those who within a period of six years have been convicted in accordance with Article XLVI.

Art. XV.—The number of voters for members of the Investigation Committee shall be in the proportion of one for every ten persons in the electoral district who have forwarded reports as specified in Article VIII. In case the number of persons presenting reports exceeds 200, the voters shall be limited to twenty; in case it is below 10, only one will be chosen as voter.

Art. XVI.—The affairs relating to the election of members of the Investigation Council shall be conducted by the Mayor, district or village headman, or Kocho.

Art. XVII.—The Director of the Taxation Office is required to fix the date for the election of voters for the Investigation Council, and notify the same to the mayor, or headman of a district, town, or village, or the Kocho. The mayor, or the headman of any of these municipal divisions, shall, on the receipt of such a notice, advertise the same at least 7 days prior to the period of election.

Art. XVIII.—The election shall be conducted by signed ballot.

Art. XIX.—The election shall be determined by a majority of votes; but in case of an equality of votes, it shall be decided by seniority; and in case the persons voted for are of the same age, then by lot.

Art. XX.—The Mayor or the headman of a district, town, or village, or the Kocho shall, upon the completion of the election, notify the names of the successful candidates.

Art. XXI.—In carrying out the election of the Investigation Committee, the Director of the Tax Collection Office shall fix the date of election and notify the same at least seven days previously. With regard to the election of the committee, the provisions of Articles XVIII. and XIX. shall apply.

Art. XXII.—The Director of the Tax Collection Office shall, upon the completion of the election of committee, notify the names of the members elected.

Art. XXIII.—Any person elected as a member of committee shall not be allowed to resign without substantial reason.

Art. XXIV.—The period of service for members of the Investigation Committee shall be four years, half the number retiring by rotation every two years. In the case of the first retirement, the retiring members shall be determined by lot.

Art. XXV.—The session of the Investigation Council shall take place not later than August 1st every year.

Art. XXVI.—The Investigation Council shall meet on receipt of due notice from the Director of the Tax Collection Office.

Art. XXVII.—The Investigation Council is required to elect a President from among its members at the beginning of the session every year.

Art. XXVIII.—More than half the members of the Council must be present to form a quorum. In case of an equality of votes the right of decision shall rest with the President.

Art. XXIX.—Members of the Committee shall in no case engage in any discussion relating to their own incomes.

Art. XXX.—In case the Council fails to hold its session by August 31st, or to complete its investigations, the Government shall determine the incomes of persons concerning whom the investigation is not completed.

Art. XXXI.—The Government may, if it considers the Council's decisions unjustifiable, submit the same for reinvestigation, and in case the results of the second enquiry are deemed unsatisfactory, or the work of reinvestigation has not been completed within fifteen days from the time it was submitted for discussion, the Government shall itself determine the amount of income under investigation.

Art. XXXII.—The Director of the Tax Collection Office or his delegate may attend the Investigation Council to state his views on the subjects under discussion.

Art. XXXIII.—The members of the Investigation Council shall be granted special allowances and travelling expenses.

Art. XXXIV.—The Director of the Tax Collection Office or his delegate may, if he deems it necessary for purposes of investigation, make enquiries as to the facts concerning the incomes of persons whom he considers liable to pay the tax.

Art. XXXV.—When the Government has determined the amount of income specified in Classes I. and III., measures shall be taken to notify the fact to the persons liable to pay the tax.

Art. XXXVI.—If taxpayers object to the amount notified by the Government, they may state the reasons of their objection within twenty days from the receipt of notice, and demand a renewal of investigation.

Art. XXXVII.—The Government shall, on the receipt of a demand as specified in the preceding Article, take steps to convene a special Council to investigate and determine the case. The Special Investigation Council shall consist of four Tax Inspectors and three members of the Ordinary Council. The limits of the districts of Special Investigation Councils shall be determined by Imperial Ordinance.

Art. XXXVIII.—Tax-payers are required to pay their imposts at the rate notified by the Government even after they have demanded reinvestigation as specified in the preceding Article; if their objection be upheld the difference will be refunded.

Art. XXXIX.—Any person who has made objection with regard to the assessment of his income may either enter a protest in the form of an administrative complaint, or by prosecution in a court of law.

Art. XL.—If any person liable to taxation with regard to incomes in Class III. has sustained a diminution of one-fourth or upwards of his income, he may report the fact to the Government in order to have the rate of tax revised. In no case, however, shall a demand for revision be advanced after January 31st of the ensuing year.

Art. XLI.—The Government shall, on the receipt of a demand as specified in the foregoing Article, investigate the amount of income, and, on ascertaining that the income in question has decreased by one-fourth or upwards of the amount originally determined, shall take steps to revise the assessment.

Art. XLII.—With regard to incomes in Class I. the tax shall be collected for each fiscal year. With reference to incomes in Class II. the taxpayer is required to pay tax at the time he receives his dividends. In the case of incomes in Class III. the tax shall be collected half-yearly—in March and September. If meanwhile the tax-payer leaves to take up his residence beyond the limits of the Empire, the income tax may be collected from him before his departure.

Art. XLIII.—In case of a demand being made as prescribed in Article XL., the Government may postpone the collection of the tax until the question at issue is settled.

Art. XLIV.—With respect to incomes in Class III. the district in which any person liable to taxation is domiciled shall be regarded as the place for payment of his tax, and in case he is found not to have a permanent residence in any district, the place of his temporary abode shall be regarded as a domicile for the purposes of the tax. Any taxpayer, however, may, upon presentation of a report, pay the tax in a district outside the limits of that in which his permanent residence or actual place of abode is situated.

Any person having neither permanent nor temporary residence in a district where the regulations are enforced, must present a report to the Government stating the place in which his tax is to be paid. In the absence of such a report, the government shall itself determine the place of payment.

Art. XLV.—If any person liable to pay the tax does not reside in the district where the tax is to be collected, he must appoint an overseer to whom the management of affairs relating to the payment of the tax shall be entrusted, and he shall notify the fact to the Government.

Art. XLVI.—Any person who conceals the amount of his income in order to evade the tax shall be liable to a fine of three times the amount of tax evaded. Those who make voluntary confession, however, shall be absolved from punishment, being only charged with the amount of tax in arrear.

Art. XLVII.—Any person engaged in investigation of incomes who divulges facts coming to his knowledge in connection therewith, shall be punished with a fine not exceeding 30 yen, and shall be deprived of his official post.

APPENDIX.

Art. XLVIII.—These Regulations shall come into operation from January 1st of the 32nd year of Meiji (1899).

Art. XLIX.—The Income Tax Law embodied in Imperial Ordinance No. 5 of the 20th year of Meiji shall be rescinded from the date of the operation of these Regulations.

With regard to income tax to be collected in March of the 32nd year of Meiji, the provisions of the previous Income Tax Law shall apply.

Art. L.—These Regulations shall not be enforced, for the time being, in Okinawa Prefecture, the Ogasawara Islands, and the Seven Isles of Izu.

THE NAGASAKI HOTEL, LIMITED.

An Extraordinary General Meeting of the above-named Company was held in the Hotel premises on Dec. 30.

There were present, Messrs. F. Ringer (Chairman), A. L. Jordan and M. E. Paul (Directors), Baker, Buckland, Bairdoff, A. B. Glover, Houben, McConnell, Miller, Morgan, Robertson, Smart, R. M. Smith, Wallace, and Wills.

The meeting was called to order at 4.15 p.m.

The notice convening the meeting having been read, a discussion arose as to whether the proceedings should be kept private. It was, however, in the end unanimously agreed that they should be reported in the usual manner.

Dr. PAUL then proposed the following resolution:—
1. That the acts of the Directors of the Company in borrowing, in excess of their powers, from Messrs. Holme, Ringer & Co., of Nagasaki, Japan, Merchants, certain sums of money for the purposes of the Company be and they are hereby sanctioned and confirmed.

Most of those present, he said, were probably familiar with the circumstances that had rendered it necessary to bring forward this resolution (to which his remarks were also prefatory), but it would be as well to lay before the meeting a short outline of the affairs of the Company from its incorporation to the present time. The Company was incorporated in April, 1897, and at the Statutory Meeting convened during the same month, Messrs. Home, Ringer & Co. were duly appointed general managers of the Company until the Hotel should be completed. They handed over their duties to Mr. Inman, the present manager, on the 14th of last month. At the outset it was decided to purchase Lots 43 and 44, Sagami-cho, at a cost of $37,000; and the original estimate of the cost of the undertaking was as follows:—

Land	$37,000
Furnishing	30,919
Stock of provisions	5,800
Building	47,500
Electric light	10,660
Architect and Gen. Managers	9,000
Total	130,079

This sum, $130,079, was already in excess of the share capital of the Company, amounting to $130,000; and it did not provide for working capital, extras, or an adequate supply of stores, wines, and liquors for running a large hotel; but by the articles of association of the Company the Directors were empowered to borrow a sum not exceeding $25,000, and it was then believed that this borrowing power would provide sufficient to cover all extras. The subsequent experience of the Company had shown that they were unduly sanguine.

guine in hoping, even at the prices then ruling, to complete a large first-class hotel for from £13,000 to £15,000. In June, 1897, a requisition signed by certain shareholders was sent to the board, asking that an extraordinary general meeting should be convened to consider the advisability of adding a third storey to the hotel. By this time the Directors had ascertained that the original estimates for the two-storeyed building were altogether inadequate, and a report to this effect was presented to the shareholders at the half-yearly meeting held on July 16th, 1897. The Directors also drew up a report containing the estimated cost of the proposed third storey. According to the first of these reports the two-storeyed building as originally planned would have cost $26,756 more than had been originally estimated; the estimated cost of adding the third storey was $33,500. This showed that if the proposed third storey were added, the total cost of the undertaking would not be less than $190,335; an excess of $60,256 over the originally estimated cost of the undertaking. The Directors, as a body, therefore opposed the resolution that a third storey should be added; but the resolution in favour of the addition was carried. This addition of a third storey had undoubtedly been one of the principal causes of the subsequent miscalculations of expenditure and of the financial troubles of the Company which this meeting was called to remedy. In the first place, after the plans for the third storey had been revised, it was found that further land must be acquired for larger servants' quarters and additional outbuildings; and Lot 45, Sagayimatin, was therefore purchased at a cost of $27,250. The cost of the building was then estimated at $90,975, the electric lighting at $12,660, the architect's and general managers' fees at $12,000, the estimate of $5,000 for provisions remaining the same. In view of the impending imposition of the new Japanese import tariff, the Directors had, however, thought it expedient to order a large stock of wines and provisions; and there could be no doubt that this step would ultimately be found advantageous to the company, for the interest charges on the money needed to cover the cost of these stores would be considerably less than the tariff dues it would have been necessary to pay on them if imported at a later date. Apart, however, from the cost of these extra stores and wines, shortly after the additional plot of ground had been acquired and the necessary alterations in the plans for the third storey had been made, it was estimated that the cost of the undertaking would be $215,335. In January, 1898, tenders for the electric lighting of the hotel were called for, and one for $17,000 was accepted. The sum allowed for electric lighting in the estimates was $12,660, to which $2,000 had been added to provide for the lighting of the third storey; so that the estimate of $12,660 was inadequate to the amount of $4,340. The specifications furnished to the directors were, however, far from complete, and in the course of the completion of the plant various extras had to be added, bringing up the total cost of this item, including the cost of the electric bell and telephones, to $27,337.49. A refrigerating plant and cooling room, being most necessary additions to the property of the hotel, were also ordered at an estimated cost of $5,000. The ultimate cost of these items was $3,873.28. In March, 1898, the directors having learned that the cost of carpets and curtains would greatly exceed the estimate, it was decided that the carpets and curtains for the ground and first floors only should be obtained from England; those for the third storey being purchased in Japan. On the 7th of April last, an Extraordinary General Meeting of the Company was held to authorize the issue of debentures to the amount of $170,000, and the issue was duly authorized. At that time the directors were of opinion that this sum would be sufficient to pay for all needs, and to start the hotel as a going concern, or that, if any further sum were required, it would be well within the amount the directors were, by the articles of association of the Company, entitled to borrow. Unfortunately, these expectations had proved erroneous, and it was for this reason that the directors had been compelled to requisition the present meeting. Dr. Paul then read a statement drawn up by the late General Managers showing how and in what manner the estimates had from time to time been exceeded. The gross expenditure was thus seen to amount to $385,722 at the present date; and in addition to these sums there were liabilities for sundry goods on order, directors' and auditor's fees, and interest on debentures to the amount of $8,250. These charges could not be met out of the working receipts of the hotel, which had so recently been opened, and, as the meeting was aware, had been hampered by unexpected difficulties during the first two months of its working. The directors had therefore thought it necessary, not merely that the loans already made should be authorized by the shareholders, but further, that a loan should be authorized for the amount required to meet the immediate liabilities of the Company. The directors had every reason to hope that, if the resolutions they laid before the meeting were carried, the future of the undertaking would be a prosperous one. In regard to the action of the late General Managers in advancing the funds found necessary for the completion of the undertaking, Dr. Paul pointed out that, unless they had come forward in this way, not merely would the completion of the hotel have been indefinitely postponed, but, since there would then have been no possibility of earning, he would not say a dividend for the shareholders, but the interest on the $170,000 debentures, the winding up of the Company would have been inevitable; and, since an incomplete hotel was, like a white elephant, hardly a saleable asset, it was unlikely that the shareholders would have recovered anything from the wreck. Furthermore, if the resolutions to consider which the present meeting had been convened, were not carried, there would remain only two alternatives, the winding up or reconstruction of the Company. Either of these procedures would be expensive, and both would be disastrous to the shareholders. If the Company were wound up with the existing liabilities and charges, it was very unlikely that, when these were settled, anything would remain for distribution among the shareholders. As for reconstruction, the shareholders' power in this respect was limited by the claims of the debenture holders; and it was highly improbable that any terms could be devised giving the shareholders a continued interest in the undertaking which the debenture holders would be willing to accept. There seemed, then, to be no course for the shareholders but to accept and pass the resolutions now before them.

The resolution was seconded by Mr. JORDAN.

In the discussion that followed,

Mr. BAKER said that one or two of the remarks made by the proposer of the resolution had not been quite accurate. He had said that the Directors as a body had opposed the addition of a third storey, but he (Mr. Baker) believed that one, if not two, of the three Directors favoured the addition.

Dr. Paul, interposing, said that whatever might have been the private opinion of one or more of the Directors it was unquestionable that as a body they had opposed the addition, and he read an extract from the minutes of the half-yearly meeting of the Company held on July 16th, 1897, showing that the Directors had on that occasion tendered their resignation in a body because they felt that the proposed alteration of the building would make so extensive a difference that they did not wish to proceed further in the matter. Though the speaker had himself as a shareholder favoured the enlargement, he had joined with the other Directors in tendering his resignation on this ground, and it was therefore perfectly correct to say that the Directors in a body had opposed the resolution.

Continuing, Mr. BAKER said that the absence of a large number of the shareholders resident in Nagasaki would tend to show that they thought there was nothing to do but leave the matter in the hands of the Directors. He thought, however, there were one or two points that required careful consideration, and he was of opinion that the present resolution did not adequately safeguard the interest of the shareholders. What were the terms on which the second Debentures would be issued and would they not prejudice the security of the holders of the existing Debentures?

Dr. PAUL said that the terms of repayment were left by the resolution to the discretion of the Directors, who in any case had no power to issue new Debentures that would impair the security of the holders of the old Debentures. He then read the form of Debentures the Directors proposed to adopt if the resolution authorising the issue was carried. This showed that the Directors would be able to repay this second issue of Debentures at their discretion, and so reduce the liabilities of the Company.

The CHAIRMAN said that while the Hotel had at present a large stock of stores and wines, imported in view of the new tariff, it would not be necessary in the future to carry so large a stock, and some of the money now invested in stock could be applied to reducing the debt and thus saving interest.

Mr. BAKER maintained there was danger that the Directors, in their natural eagerness to reduce the liabilities of the Company, might reduce the working capital of the Company to too small an amount, and that then, in consequence of a possible unprofitable six months' working the Company might be unable to pay the interest on the first issue of debentures, and the holders of these might then force the Company into liquidation.

The CHAIRMAN said that the Directors would naturally see that the next instalment of interest on the first issue of debentures was forthcoming before proceeding to pay off debentures of the second issue.

Mr. BAKER considered that it would be better to employ surplus funds in buying up debentures of the first issue, and in this way reducing the debt.

Dr. PAUL said that whereas the debentures of the first issue might not always be purchasable at par, the Company would have the option of redeeming the Debentures of the second issue at par. Moreover, the Directors had to consider on what terms it would be possible to obtain the money required. The Debentures of the second issue were not a "gilt-edged" security, and the money would probably not be forthcoming unless it was understood that it would be repaid as soon as funds were forthcoming. But of course when the Debentures were once issued the date of repayment would, as long as the Debentures of the first issue were unredeemed, remain entirely at the discretion of the Directors, and the holders of Debentures of the second issue would have no power to force the Company into liquidation if their interest was unpaid. The interests of the shareholders were thus safeguarded, provided the Directors exercised a reasonable discretion in the matter of redeeming the Debentures.

After some further discussion, in the course of which Mr. BAKER said the Company was undoubtedly deeply indebted to Messrs. Holme, Ringer & Co. for advancing the money required to save the Company from liquidation, the resolution was put to the vote and carried unanimously.

Dr. PAUL then proposed:

"That without prejudice to the power vested in the Directors by the Articles of Association of the Company and for the purposes of securing the repayment of the sums of money already borrowed by the Directors, in excess of their powers, from Messrs. Holme, Ringer & Co., for the purpose of securing the repayment of certain sums of money to be borrowed by the Directors from Messrs. Holme, Ringer & Co., also for the purposes of the Company, the Directors be and they are hereby authorized to create and issue, as they think fit, further debentures for yen 95,000 carrying interest at 7 per cent. per annum and to be secured by charge upon the whole undertaking and property of the Company subject to the debentures issued by the Company in the year 1898."

This was seconded by Mr. BAKER and carried unanimously.

The CHAIRMAN then said that the directors had taken this opportunity of bringing forward a resolution reducing the qualification for the office of director, as the present qualification did not provide a sufficient number of shareholders eligible for the office.

Mr. JORDAN then proposed:

That the Articles of Association be altered in the manner following:—

"In Article 84 the words 'One thousand dollars' shall be substituted for the words: 'Two thousand five hundred dollars.'"

This was seconded by Dr. PAUL and carried unanimously.

Mr. BAKER then asked with regard to the question of increasing the number of directors at the next annual general meeting of the Company, whether it was necessary for candidates to give notice.

The CHAIRMAN replied that by Article 97 of the Articles of Association it was provided that any person not a retiring director and not recommended by the directors, must give seven days' notice in writing of his intention to become a candidate for the office of director. If this were done, the Company could at any ordinary general meeting increase the number of directors to four or five.

After a vote of thanks to the Chairman, the proceedings terminated at 5.15 p.m.—Nagasaki Press.

(From the American Chess Magazine, October, with Mr. M'Connell's Notes.)

(a) White up to this point plays the Vienna Opening.

(b) This constitutes the initial move in the opening, which has certainly the claim of novelty, and is susceptible of very interesting variations. Another variation of Mr. M'Connell's is, instead of the text move, 4—B to B 4, to play 4—P to K 4. Both variations lead at once to an open game, and intricate situations seemingly new and worthy of careful study.

(c) The only move available for White to prevent Black's getting an immediate and decisive advantage.

(d) Here, instead of the text play of 6—P to Q 3, Black could play 6—Kt to Q 5. White's reply would be 7—Kt to B 3, resulting necessarily in an exchange either of the Queens or of the Knights, and in either event an apparently equal game, with probable advantage for White. The fact that Mr. Lasker adopted the more conservative move of 6—P to Q 3, followed on the next move by the retreat of the Queen, is in itself strong evidence of the soundness of this new opening.

(e) The early development of the Queen's Knight, followed by the opportune advance of the King's Rook's Pawn, constitute the leading features of the game.

(f) Probably the best move at Black's command, as he could not with safety accept the offered sacrifice of the Bishop.

(g) Evidently with the purpose of development on the Queen's side by advance of Q B P.

(h) A second offer of sacrifice of this Bishop, which Black cannot safely accept.

(i) Here, of course, a better play for the White would have been 35—P to K R 4, and the advance of the Pawns would have been irresistible. White's error in moving 35—Q to Kt 3 caused the loss of a valuable centre Pawn; but this was not sufficient gain to alter the result. Black's game was then hopeless.

Notes by W. H. S. Mouch in Common Sense, Dublin.

(a) Of doubtful excellence.

(b) Perhaps best. It gives him a good attack. The position is similar to the Muzio.

(c) The sacrifice is now necessary, but Black could have avoided it by playing Q to K 2 instead of Q to K B 3 on the preceding move. Q to K 2 would only have cost a P and deprived him of the power of castling.

(d) This seems weak, but White has no good move.

(e) Here Mr. Van Vliet, in the Hereford Times (from which this game is taken), recommends B to Q Kt 5.

(f) Playing to win. Had he moved the K to Kt-q, it is doubtful whether Black could do more than accept the draw by repetition of checks.

(g) Of course if he takes the B, Black wins the Q by retaking with Kt ch.

(h) Mr. Van Vliet marks this move as a strong one. It is probably good enough to win, but overlooks a forced mate in five moves, viz: 24—R to K 4 ch; 25—K to B 6, R to Kt 4 ch; 26—P takes B, R (Kt 4) to Kt 3 ch; 27—K takes P, Kt to Q-q ch; 28—K to K 7, R to K 3, mate; if 26—K takes P, mate follows thus: 26—K takes P, Kt to Q-q ch; 27—K to K 7, R (Kt 4) to Kt 2 ch; 28—Q interposes, R takes Q mate.

(i) Leading to mate in two moves. But it is not easy to see what to do. Besides the mate already pointed out, Black threatens R to K 3, R to K B 3 ch, and Kt to K 2 mate. I do not, however, see a forced mate in this position. White's best move seems to be K B 4, answering R to K 3 by P to K 5, when, if Black plays P takes P, he may continue with B to Kt 5.

NOTES.

A representative of the Brooklyn Eagle recently had an interesting interview with Steinitz. One of the first points touched on was the champion's present playing strength. He freely admitted that the pace to-day, especially in tournaments, was a bit too fast for him, and that he lacked the endurance so essential to success in long drawn-out contests. Barring this, he asserts that his chess powers are not failing him, and ascribes the cause of occasional set-backs to errors committed through weariness after long sittings. In the matter of position judgment, however, he will play second fiddle to no one, being of the firm belief that, given favourable surroundings, complete health and not too exacting a schedule, he would still have something to say concerning the championship. Mr. Steinitz, who, by the way, has been an American citizen since 1888, is still a game ahead of Pillsbury in personal encounters. He will not, however, issue a challenge at present, though ready if called on to play, as he is engaged with his professional duties as instructor of chess and busy with work on his book.

Referring to the Vienna tournament, Mr. Steinitz said that eight hours of play a day in a journey of such duration had proved too much for him, and that, furthermore, all the luck which figured in his games went against him, to the end that in all five and one-half points really due him were thrown away and with them his chances of first prize, of which he had entertained sanguine hopes. The element of luck, acknowledged to affect contests of the kind to a certain degree, frequently plays havoc with the scores of competitors, especially when there are disturbing influences such as the peculiar tactics pursued by Walbrodt throughout the tournament. The young Berliner made it a practice to arrive late at the place of play, then to "play in the gallery" by making his moves with great rapidity, necessitated by the loss of time on his clock during his absence. He made a sensational draw with Tarrasch under these conditions, and again forfeited an entire game by non-appearance. On another occasion, to insure his presence for an important game, Shewalter was obliged to set out to his hotel for him in a carriage. Consequently, while he took second prize the previous year at Berlin, he finished fifteenth at Vienna.

Steinitz claimed to have had a win in his game with Pillsbury, whose Ruy Lopez he defeated with the famous 3—P to Q 3, but in an unguarded moment he took Pillsbury's sacrificed knight with the wrong pawn and lost the game. Against Blackburne he had two pawns to the good and with Janowski he had a sure draw in hand, both games being unfinished on the first day. After a long adjournment, during which he had somewhat lost his mental grasp on the positions, the games were resumed and he only drew in the first instance and lost to Janowski. On the score of adjournments the ex-champion had a grievance against the committee managing the congress. In case a game was adjourned a rule provided that there should be no examination of the position by the players during the interval. To this rule Steinitz has made it a practice to adhere, whether in force or not, merely from a sense of fairness, and doubtless has often suffered by it, to the advantage of an opponent not so exact. At Vienna there was a flagrant violation of the spirit of this rule, when the committee failed to interfere with open analysis of unfinished games by other players and spectators in the hall of the tourney. Mr. Steinitz was proud of the fact that he was the oldest of the competitors, excepting Schwarz, who went completely to pieces. The other veteran, Blackburne, was not placed among the prize winners.

Concluding, Mr. Steinitz, in answer to a question, said:—"I most positively still adhere to my belief in the soundness and efficiency of my defence to the Ruy Lopez, and also of my novel continuation against the Two Knights' defence, wherein the white knight is played out to K 3. Furthermore, I have still faith in my treatment of the Evans Gambit, and expect soon to have something to say concerning the Steinitz Gambit, which has recently been discredited on the strength of a single variation, which occurred in a game played blindfolded by me against two adversaries in consultation. These moves of mine are not eccentricities, as certain vivacities like to term them, but are based on the development of certain principles of play that I have adopted for guidance throughout the greater part of my career. As you well know, I do not hesitate to practice my theories with the best players of the day."

The championship of the Melbourne Club has been won by Mr. Watson, 19 years old, who made his debut in serious chess in this tournament with nine wins and two losses.

The latest Chess-magazine is the Tygodnik Szachowy, published in Warsaw, Russia.

In the Vienna Tournament, of the 342 games played there were 231 won games and 111 draws.

Richelin, in The Times, says that there are 400 towns in the United States able to support Chess clubs.

Curiously enough most players who have won a blue ribbon of chess have done so right away, and, comparatively speaking, shortly after they began, and not by successive stages of improvements. This is true of Lasker, Tarrasch, Pillsbury, as well as of most of the old players.—Pall Mall Gazette.
